Upjohn, K.C. and Kenyon Parker for the appellant.—The differences in the copy and the deed of 1854 are so small that Bromet is only entitled at the most to nominal damages. But if that is not so the order gives him too much. The appellant is not liable for the costs of putting up and pulling down the house built on that land, as Bromet put it up notwithstanding he knew that Hooper objected to it, and after the deed of 1854 had been found and he was aware of its provisions. Bromet is not entitled to the costs of the action of the plaintiff and himself, as he did not conduct it in a reasonable way. He raised several defences which were untenable and ought not to have been raised. He ought to have admitted that the deed of 1854 was binding on him. Then there would have been no action, and Raphael could not have resisted his claim for compensation for the building ground he had lost in consequence of the building line fixed in it. But he relied on the permission given him by the liquidator of the Conservative Building Land Society, and fought the action on that ground. He is therefore only entitled to the difference between the value of the land he purchased without the restrictive covenant as to the building line contained in the deed of 1854, and the value of that land with that restriction:

Joyner v. Weeks, 65 L. T. Rep. 16; (1891) 2 Q. B. 31.

[WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Bazendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company (32 L. T. Rep. 330; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 35).]

Jenkins, K.C. and Edward Clayton for Bromet.—The provisions of the deed of 1854 do not constitute a building scheme, so there was good reason for considering that the liquidator came within the words "the vendors, their heirs and assigns" in clause 5 of the deed of 1854, and that his permission not to observe the covenant, which was confirmed by the court, was sufficient. The copy deed did not show any building scheme. Considering clauses 23 and 24, if the court holds there is any building scheme here, it will be going further than Collins v. Castle, 57 L. T. Rep. 764; 36 Ch. Div. 243.

Where the vendor reserves the right to alter the conditions of sale there cannot be a building scheme:

Osborne v. Bradley, 89 L. T. Rep. 11; (1903) 2 Ch. 446;

Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Company v. Butler, 54 L. T. Rep. 444; 16 Q. B. Div. 778, 791.

Bromet is entitled to the whole of the costs of the action and of building and pulling down the house. If as between Hooper and Bromet the defence was reasonable, Raphael is liable. Notice of the restrictive covenant ought not to be imputed to Bromet, as he honestly thought the copy was correct, though Farwell, J. held the case was within Jared v. Clements (88 L. T. Rep. 97 (1903) 1 Ch. 428). But as between Hooper and Bromet the defence was not improper, and the costs of it come within the indemnity:

Bazendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company (ubi sup.).

If Bromet considered that the original building scheme had become void and did not affect the land, he was bound to maintain that point in order to know his position under it, otherwise he could not know his position under the copy. If he had been successful on that point the plaintiff's whole case must have failed. Raphael never raised any objection to the way Bromet was conducting his defence to the action, and he therefore cannot now say he was acting unreasonably. Bromet had a right to have his legal liabilities ascertained, and Raphael was also interested. There being two sets of conditions, those in the original deed and those in the copy, it was to the interest of Raphael as well as of Bromet to find out by which they were bound.

Upjohn, K.C. in reply.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal against a decision of Farwell, J. So far as the action of Hooper v. Bromet is concerned there is no appeal but that action was an action for an injunction brought by the plaintiff, as one of the purchasers bound by and having the benefit of a building scheme, against Bromet as successor in title to a person who was bound by and had the benefit of this scheme, and Bromet contends that if he is responsible to Hooper in that action, he has, at all events to a certain extent, a remedy against Raphael, because Raphael gave him a letter of indemnity; and consequently he issued a third party notice, and the result was that Raphael had to come in as third party. He put in his defence as third party, and this appeal is really concerned only with the question whether Farwell, J. was right in holding, to the extent to which he did so hold, that Raphael was liable to indemnify Bromet. Certain land was vested in

[CT. OF APP.]

HOOPER v. BROMET; RAPHAEL (Third Party).

[CT. OF APP.]

Lord Ranelagh and another person as trustees for the Conservative Land Society, and the object of that society was to distribute this land among its members. The conveyances were conveyances by Lord Ranelagh and his co-trustee as vendors to various members of the society. When the scheme of the society is looked at, I do not think there is any doubt but that there was a building scheme, and clause 19 of that scheme provided for a deed being entered into by each purchaser for the purpose of working out the scheme, and for conveyancing purposes that deed of covenant has always been treated as governing the relations of the parties one to another. One of the plots of land was originally intended to be the church plot, but there were provisions for dealing with this land if it should not be used as a church plot. This plot became vested in Raphael. [His Lordship then referred to the negotiations for the sale of the plot by Raphael to Bromet, and to the indemnity, and continued:] The deed of 1854 has now been produced, and it is plain that that deed, which really it must be taken for the purposes of the letter of indemnity does contain the original building stipulations and conditions affecting the property, differs in some material respect from this document to which that indemnity is attached. Now, it really is not in dispute here that if there is a material difference between the stipulations of the deed of 1854 and the terms and conditions of this document, and that difference has resulted in damage or injury to Bromet, then Raphael is liable under his letter of indemnity to make good that damage to Bromet. I now propose to consider what really are the differences in these two documents. I will begin by dealing with the difference which is made by the existence in the document to which the letter of indemnity is attached of clauses 23 and 24, which are clauses which do not exist in the deed of 1854. Speaking generally and shortly, those are clauses which give powers of varying the conditions at the will of the vendors, and it is contended that the power given to the vendors under those circumstances is such as to negative there being any building scheme binding upon the purchasers inter se. It is said that in order to bind the purchasers inter se you must have the conditions that are absolutely invariable at the will of the vendor or anybody else; and that if they are variable there is no building scheme. I think that is stating the case as a whole a good deal too widely. I quite agree that the presence of a clause permitting the variation of the conditions, or the want of stability in the conditions, may be a circumstance to which great weight ought to be given in determining whether or not the intention was that the purchasers should be bound inter se, and I can quite imagine a case in which it would be held that the uncertainty and the want of definiteness were such as to negative the intention, and that, as I understand it, was the ground really of the decision of Farwell, J. in Osborne v. Bradley (ubi sup.). I am not saying a word against the correctness of that decision, but dealing with this document, notwithstanding the presence of those clauses, I should have held if the rights of the parties had depended upon this document—which of course they do not by reason of the deed of 1854 being the governing document—in other words, if I had had nothing but the scheme as originally entered into between the members of the Conservative Land Society and the purchasers of the various plots, that this particular document did properly lead to the inference that there was a scheme in which the purchasers were to be bound inter se, notwithstanding the presence of these clauses. In fact I do not think that anybody reading this document and giving due weight to its heading and to the matters set forth in it could hesitate to come to the conclusion that this document did involve such a scheme as necessarily led to the conclusion that the intention was that the parties should be bound inter se. Having said that, I do not propose to say any more about the difference between the deed and the terms and conditions in so far as that difference is constituted by these clauses 23 and 24, because the only use which was attempted to be made by counsel for Bromet of that difference was to say that properly construed, the terms and conditions in this document did not include a scheme at all. Now, that being so, what is the other difference which there is here? The other difference is really this: In the terms and conditions the site of a church is dealt with in clause 20. [His Lordship read it.] Then, when one turns back to see what are the restrictions which affect lot 60, it appears they are the restrictions contained in clause 4. [His Lordship read it.] I now call attention to the deed of 1854. The clause in that deed which applies to this plot is clause 11. Now, I do not think it necessary to go into the matter very closely, because the question of damage is one which we do not propose to decide here. It will be decided on the inquiry by the master to whom the inquiry has been referred. It is enough to say that it is perfectly plain the building capacity of the land under those two documents is very different. To mention one matter only, under the terms and conditions of the later deed there is nothing whatever which limits the power of the building owner excepting that he must do what building he has to do between really the back and the front building line; and to take as a concrete illustration of a building the church which appears upon the plan, his obligation would be under the terms and conditions carefully to keep the two ends of the building between those building lines; but there would have been no obligation on the building owner as to the extension of what, in the concrete example I have taken, would be the aisles of the church, whereas under this deed of 1854, if you take either road, taking the covenant in this deed, the building line is such that the building owner may not place any building within 40ft. of either of those two roads. It seems to me that that is a very material difference. Now, having got so far, it is right that I should deal in terms with the order of Farwell, J., because, with all deference to Farwell, J., I think that in some respects his order for inquiries goes too far. Having dealt with the action, it then proceeds: [His Lordship then referred to the order and the inquiry thereby directed, and continued:] It seems to me that those damages in respect of the building and the removal of the building ought not to be paid by Raphael, because Bromet ought not to have built, as at the time when he built he had full knowledge that in fact the terms and conditions of sale contained in the document to which the letter of indemnity was attached

[CT. OF APP.]

HOOPER v. BROMET; RAPHAEL (Third Party).

did not coincide with the covenant in the deed of 1854; and he knew perfectly well that the covenant in the deed of 1854 must be observed by the purchasers; and under those circumstances it seems to me that the damage which has arisen to him by reason of his having been at the cost of building, and his having under the order of the court being at the cost of pulling down, is not damage against which Raphael ought to indemnify Bromet; but that Bromet must bear that damage himself. So far as the residue of the damage is concerned—that is to say, so far as the land available for building under the covenant in the deed of 1854 is less than the land which would have been available for building under the later document. I will now proceed to deal with the other matters—that is to say, the costs which have been incurred by Bromet in respect of the action which was brought by Hooper, and in respect of his defence of it; and, secondly, in respect of the costs of the third party proceedings. Now, with reference to the costs which Bromet has been ordered to pay to Hooper, although Farwell, J. might have dealt with the costs as such, in my judgment in this order, and in the observations in his judgment which precede the formal order, he has dealt with those costs as damages. Now, the question is whether it is right that Raphael ought to indemnify Bromet against all such costs. It seems to me clear under the rule laid down in Bazendale v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company (ubi sup.) that Bromet can only recover against Raphael such damages as have been incurred by Bromet as the natural and proximate result of the defendant's position. Now, under those circumstances, one has to consider whether that can possibly be said of the whole of the costs which Bromet has incurred. It seems to me clear that it cannot. It is not disputed, I think, in this action by Raphael that there are some costs incurred in the action of Hooper v. Bromet against which Raphael is bound to indemnify Bromet; but it seems to me plain that he is not bound to indemnify him against all the costs incurred by Bromet in the matter of that action. Really, one has to ascertain how far the costs incurred by Bromet in that action are the natural and proximate result of the document which Raphael had warranted as accurate proving to be inaccurate. There must, it seems to me, necessarily have been an assessment of damages and so far as the writ and pleadings are concerned I do not think anyone will dispute but that those must be paid by Raphael. One has to see what was a reasonable course for Bromet to have pursued, having regard only to the state of things arising out of the breach of warranty, I will call it for convenience, that arises in the present case. I do not think that any of the costs which have resulted from Bromet having wrongfully built ought to be borne by Raphael, but I think that if one treats this case in the same way as one would have done if, instead of there being an actual building by Bromet there had been either a formal commencement or a threat to commence such as would have justified an action by Hooper, then I think one ought with regard to these costs to consider what would have been the reasonable and proper course for Bromet to have pursued. Now, it seems to me that what Bromet ought to have done under those circumstances would be to take care that he did not omit in his defence any defence which, if Raphael had had the conduct of the defence himself, he, Raphael, would have set up. Now, it is said that several of these defences—I am not sure that Mr. Jenkins did not contend all of them—were reasonable defences for Bromet to set up in respect of his relation to Raphael, but I cannot agree to that. I do not know really how far costs and expenses were incurred (the taxing master will be able to ascertain that) in respect of a denial that the deed of 1854 was, at all events in the first instance, the governing deed, but if expense was incurred it was a very unreasonable expense to incur. Then it is said that with regard to the defence based upon the licence that was obtained from the liquidator, who was treated as if he had been one of the vendors, that those costs ought to be paid by Raphael. I do not think they ought. It seems to me that such a defence was a hopeless defence. Then it is said that the building scheme which was set up had gone as a whole because the various purchasers upon the estates had all given up observance of the scheme by mutual consent. As to that the learned judge had not the slightest doubt, and said it was a perfectly hopeless matter and unarguable. That again, I think, is part of the expense against which Raphael is not bound to indemnify Bromet. Then it was said that Hooper, this particular plaintiff, by his own conduct had disentitled himself to sue. As to that matter the learned judge seems to have had some doubt. I think, therefore, that that is a reasonable defence against which Raphael ought to indemnify Bromet. The outcome, therefore, of my decision is: first, that there was a binding scheme; secondly, that under that scheme Hooper had a right to sue Bromet; thirdly, that there was a material difference between the deed of 1854 and the later document attached to the letter of indemnity; fourthly, that the one respect in which really Bromet has suffered damage by reason of that difference is in respect of the matters that I have already alluded to as to building lines, and the difference between the obligations of the building owners under the one document and under the other. With regard to the damages I entirely agree with Farwell, J. that in so far as the quantum of available building land has been diminished Raphael must bear the damage; but not in respect of the building or pulling down of the buildings. But in respect of the costs that Bromet has incurred towards Hooper or on his own account in the action of Hooper v. Bromet. I do not think that the whole of those costs can be treated as damages resulting from this breach of warranty. I have been through the various heads I hope sufficiently to enable the taxing master to ascertain the quantum of the liability of Raphael to Bromet. I speak of the taxing master, but the fact that the hand which ascertains the amount is the hand of the taxing master does not make these costs for the purposes of the claim in the third party proceedings any less damages—they are damages. Raphael must have the costs of this appeal.

STIRLING, L.J.—This appeal relates to that portion of the judgment of Farwell, J. which relates to the question of indemnity as between the defendant, Bromet, and the third party Raphael. The indemnity was given upon the occasion of the purchase by the defendant from Raphael of certain real estate which was described and known to be subject to certain building restrictions which were stated to be contained in deed of 1854. That deed was not forthcoming, but what was alleged to be a copy of these building conditions was produced by Raphael, and he entered into an agreement to indemnify Bromet, the purchaser, against all costs, damages, and expenses which he might suffer or incur by reason of the building stipulations and conditions affecting the property being other than those set out in the copy. Now, Bromet, the defendant, was minded to build upon his property, and he was brought, in the course of his proceeding to do that, upon referring to the document, to which the indemnity referred, in contact with the liquidator of the company called the Conservative Land Society, who appeared from the copy of the document, which was furnished by Raphael, to have been concerned (it is not necessary to say in what capacity) in the original disposition of the land upon the occasion on which these conditions arose; and, upon communicating with the liquidator, Bromet, the defendant, discovered, at any rate before the 21st Dec. 1901, what were the true building conditions to which the estate was subject, and not only did he do so, but he obtained from the liquidator of the company, which I have treated as being the vendor for the purpose of the building stipulations, a document which purported to release him from adherence to the stipulations contained in the deed of 1854. Having obtained that he proceeded, in Sept. 1902, to build in non-compliance with the actual building stipulations, and also in non-compliance with the stipulations contained in the document furnished by Raphael. Thereupon, a purchaser who was entitled under the building scheme, which is contained in the deed of 1854, brought an action, and that action has succeeded. In his judgment Farwell, J. has held and declared that the defendant Bromet is entitled to an indemnity against Raphael in respect of certain specific matters which I shall mention presently, and also with respect to an indemnity by reason of the defendant being unable to build on the land he bought in accordance with the agreement of the 16th April 1899, which is the indemnity agreement. Now, it is really admitted that if there was a substantial difference between the building stipulations as they appear in the document which was furnished by Raphael and those to which the property is actually subject, that portion of the declaration of Farwell, J. and of the inquiry which is directed in pursuance of it is well founded, and, in my judgment, there is a substantial difference in at least one respect between the conditions as they exist and the conditions which appear in the document referred to by Raphael. That difference is this, that according to the true building conditions as they are now established, and according to the judgment of Farwell, J., the defendant Bromet is precluded from building within 40ft. of the Avenue-road, whereas according to the copy of the document furnished by Raphael the defendant would not have been so precluded. That is quite enough, in my judgment, to entitle the defendant to an inquiry as between him and Raphael as to the damages which have been caused to him by reason of that inability to build, and I say no more on that subject as I agree with the other members of the court in thinking that we ought not to go into a discussion of all the possible questions that may be raised hereafter upon that inquiry. Now, I will say just a few words upon the specific matters as to which Farwell, J. has held that the defendant is entitled to indemnity. First of all he has held that he is entitled to indemnity with respect to the loss or damage which he has sustained by reason of his having built on the land so far as he has built, and by having to remove the buildings pursuant to the order which he has granted. Now, I, with the utmost respect, differ from the learned judge in regard to that inquiry. I do not think that those damages were incurred as the natural and proximate result of the difference which does exist between the actual building conditions and those which are shown in the document furnished by Raphael. It seems to me that the facts show that the defendant, while knowing what the conditions were, went on to build because he thought that the document which he had procured from the liquidator of the Conservative Land Society was an answer to any action which might be brought against him. Therefore for that short reason I think that these damages ought not to have been given to Bromet by Farwell, J., and ought not to be the subject of the inquiry. Then, secondly, Farwell, J. has declared that by virtue of the indemnity Raphael is bound to indemnify the defendant against the costs directed to be paid by him to the plaintiff by the judgment which he has given in the action. I agree with my Lord in thinking that these costs also are not the natural and proximate result of the difference between the two documents which we have to consider, but they are the result of the defendant Bromet proceeding to build in reliance on the document which he obtained from the liquidator of the land society, and in proceeding to build with full knowledge of the true conditions which affected it. Under the circumstances I think the order which is proposed by my Lord is right, and, therefore, the appeal ought to be allowed to this extent.

COZENS HARDY, L.J.—A great point was made by counsel for the respondent that the so-called terms and conditions, or what was called here the warranted copy, did not show any building scheme in the sense of a scheme containing any rights among purchasers inter se. I cannot doubt that purchasers buying under that scheme, apart from anything else, undertook a liability not merely to the vendor, but to the purchasers of other lots. The contrary view would, I think, be attended with great danger to the persons who buy building estates on the faith of a plan with stipulations of this kind. It is said that that doctrine has no application here for two reasons, one is the provisions of clause 23. I do not think that such a clause determines a building scheme. With reference to clause 24, I adopt the view which was thrown out by Stirling, L.J. that that only applies to the unsold portion of the estate and is spent and done with, and has ceased to have any application the moment there has been a sale of any plot to a purchaser. That being so, I think it is clear that there is some liability on the part of Raphael to indemnify the respondent Bromet—a liability in damages. Whether this was a case for the application of the third party order I have very great doubt. I do not think it was, but that really is not open now; that objection was not taken below, and we are bound to consider that the case is properly brought before us under that third party order. Then it sought to make Raphael liable under this peculiar and limited indemnity for the costs of building contrary to the covenant and pulling down the buildings erected by Bromet. I confess I can see no ground for so doing. Nor can I think it would be reasonable to hold that he is liable for the costs of this extremely protracted and expensive litigation, in which, as appears by the order itself, no less than thirteen witnesses were called in a trial extending over three or four days. It cannot be right that the costs of all those issues should be thrown upon Raphael as the indemnifying party; and in giving Bromet the costs proposed by my Lord, we are giving him as much as he is entitled to, and certainly more than he would have obtained in an indemnity action.

[CT. OF APP.]

SMITH v. LEIGH UNION ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Rating—Poor rate—Appeal against assessment—Appearance of assessment committee as respondents—Consent of guardians—Notice to guardians—Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39), s. 2—Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 58), s. 12.

Sect. 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act 1864 provides that the assessment committee of a union may, with the consent of the guardians of such union, after notice shall have been sent to every guardian, appear as respondents to an appeal to quarter sessions against a poor rate.

Sect. 12 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1882 provides that where under the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834, or any of the Acts amending the same, the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians of a union is required, a fourteen days' notice shall be given to each guardian of the meeting at which the resolution giving the consent is passed.

Held, affirming the decision of the King's Bench Division (89 L. T. Rep 607), that sect. 12 of the Act of 1882 does not have reference to sect. 2 of the Act of 1864, and therefore it is not a condition precedent to the power of the guardians to give their consent under sect. 2 of the Act of 1864 that a fourteen days' notice should be given of the meeting at which such consent is given.

APPEAL from the decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) upon a special case stated for the opinion of the court, by the Court of Quarter Sessions for the County Palatine of Lancaster, upon an appeal against a certain poor rate.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The special case is set out in the report of the judgment of the Divisional Court (89 L. T. Rep. 607).

The facts were, shortly, as follows:—

When the appeal was called on for hearing, counsel claimed to appear and be heard on behalf of the assessment committee of the Leigh Union appearing as respondents to the appeal in the name of the guardians of the union.

Counsel appearing on behalf of the appellant called upon the counsel appearing on behalf of the assessment committee to prove that the committee had duly obtained the consent of the guardians to their appearance as respondents to the appeal.

It was then proved or admitted that on the 20th March 1903 the clerk of the committee had sent to each of the guardians a notice that the consent of the guardians to the appearance of the committee as respondents to the appeal would be proposed at the next meeting of the board of guardians; and that at a meeting of the board of guardians on the 25th March following a resolution was passed consenting to the committee appearing as respondents to the appeal.

Counsel for the appellant then contended that under sect. 12 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1882 the notice given by the clerk of the committee to the guardians ought to have been given fourteen days before the meeting of the board, and that, as a fourteen days' notice had not been given, the committee had not fulfilled a condition precedent to their obtaining the consent of the guardians.

Counsel for the assessment committee contended that sect. 12 of the Act of 1882 had no application to a consent of the guardians given under sect. 2 of the Act of 1864.

The Court of Quarter Sessions held that the objection raised on behalf of the appellant must be sustained, and refused to hear counsel for the assessment committee on the merits of the appeal, but agreed to state a case for the opinion of the High Court on the question whether the assessment committee were entitled to be heard.

The Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) held that the preliminary objection was a bad one, and sent the case back to the quarter sessions that the appeal might be heard: (89 L. T. Rep. 607).

The appellant appealed.

The Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39), with reference to an appeal heard by quarter sessions against a poor rate made for any parish contained in any union to which the Union Assessment Committee Act 1862 applies, provides as follows:

Sect. 2. The assessment committee of such union may, with the consent of the guardians of such union, after notice shall have been sent to every guardian, appear as respondents to such appeal, but in the name of the guardians of such union, in like manner and with the same incidents, and subject to the same liabilities, and entitled to the same remedies and rights, as in the case of persons other than the overseers to whom notice of appeal may be given.

Sect. 12. Where, under the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834, or any of the Acts amending the same, the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians of a union, or the managers of a school district, is required, it shall be deemed a sufficient compliance with such requirements if a resolution giving consent is passed at a meeting of the guardians or managers, of which meeting and of the business to be transacted thereat, not less than fourteen days' notice shall be given to each guardian or manager.

A. T. Lawrence, K.C. (Boyle, K.C. and W. Mackenzie with him) for the appellant.—Under sect. 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Act 1864 the assessment committee could not appear as respondents to the appeal without first obtaining the consent of the guardians of the union. Under sect. 12 of the Divided Parishes Act 1882 that consent could not be obtained unless a fourteen days' notice were given to each guardian before the meeting at which the consent was asked for. In fact, the only notice given was a four days' notice, and the assessment committee have therefore failed to comply with the condition precedent to their power of appearing as respondents. It is true that sect. 2 only refers to "the consent of the guardians," whereas sect. 12 refers to "the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians." Two points arise there. First, every consent of the guardians must be in writing. Sect. 15 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76) empowers the poor law commissioners to make rules, orders, and regulations for the guardians, and under the rules and orders that have been made the guardians are bound to keep a clerk, whose duty it is to keep minutes of all resolutions passed at a meeting of the guardians and to enter them in a book, and these minutes are to be signed by the chairman of the next meeting. Secondly, by the proviso of sect. 38 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 no guardian can act as such except as a member and at a meeting of the board. So that the consent of the guardians cannot be given except by a resolution of the majority at a meeting of the board, and such resolution must be reduced into writing. Therefore every "consent of the guardians" must be a "consent in writing of a majority of the guardians." That is the ordinary way in which the guardians must do their business, although there are certain special things as to which the Legislature has made special requirements, as, for instance, with regard to the matters mentioned in sect. 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834. If sect. 2 of the Act of 1864 is not to be construed as referring to a consent given by the guardians in the ordinary way in which they do their business, it must be construed as referring to a consent given by all the guardians. The difficulties of getting such a consent would be such that that construction cannot be the right one. On behalf of the assessment committee it is suggested that sect. 12 of the Act of 1882 has reference only to cases where there is a special legislative enactment that a "consent in writing of a majority of the guardians" must be obtained. As to that, it is to be observed that sect. 12 begins: "Where under the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 or any of the Acts amending the same." It deals with the effect of several Acts taken as a whole, not with any definite section of any particular Act, and only one section—viz., sect. 23 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834—can be pointed out in which the Legislature specifically requires a "consent in writing of a majority of the guardians." Sect. 12 of the Act of 1882 was surely intended to refer to something more than sect. 23. If the Legislature only intended to refer to that section, it would have been simple to have said so. The form of sect. 12 shows that it must be held to apply to something more than sect. 23.

Ryde for the assessment committee.—Sect. 12 of the Act of 1882 has no application to sect. 2 of the Act of 1864, and therefore a fourteen days' notice of the meeting was not necessary here. Sect. 2 does not in terms require the guardians' consent to be in writing. It is true that the guardians are directed to have a clerk whose duty it is to keep minutes of what is done at a meeting of the guardians, and to enter them in a minute-book. Such an entry is evidence of what was in a resolution passed at a meeting, but the consent of the guardians would be given by their passing a resolution. A resolution of the guardians does not become void if the clerk fails to record it. He has no power to annul a resolution of the guardians. Art. 202, which deals with his duties, does not contain negative words, and is therefore not mandatory, but merely directory in character:

R. v. Leicester Justices, 7 B. & C. 6.

Formerly there were several statutory provisions requiring the consent of the guardians in certain cases to be in writing. These were repealed one by one, and then in 1882 the Divided Parishes Act was passed, the object of sect. 12 being to provide one comprehensive enactment applicable to all sections of Acts which require the guardians' consent in writing, instead of dealing with such sections one by one. The object of that section is to remove restrictions. The appellant is seeking to use it to impose restrictions. Further, by making sect. 12 applicable to a consent sought under sect. 2, the assessment committee would have to get the consent of a majority of guardians. This would in effect alter the provisions of sect. 2, which only requires "the consent of the guardians."

A. T. Lawrence, K.C. in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—I have come to the conclusion that this appeal fails. The question arises in this way. The assessment committee of the union appeared as respondents in an appeal to quarter sessions by a ratepayer against an assessment to poor rate. The question is whether they were empowered to do so. Their right to do so depends upon sect. 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act 1864. [His Lordship read the section.] The ratepayer contends that the conditions required by sect. 2 have not been complied with, because, he says, they did not obtain "the consent of the guardians" of the union such as the section requires. To show what is the meaning of the "consent of the guardians," the ratepayer referred to sect. 12 of the Divided Parishes Act 1882, which is as follows: [His Lordship read it.] Under that section he says that a fourteen days' notice should have been given to each guardian before they could give their consent to the application of the assessment committee. Now, that section has reference to cases where the consent "in writing" of a majority of the guardians was necessary, and it substitutes new provisions for the provisions that were formerly applicable in such cases. Therefore, in order to make sect. 12 applicable to the present case, it is necessary to show that "the consent of the guardians" required by sect. 2 of the Act of 1864 is a "consent in writing." As the appellant is the person who is setting up an alleged failure by the assessment committee to see that the conditions precedent to their right to appear have been performed, it lies on him to show that the consent of the guardians can only be given "in writing." Now, sect. 2 itself does not say anything as to the consent being in writing. It only requires the consent to be given, and it is not denied that the guardians did in fact give their consent at one of their meetings. The only question, therefore, is whether it is right to read into sect. 2 a requirement that the consent must be in writing. As I have said, sect. 12 of the Act of 1882 deals only with cases where it was necessary that the consent of the guardians should be in writing, and in those cases it provides new machinery in the place of what has been in existence. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that it is clear, upon a consideration of the older Acts, that under the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 the guardians could not (except in two or three specified cases) act as guardians otherwise than at a meeting which was always subject to the rule that any resolution passed by them must be put into writing and entered by their clerk in a minute-book, so that whatever might be done by them, as guardians, was always done with written evidence of what they had agreed to. It is said, therefore, that, because in every case there is written evidence of what the guardians may have agreed to, it follows that a resolution of the guardians must be in writing, and that when sect. 2 mentions the consent of the guardians it must mean their consent in writing. It seems to me that it would be a very extraordinary thing to introduce a limitation of that sort into an Act of Parliament, not by any express enactment, but by machinery. It would seem to me to be a strained construction, and one not in accordance with the history of the legislation on this matter. Sect. 23 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 provided that it should be lawful for the Poor Law Commissioners, "by any writing under their hands and seal, by and with the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians of any union," to direct the guardians to build a workhouse or to do certain other things. That is a specific enactment that "the consent in writing" of a majority of the guardians is a necessary condition for the doing of the things named in the section. It is imposed as a special condition and not indirectly, by virtue of any rules or regulations or other machinery. That shows that there is a specific class of legislation which for certain things specially requires the consent of the guardians to be given in writing, which is a very different thing from trying to introduce the machinery by which the guardians' consent is ordered to be recorded. But the matter does not stop there. There were formerly other sections in the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 which required the guardians' consent in writing to be given for certain purposes. Those sections were repealed one by one, until at last it was thought that, instead of repealing those provisions in that way, it would be better to sweep away at once any provisions of that kind that might still be left, and to replace them by one uniform procedure. That was the object of sect. 12 of the Divided Parishes Act 1882. That section provides that in cases where the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians had been necessary, it shall in future be sufficient if the procedure there provided is observed. The section refers to cases where the consent in writing was specifically required, not to cases where there was no such requirement. It is also to be noticed that, instead of the consent of a majority of guardians, the consent is to be given by the majority at a meeting. It was argued on behalf of the appellant that sect. 2 of the Act of 1864 provides for "the consent of the guardians" being first obtained, and it is said that the consent of the majority of guardians at one of their meetings is not the same thing as "the consent of the guardians." I do not agree with that view, but I prefer to base my judgment on broader grounds. Sect. 12 of the Act of 1882 is directed to special enactments which imposed as a condition precedent in certain cases the obtaining of the consent of the guardians in writing, and therefore does not have reference to sect. 2 of the Act of 1864. The appellant has therefore failed to show that under sect. 2 it is a condition precedent to the right of the assessment committee to appear as respondents to the appeal that they should have obtained the guardians' consent in writing. The appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. The appellant's suggestion is that the "consent in writing of a majority of the guardians" mentioned in sect. 12 of the Divided Parishes Act 1882 includes the "consent of the guardians" mentioned in sect. 2 of the Union Assessment Committee Act 1864. I cannot agree with that suggestion. It seems to me that the Legislature intended to limit the effect of sect. 12 to the cases expressly mentioned there—i.e., to cases where there were statutory provisions to the effect that the consent of the guardians which had to be obtained must be in writing, and must be the consent of the majority of the guardians. One can see the reasons why the Legislature should have considered that special provisions ought to be made for the cases expressly referred to by sect. 12, because in many cases there would probably be great difficulty in obtaining the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians, and in proving that the consent had been obtained. It was to meet those difficulties that sect. 12 was passed. The section does not deal with the ordinary cases in which nothing more than the consent of the guardians is necessary. Under the Act of 1864 the consent would be one given by the majority of the guardians present and voting at a meeting, and perhaps it would not be absolutely necessary to obtain a majority of the guardians present, because in case of an equal division the chairman might have a casting vote and so make a majority of votes, though there was no majority of persons. If a consent were obtained by such a resolution as that, I doubt if it could fairly be described as a consent in writing by a majority of the guardians, though it were properly entered in the minutes of the meeting. Compare the words in the first part of sect. 12 of the Act of 1882 with the words in the latter part of the section. The first part speaks of "the consent in writing of a majority of the guardians," and the latter part says, "if a resolution giving consent is passed at a meeting of the guardians." Those expressions seem to be contrasted with each other, not used as equivalents. That view is corroborated by the words "it shall be deemed a sufficient compliance." Moreover, if sect. 12 were intended to include and apply to all consents of guardians, why should not the Legislature have said so clearly? I agree that the appeal fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is contended by the appellant that sect. 12 of the Act of 1882 applies to every consent which has to be obtained from guardians. But it applies in terms to cases where the consent must be in writing, and we know that there was a time when for certain purposes such a consent was required by Act of Parliament. It was to get rid of the inconveniences caused by those requirements that sect. 12 was passed; and it only refers to cases of that kind. I think, therefore, that the appellant's contention fails, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

SANDERSON v. COLLINS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bailment—Duty of bailee—Loan of chattel for consideration—Injury to chattel by negligence of bailee's servant—Act of servant outside the scope of his employment—Liability of bailee.

The plaintiff, who was a coachbuilder, lent a carriage to the defendant while the defendant's carriage was being repaired by the plaintiff.

The defendant's coachman, without the knowledge or permission of the defendant, took out the carriage and went for a drive with some friends. In the course of the drive he negligently drove into a tramcar, and the carriage was damaged.

In an action by the plaintiff to recover damages for the injury done to his carriage:

Held, reversing the decision of the Divisional Court (89 L. T. Rep. 42), that, as the defendant had not personally been guilty of any negligence and as his coachman in taking out the carriage had acted outside the scope of his employment, the defendant was not liable to the plaintiff for the damage done to the carriage.

Coupé Company v. Maddick (65 L. T. Rep. 489; (1891) 2 Q. B. 413) distinguished.

APPEAL by the defendant from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.) reversing the decision of the judge of the County Court of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

The plaintiff was a coachbuilder and brought this action in the County Court to recover the sum of 22l. 18s. 6d. for damage done to a four-wheeled dogcart which he had lent to the defendant.

In June 1902 the defendant had sent his dogcart to the plaintiff to be repaired, and the plaintiff had lent a dogcart of his own to the defendant for his use during the time that the defendant's dogcart was being repaired.

On the 30th June 1902 the defendant was out driving in the dogcart that had been lent to him.

On his return home at five o'clock in the afternoon, it was the duty of his coachman to put the dogcart into the coach-house and lock it up. The key of the coach-house was kept in the hall of the defendant's house.

It did not appear clearly whether or not the dogcart was in fact locked up in the coach-house, but that night the defendant's coachman, without the defendant's knowledge or permission, took out the dogcart, put in the horse, and went out for a drive with some friends to see the bonfires that were being lit in honour of the King's Coronation.

Between eleven and twelve o'clock that night the coachman and his friends were all the worse for drink, and he negligently drove into a tramcar and damaged the dogcart.

At the trial of the action the County Court judge in giving judgment said that the case arose out of the wrongful act of the defendant's coachman in taking out the horse and carriage. The carriage belonged to the plaintiff, and had been temporarily lent to the defendant while his own was being mended, and the plaintiff said the defendant ought to pay for the damage. The defendant resisted the claim on the ground that what the servant did was not in the course of his employment, and that there was no negligence on his part. There was no question that the defendant could not be made liable were it not for the decision of the Divisional Court in Coupé Company v. Maddick (65 L. T. Rep. 489; (1891) 2 Q. B. 413). However, he thought he was justified in distinguishing between the two cases, and he did so upon the ground that the defendant's servant, in wrongfully taking the carriage out of his master's stable and damaging it, appeared to him to be doing a tortious act, in respect of which both the plaintiff and the master had a right of action for damages. He therefore gave judgment for the defendant.

Upon the plaintiff's appeal the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.) held that the case of Coupé Company v. Maddick (ubisup.) was indistinguishable, and they therefore reversed the decision of the County Court judge and gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The case is reported 89 L. T. Rep. 42.

The defendant appealed.

Manisty, K.C. (Meynell with him) for the defendant.—The County Court judge was right in holding that the defendant was not liable. The case of Coupé Company v. Maddick (65 L. T. Rep. 489; (1891) 2 Q. B. 413) is distinguishable, or, if it be not distinguishable, I submit that it is wrong and should be overruled. There was no special contract here between the plaintiff and the defendant with regard to the dogcart, and the defendant's liability is therefore that which is ordinarily implied by the law as the liability of a bailee for consideration. It is well established that a bailee such as the defendant is only bound to take reasonable care of the chattel. The County Court judge has found that the defendant was not personally guilty of any negligence, so that the only ground upon which the defendant can here be held liable is the responsibility which a master is under for the acts of his servant. A master is not universally liable for the misdeeds of his servants; he is not responsible for any wilful or malicious injury done by his servant without his knowledge or consent; but only for injuries which are done by the servant in the master's service in the course of his employment:

Sir William Jones on Bailments, p. 89, note 43 to edit. of 1833.

The County Court judge has found that the defendant's coachman was acting tortiously in taking out the dogcart. That is to say, the coachman was not acting in the course of his employment, and his acts, so far as the liability of his master was concerned, were the acts of one who was an entire stranger to his master. The coachman in taking out the dogcart was guilty of conversion, because he took it out of the possession of the defendant. A bailee of goods on hire is not liable for their loss through their being stolen by his servants if he has not been personally guilty of any negligence:

Finucane v. Small, 1 Esp. 315.

The coachman took out the dogcart "on a frolic of his own," as Parke, B. said in Joel v. Morison (6 C. & P. 501), wholly unconnected with his master's business, and his master is not liable for his negligence:

Mitchell v. Crassweller, 20 L. T. Rep. O. S. 237; 13 C. B. 237.

That case was followed in Storey v. Ashton, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 476.

[COLLINS, M.R.—That case and Whatman v. Pearson (18 L. T. Rep. 290; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 422) are on opposite sides of the dividing line.] In Coupe Company v. Maddick (ubi sup.), although the servant was driving for his own purposes at the time when his negligence caused the damage, yet he had been put in control of the carriage by his master and had been told to drive it to a certain place. Here the defendant's servant acted wrongfully in getting control of the carriage. His acts were entirely severable from his employment. He referred also to Mears v. London and South-Western Railway Company, 8 L. T. Rep. 190; 11 C. B. N. S. 850.

Robert Wallace, K.C. and Mundahl for the plaintiff.—The defendant is liable on his contract of bailment for the damage done to the dogcart. He intrusted it to the care of his servant. His servant was not guilty of a conversion of the dogcart. The servant did nothing to deprive the plaintiff of the possession of it. He was merely guilty of a breach of discipline. He was the custodian of the cart for his master. The scope of the coachman's employment was a matter agreed on between the defendant and the coachman, and cannot affect the construction of the contract of bailment made between the plaintiff and the defendant. The construction of that contract is the real point on which this case turns. Decisions on cases of tort are inapplicable to a case of the construction of a contract. A bailee's liability under his contract cannot be lessened by instructions which he may afterwards give to his servant. By his contract he is responsible for injury done to the chattel by negligence—i.e., his own negligence or the negligence of anyone into whose hands he allows the chattel to come. Different considerations apply to the duty of returning a chattel in the condition in which it was handed over and the duty of keeping it with proper care.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is a case of some interest, but it seems to me to be a clear one as soon as one gets to the principles which govern the law of bailment. The defendant was the owner of a carriage which he intrusted to the plaintiff for repair, and during the time occupied by the repairs the plaintiff, as is very commonly done, lent to the defendant a carriage for use in the meantime. That was not an involuntary nor a gratuitous bailment, but a bailment for mutual consideration. Now, the duty of a bailee under such circumstances is well settled, and the law, as laid down by Sir William Jones in his book on Bailments, has had the sanction of many learned writers and judges. The bailee's duty is to take reasonable care—i.e., ordinary care—of the chattel which is the subject of the contract. That is the first principle, and there is no doubt about it. Now, what happened in the case now before us? The defendant had had the dogcart out at three o'clock in the afternoon, and he used it till five o'clock. When he came back it was the duty of the servant to put the dogcart back in the coach-house, the key of which was usually kept in the hall of the defendant's house. Whether or not the dogcart was in fact put inside the coach-house on the afternoon in question is not quite clear. It may perhaps have been left outside. Then later on in the evening the defendant's servant took it out, contrary to orders and purely and solely for his own purposes, and went off "on a frolic of his own" to see the Coronation bonfires. He and some friends he invited to come with him got drunk, and he negligently drove into a tram-car and damaged the dogcart. The dogcart was returned damaged to the plaintiff, who has consequently brought this action against the master of the servant. The County Court judge held that the act of the defendant's servant was not within the scope of his authority, and therefore could not be considered as the act of the defendant. He thus disconnected the defendant from the act of his servant, and, as he found that the defendant was not personally guilty of negligence, he held that the defendant was not liable to the plaintiff for the damage done to the dogcart. That decision was reversed by the Divisional Court chiefly on the authority of Coupe Company v. Maddick (ubi sup.), although Channell, J. said that if the carriage got into the possession of somebody for whose driving the defendant was not responsible, prima facie the carriage would not then be used for purposes contrary to the terms of the bailment, and he instanced the case of a burglar breaking into a stable and stealing the carriage as a case in which the bailee would not be liable unless he had been guilty of negligence in letting the burglar in. The defendant has appealed from the decision of the Divisional Court. Now, it seems to me that the first thing is to clear one's mind as to the facts of the relations existing between the defendant and his servant. The obligation of the defendant as bailee was only to take reasonable care of the thing bailed, and he is bound in that respect for an act of his servant if done in the course of his employment. But his obligation does not extend so as to cover the acts of a person who is not his servant, or the acts of his servant beyond the scope of his authority. If a burglar, or someone who was a stranger to the defendant, had taken the dogcart, and brought it back damaged, the defendant would not be liable, if he was not guilty of negligence, because the act of the stranger was not the defendant's act. There would be no nexus between the defendant and the burglar. If the defendant's coach-house had been negligently left open so as to bring about the taking of the dogcart by the burglar, the defendant might be responsible on the ground of there having been a failure of due care on the part of his servant in leaving the coach house open for which the defendant would be responsible. In the present case the dogcart was not taken out by a burglar, but, so far as the defendant was concerned, the act of the servant was, on the findings of the County Court judge, the same as if it had been the act of a burglar—that is to say, it was the act of a person for whom the defendant was not responsible. The defendant had employed a competent servant and directed him to lock up the dogcart in the coach-house and give back the key. The defendant was not guilty of any negligence. The hypothetical case of a burglar taking out the dogcart is only an instance of something being done with the dogcart not under the mandate of the defendant, and, so far as concerns the defendant's liability here, is just the same as the case of an act done by the defendant's servant outside the scope of his authority. His servant was not a burglar, but he committed an act which broke the nexus between him and his master. The act therefore cannot be considered as an act done by the master—that is, it was not done by a person for whom he was responsible. Therefore, as there was no want of due care on the part of the defendant, I think that he is not liable in this action. That seems to me to be in accordance with the law as laid down in the old cases. With regard to the opinion expressed by the learned judges in the Divisional Court, I think that there is no necessity for us to say whether we think that Coupe Company v. Maddick (ubi sup.) was rightly decided or not. The case seems to me to be clearly distinguishable from the present case. The fact which distinguishes it is a slight one, but it makes all the difference between the two cases. There the act of the servant was within the scope of his authority. His master after driving home in his carriage had told him to take it to his stable, which was 200 yards off. The coachman drove off, but, instead of going directly to the stable, he drove in another direction with a friend whom he picked up. He disobeyed the orders of his master in so doing, but he was driving the carriage under the express mandate of his master. That fact goes to the root of the decision in that case. I do not say whether the decision was a good one in law, but the case is distinguishable from the present case on those grounds. For these reasons I cannot agree with the decision of the court below, and I think that the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with all that my Lord has said, and I desire to add only a few words. It is admitted that no special agreement was entered into as to the defendant's obligations with regard to the dogcart when it was lent to him by the plaintiff. Therefore the question is, What obligation is implied?

In my opinion there was no implied obligation on the defendant to insure the safety of the dogcart. The bailment was an ordinary one made for the mutual benefit of the parties, and the obligation of the bailee in such a case is now well settled to be an obligation to take reasonable care of the chattel. The defendant is not liable unless the damage was caused by his own negligence or by the negligence of his servant in the course of his employment. It is clear that he was not personally guilty of any negligence, and that his servant was not acting in the course of his employment when he took out the dogcart and damaged it. That being so, the defendant is not liable in this action. As regards the authorities, my view is that Coupe Company v. Maddick (ubi sup.) is only supportable on the fact that there the servant was acting in the course of his employment. In so far as the court in that case may have been of opinion that a bailee is liable for damage done to the chattel through the negligence of his servant when acting outside the scope of his employment, I can only say that I think that they were wrong.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the absence of want of reasonable care there was no liability on the defendant for what might happen to the dogcart. The cart was placed by the defendant for certain purposes in charge of his servant, and the defendant was responsible for the servant's negligence within the scope of his employment. No act of conversion of the dogcart, whether by a servant or by anyone else, was contemplated by the parties to the contract of bailment. The servant was guilty of a conversion of the dogcart, and, as there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, he is not responsible to the plaintiff. As to the authorities referred to, I agree with what my Lord has said.

HARSE v. PEARL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance (life) — Want of insurable interest — Void policy — Innocent misrepresentations of insurance agent as to validity of policy — Ignorance of assured — Mistake of law — Recovery back of premiums paid by assured.

The plaintiff was induced to insure his mother's life with the defendant insurance company by the representations of the company's agent that the policy would be a valid one. These representations were made by the agent innocently, and without any fraudulent intent.

In an action by the plaintiff to recover back from the company the premiums he had paid, alleging that the policy was void for want of insurable interest :

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CT. OF APP.]

HARSE v. PEARL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

[CT. OF APP.]

Held, reversing the judgment of the Divisional Court (89 L. T. Rep. 94; (1903) 2 K. B. 92), that, assuming the policy to be void under the Life Insurance Act 1774, yet the misrepresentation of the agent would be a misrepresentation of law, and, the parties being in pari delicto, the plaintiff could not recover in the action.

APPEAL by the defendant company from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.) reversing the judgment of the deputy judge of the Oxford County Court.

The action was brought to recover a sum of 43l. 8s. from the defendants, an insurance company, being the amount of the premiums which the plaintiff had paid to the defendants upon two policies of insurance, the ground of the action being that the policies were void and that there was therefore a total failure of consideration.

The first policy was dated the 29th April 1889, and was a policy for the sum of 10l. 4s. at a weekly premium of 6d., and purported to be granted by the defendants to the plaintiff on the life of the plaintiff's mother Ann Harse.

Under this policy the plaintiff had paid to the defendants premiums which amounted in all to the sum of 12l. 16s.

The plaintiff effected this policy at the suggestion of an agent of the defendant company who had pressed him to insure his mother's life, and in the proposal form the pecuniary interest of the plaintiff in the life insured was stated to be "son for funeral expenses."

The plaintiff's mother had no money of her own, and was living with him and kept house for him.

The second policy was dated the 18th May 1891, and was a policy for the sum of 18l. 12s. at a weekly premium of 1s. It was made out in the name of Ann Harse, the plaintiff's name not being mentioned in it, but it was effected on the suggestion of an agent of the defendant company to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff paid the premiums due under it. Though it was taken out in the name of Ann Harse the plaintiff alleged that it was understood to be for his benefit.

When these policies were taken out the plaintiff knew nothing as to the necessity of his having an insurable interest in his mother's life, and he was induced to take them out on the direct assurance of the defendant company's agents that the policies were valid.

In 1902 the plaintiff was told that the policies were void for want of insurable interest and, his mother being still alive, he brought this action in the Oxford County Court to recover 43l. 8s., the amount he had paid the defendants as premiums on the policies.

At the trial of the action the deputy judge put the following questions to the jury:

(1) In the jury's opinion had the person for whose benefit the assurance was really made a real pecuniary interest under either policy?—Yes. (2) Did the agent in either case make a statement which was false in fact? If so, what was it?—No. (3) Did the agent in either case know that what he was saying was untrue?—No. (4) Was either policy or were both taken out in consequence of what the agent said?—Yes. (5) Did the agent in either case represent that the policy was a good one?—Yes. (6) Were the agents in what they did, or was either of them, guilty of any fraud, and if so in what respect?—No.

The deputy County Court judge said that on the death of the plaintiff's mother, her funeral expenses must practically fall on the plaintiff and there was never any chance of his declining to pay them, and the learned judge therefore held that the plaintiff had an insurable interest in his mother's life, and the policy being a valid one the premiums could not be recovered back. As to both policies he held that even if they were void the premiums could not be recovered back, the representation of the agents as to the validity of the policies being only a representation of law and being made innocently. He therefore gave judgment for the defendant company.

Upon the plaintiff's appeal the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.) held that the fact that the plaintiff would at some future date be under a moral, though not a legal, obligation to pay for his mother's funeral expenses did not give him an insurable interest in his mother's life and the first policy was therefore void; that the second policy was really taken out for the benefit of the plaintiff and was also void; and that, as to both policies, the plaintiff being a person ignorant of the law in insurance matters, was entitled to rely upon the representations made by the defendants' agents that the policies would be good and he was therefore not in pari delicto with the defendants and was entitled to recover back the premiums he had paid.

The case is reported 89 L. T. Rep. 94; (1903) 2 K. B. 92.

The defendants appealed.

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C. and S. T. Evans, K.C. (Parfitt with them) for the defendant company.—First, the two policies are valid. The plaintiff had a pecuniary interest in his mother's life sufficient to satisfy the statutory requirements. His mother had no money of her own, and she was living in his house; so that upon her death he would morally be bound to pay her funeral expenses. It is not necessary that he should be under any legal obligation to pay these expenses. In a case where a County Court judge held that the plaintiff in the action had an insurable interest in the life of a young girl, her half sister, because there was a reasonable probability that in the event of the girl's death there would be nobody to undertake her burial, except the plaintiff, this decision was affirmed by the Divisional Court:

Barnes v. London, Edinburgh, and Glasgow Life Insurance Company, (1892) 1 Q. B. 864.

The second policy was in form taken out by the plaintiff's mother, and was perfectly valid. [Shearman, K.C.—In the court below the case was argued upon the assumption that this policy was in fact made for the plaintiff's benefit, and was void because he had no insurable interest in his mother's life, and because his name does not appear in it.] Assuming that both policies are void as the plaintiff contends, he is, nevertheless, not entitled to succeed in this action. A policy effected by a person who has no insurable interest in the life insured is a wagering policy and void, and premiums paid in respect of it cannot be recovered back. That was so held by Mathew, J.:

Howard v. Refuge Friendly Society, 54 L. T. Rep. 644.

Where money has been paid under an illegal

[CT. OF APP.]

contract which has been partly carried into effect it cannot be recovered back:

Kearley v. Thomson, 63 L. T. Rep. 150; 24 Q. B. Div. 742.

The plaintiff seeks to get out of that by saying that he was induced to enter into the contracts by the misrepresentations of the defendants' agents. If there had been any misrepresentation of fact, the plaintiff would perhaps be entitled to succeed:

Beattie v. Lord Ebury, 30 L. T. Rep. 581; L. Rep. 7 H. L. 102.

But the principle of relief arising out of misrepresentation is not to be extended to a statement of law which turns out to be an incorrect statement:

Rashdall v. Ford, 14 L. T. Rep. 790; L. Rep. 2 Eq. 750.

There is no attempt here to allege fraud, or any misleading of an ignorant man. The case is simply one of a bargain made by two persons of equal knowledge and intelligence. Both parties made a mistake of law. The representation of the agents that the policies would be binding in law is a representation, not of fact, but of law. The belief of the plaintiff in the opinion of the agents as to a point of law, an opinion which turns out to be wrong, is not enough to entitle the plaintiff to recover. This point as to the invalidity of the policies was raised by the plaintiff. The company has never repudiated its liability under them.

Montague Shearman, K.C. and Cecil Walsh for the plaintiff.—The two policies are void. A moral obligation is not enough to create an insurable interest. The second policy is also void, because the plaintiff's name is not inserted in it. In every policy on the life of another the name of the person who is really interested at the time of effecting the policy, or for whose benefit the policy is effected, must be inserted as the person interested; and the omission or erroneous statement of the person interested per se avoids the policy, whether it be a wagering policy or not:

Hodson v. Observer Life Assurance Society, 26 L. J. 303, Q. B.

The policies being void, the plaintiff is entitled to be repaid the premiums he has paid under them. The policies were entered into by the plaintiff relying upon the representations of the defendants' agents that they were valid. It is not an answer to the plaintiff's claim to say that the defendants are willing to pay the sum insured if the plaintiff will go on paying the premiums. The representation that the policies were valid was a representation, not of law, but of fact:

West London Commercial Bank Limited v. Kitson, 50 L. T. Rep. 656; 13 Q. B. Div. 360.

That was an action on a bill of exchange drawn on a company which had no power to accept bills and accepted by the defendants, who were directors of the company, for and on behalf of the company. The defendants were held personally liable, as by their acceptance they represented that they had authority to accept on behalf of the company, which, being a false representation of a matter of fact and not of law, gave a cause of action to the plaintiff, who had acted upon it. In the present case the defendant company, or their directors, must have known that the policies were void, and they cannot protect themselves by sending out an ignorant agent to obtain money by making false statements of law. [ROMER, L.J.—You have not alleged fraud in this action.] The case is on all fours with

British Workman's and General Assurance Company v. Cunliffe, 18 Times L. Rep. 425, 502

[COLLINS, M.R.—It is clear from the report of that case that the ground of the decision in the Court of Appeal was the fraud of the company's agent.]

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court under the following circumstances. The plaintiff effected with the defendant company, through one of their agents, two insurances upon the life of his mother, and it appears that he had no pecuniary interest in her life except such as might arise from the fact that, under the circumstances in which his mother was living, he contemplated that on her death he would have to pay her funeral expenses. He continued to pay the premiums on these insurances for some years, until in point of fact the amount he had paid in premiums exceeded the sum for which his mother's life was insured. In that state of circumstances he bethought himself that the policies were really illegal, and that he was therefore entitled to be repaid the premiums on the ground that there had been a total failure of consideration. Now I will assume, without deciding the question, that the policies were illegal on the ground that the plaintiff had no insurable interest in his mother's life. That question depends upon the Life Assurance Act 1774 (14 Geo. 3, c. 48), sect. 1 of which enacts that "no insurance shall be made by any person or persons, bodies politick or corporate, on the life or lives of any person or persons, or on any other event or events whatsoever, wherein the person or persons for whose use, benefit, or on whose account such policy or policies shall be made, shall have no interest or by way of gaming or wagering; and that every assurance made contrary to the true intent and meaning hereof shall be null and void, to all intents and purposes whatsoever." If the plaintiff's liability to pay his mother's funeral expenses was not an interest in her life within that section, the policies were illegal, and I will assume for the sake of this judgment that that was so. Therefore ex hypothesi the plaintiff has paid money to another person under an illegal contract, and the question is whether he is entitled to recover back what he has paid. Now, the plaintiff says, and the jury have so found, that he was induced to take out the policies by the representation made by the defendants' agent that the policies would be valid. The jury have also found that the agent did not know that this representation by him was untrue. The learned County Court judge held that the representation of the agent as to the validity of the policy having been made innocently the plaintiff was not entitled to recover back the money he had paid. That raises the point which was principally argued before us. Now, the general rule of law is perfectly clear that if one of two parties to an illegal contract pays money under it to the other party he cannot recover it back. If he has deposited the money in the hands of a third person, he may revoke his mandate and claim the money back from the person with whom it is

[CT. OF APP.]

HARSE v. PEARL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

deposited. But when the money has been paid to the other party to the contract, it cannot be recovered. That was decided by my brother Mathew in 1886 with respect to a wagering policy in the case of Howard v. Refuge Friendly Society (51 L. T. Rep. 644). The headnote to the report of that case is as follows: "J. H. effected with the defendant company two policies of insurance on the life of his father J. H.; in which he had no insurable interest; according to the policies the premiums were to be paid by weekly payments. J. H., the son, continued to make these weekly payments for some years. J. H., the father, had at first no knowledge of the insurances effected on his life, but when he became aware of them he objected to their being continued, and gave notice to that effect to the company. J. H., the son, then gave notice to the defendants that the policies were at an end, and claimed the return of the amount of the premiums. The defendants refused to pay, and J. H., the son, brought his action for their recovery, and the County Court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed. Held, on appeal, that, under the circumstances of the case the policies were wagering policies, and consequently the premiums paid in respect of them could not be recovered." That is a clear decision on that part of the case, and now the distinction that arises is a distinction based on what the agent said. Now, we begin this discussion with an illegal contract. The plaintiff being party to an illegal contract is prima facie debarred from recovering any money paid under that contract to the other person. But it is said that, by reason of what happened between him and the agent, he is relieved from that rule of law. What was said by the agent in this case to begin with was a representation not of fact, but of law. It was a statement of opinion that the policies were valid. That seems to me to be a statement not of fact, but a statement of law, the general law of the land in relation to insurances; and it has been found as a fact that that statement was made innocently. Taking those two things together, we have a statement of law made innocently to a person who was desirous of entering into an illegal contract—a contract which, if he makes it, carries with it the consequences that he cannot recover any money he pays under it. How is his position altered by the fact that the other person told him that, in his opinion, the contract was not illegal, innocently told him so, believing what he said to be true. It seems to me that unless you can introduce some circumstances of oppression or fraud, or some difference in the position of the parties, which threw the person who made the statement into some fiduciary relation to the plaintiff so as to make it inequitable for him to insist upon keeping the bargain which had been made with the plaintiff, unless you can get those elements in, elements which in a court of equity would be considered either fraud or equivalent to fraud, the party to an illegal contract has to submit to the loss of whatever he has paid under it. That is perfectly clear. Now, I do not say that the jury might not here, if the evidence had supported it, have found that the plaintiff's relations to the agent were such as to bring him within that class of cases where money has been obtained from another person by fraud, duress, or oppression of some kind; but there is no evidence here at all of that, and the jury have not found that, but they have found that this was an innocent statement of what the agent believed to be the law. There is no evidence of fraud or oppression, and there is certainly no finding of fraud or oppression, and we cannot assume it. All we have is that the plaintiff, whether he knew it or not, was a deliberate party to the contract, and was under no misapprehension as to the nature of the contract which he was making, though he may not have known what the law about it was. Nevertheless, what he was intending was clearly a contract forbidden by law, with the consequence that money paid under it cannot be recovered back. He seeks to get out of that position by saying that he acted on the advice of a person who told him to the best of his opinion what he believed to be the law, though there is no evidence, as I have said, of any oppression or any fraud having been practised upon him. Under these circumstances, in my judgment, he cannot recover back, and I think there is clear authority for that proposition in the case of British Workman's and General Assurance Company v. Cunliffe (ubi sup.). In that case it had been held in the court below that the money could be recovered back where it had been paid by a person relying upon the statement of the agent of the insurance company that the policy would be valid. That case came up to this court, and the decision of the court below was affirmed, but on the ground that the statement made by the agent on which the person seeking to recover back the money had acted was fraudulently made. The Court of Appeal expressly put their decision on that ground. To that degree they certainly qualify, or do not adopt at all events, the grounds of the judgment in the court below. It seems to me, therefore, both on the general law, and on the special authority in this court, the plaintiff in this case fails, and, therefore, I think the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J. — I am of the same opinion. Assuming that these two policies are void on the ground of illegality, it is clear that the plaintiff cannot recover the premiums which he has paid unless he can make out that he was not in pari delicto with the defendant company. Can it be said that he has established that? He relies on the statements alleged to have been made by the defendants' agent when the policy was effected. Now, as to those statements it is clear, in my opinion, that there was no misstatement of fact on the part of the agent. Further than that, it is clear that there was no fraud of any kind. The present case is not one of oppressor and oppressed, nor is it a case in which advantage has been taken by a clever man of an ignorant man. In fact, there is here no impropriety of any kind beyond the fact that the agent, like the plaintiff, appears to have forgotten or to have mistaken the law. As to the mistake of law, it is clear, as far as I can see, that they both made it. From the findings of the jury it appears that the agent believed the policies to be valid. So also did the plaintiff. In that respect they were equally guilty; their guilt, such as it was, consisting in their forgetting, or being ignorant of, or mistaking the law. There was no greater impropriety on the part of the agent than there was on the part of the plaintiff. But did the statements of the agent, statements which, in my opinion, were only made as to the law, put him or the defendant company in a worse position than the plaintiff? I do not think that a misstatement as to the law in such a case as the present makes that difference. The case is one in which both parties to the contract ought to know the law; they are contracting on an equal footing, and are presumably persons of equal intelligence. It cannot, in my opinion, be laid down by this court as a principle of law that where a policy is effected with an insurance company, its agents must be treated, without more and without any special evidence, as being under a greater obligation to know the law than the persons whom they approach for the purpose of effecting the policies. Here it is clear to my mind that no fraud of any kind can be imputed. In fact, no case of fraud has been raised against the defendants, nor can it be said that they were in any way bound to appoint as agents persons having some special knowledge of the law. Under those circumstances it appears to me that for the purposes of this case the plaintiff and the defendants' agent must be taken to have been in pari delicto in the matter of effecting the policy, and the defendants cannot stand in a better or worse position than their agent. I say they are not in a worse position because there is no evidence that shows that any other agent of the defendants ever made such misstatement or was ever guilty of impropriety with reference to a transaction of this sort. On these grounds I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have very little to add. I think that this policy was illegal. Though it be an illegal contract, the plaintiff says that its illegality ought not to be set up as an answer to his claim because of the misrepresentation made by the defendants' agent that it was a valid policy. The answer to that is that the misrepresentation was made innocently, and it was a misrepresentation as to the law. A representation as to law is not on the same footing as a representation of a matter of fact. It has been pointed out that the representation made by the agent was not alleged to have been fraudulent. There is no ground whatever for imputing either to the agent or to the defendants any intention of misleading the plaintiff. With reference to the parties being in pari delicto, it was suggested by the plaintiff that this is the case of a great company imposing on an illiterate man. But we know that these policies of life insurance are largely effected through agents who are as humble and illiterate as those whom they approach for the purpose of getting them to effect the policies. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Jan. 30 and Feb. 9.

(Before KEKEWICH, J.)

Re SHEPHARD; GEORGE v. THYER. (a.)

Husband and wife—Presumption in favour of a valid marriage—Long-continued open cohabitation—Ceremony—Foreign marriage—Recognition—Strict proof.

Where there is clear proof that English persons intended to be married to one another, some evidence of a ceremony by way of a French marriage de facto, and of recognition of them afterwards as man and wife by their families and by them of their children as legitimate, during a long course of years, the court will not require strict proof of the marriage, even upon the assumption that to contract marriage in France in the manner alleged was not in accordance with the habits of law-abiding people there.

The offspring of such a union held therefore entitled to share in a gift under a will to "children."

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The substantial question arising upon this originating summons was whether the presumption of law in favour of a state of marriage existing between cohabiting persons rather than a condition of concubinage was rebutted in the following circumstances:—

Mrs. Ann Priscilla Shephard by her will, dated the 13th Dec. 1897, bequeathed her residuary estate to trustees, one of whom was the plaintiff, Richard J. George, and directed them to pay two-thirds thereof "to and in equal shares between all such of the children of the said George Allen as shall be living at my decease." Testatrix died on the 7th July 1902, and her will was proved by plaintiff on the 23rd Aug. 1902.

At the date of Mrs. Shephard's decease the George Allen mentioned in her will had five children living by his first wife, to whom he was married in the year 1860, and who died in the year 1870. The remaining six defendants to the summons also claimed to be the children of G. Allen. The five defendants, children of his first marriage, had supplied evidence of that marriage and of their births. The plaintiff, as executor and trustee of A. P. Shephard, called on the six remaining defendants to prove the second marriage of G. Allen, the question raised by the summons being what persons were entitled under the residuary gift in the testatrix's will.

The certificates of birth of the six defendants, the surviving younger children, were produced to the plaintiff, George Allen being registered in them as the father and "Elizabeth Allen, formerly Williams," as the mother.

George and Elizabeth Allen had filed a joint affidavit, upon which each of them was cross-examined in open court. In this affidavit they swore they were intermarried at some town in France in 1873. Its name they did not recollect. The effect of this evidence is alluded to in the judgment of Kekewich, J., and was, shortly, as follows: George Allen being a widower in 1873, and having formed an intimacy with Elizabeth Williams, they wished to be married, but did not wish their marriage to be known until some time after it had taken place. E. Williams' brother was master of a Channel steamer, and it was arranged that they should proceed on board his vessel to France in order to be married quietly there. Accordingly in that year they travelled from Falmouth on board this John Williams' vessel to a port in France. On arrival they went some distance in the country by train and were married, the details having been arranged by J. Williams' fiancée, who was a governess in France. They neither remembered the names of the port of landing nor of the town where they were married, and they knew no French. The governess had died long since, and J. Williams had not been heard of for a long time. No clergyman officiated at the wedding, but there were two or three gentlemen besides the governess present at the alleged ceremony, which probably took place at a registry office. No priest officiated, nor was a register signed. E. Williams herself put on a ring, and what purported to be a certificate of marriage was given to George Allen, which he had since lost. He was not acceptable to her family, and a child was born six months after their marriage. They returned on board Williams' ship to Plymouth, and from three weeks after, and ever since, had always lived together, and had nine children, six of the defendants to the summons being the survivors. George Allen, being a policeman, stationed at Devoran, in Cornwall, reported his marriage to the police superintendent, and an entry of it appeared in the police register, but by mistake the marriage was there stated to have taken place at Devoran. Various reasons—such as an accident causing loss of memory, and excitement—were given by them for not remembering the French towns they visited.

(a) Reported by W. P. PAIN, Esq., Barrister at Law.

On behalf of the six last defendants affidavits were filed with the object of showing that testatrix regarded them as the lawful children of G. Allen, and their mother, Elizabeth Allen, as lawfully married to him. One of them had at her request lived with testatrix, who was G. Allen's "sister," both being born out of wedlock; moreover, testatrix had in a letter to her signed herself "your loving aunt," and had given her and her brothers and sisters numerous presents.

On the other hand, some of the children of the first marriage, who now for the first time disputed the validity of the second marriage, filed affidavits in support of that view, the most relevant fact stated therein being that G. Allen had since the institution of these proceedings stated to one of these that he was not married.

J. M. Gover, for the trustee, submitted the case to the court.

A. H. Jessel for the six surviving younger children.—After long continued cohabitation as man and wife, the law raises a presumption in favour of a valid marriage having taken place between them:

The Breadalbane case; Campbell v. Campbell, L. Rep. 1 H. L. Sc. 182, per Lord Cranworth, at pp. 199, 200.

Sufficient evidence has been given in this case to found the presumption, and the onus lies upon the other side to rebut it:

Re v. Inhabitants of Stockland, Barr. Settlement Cases, 508.

The court will not readily take away the status of legitimacy from the children:

St. Devereux v. Much Dew Church, 1 Sir W. Blacks. 366, per Lord Mansfield, L.C.J., at p. 367.

Though strict proof of the marriage would be the register, or an examined copy of it, with evidence of the identity of the parties, yet it may be proved by persons present at the ceremony, and the husband and wife are competent witnesses:

Standen v. Standen, Peake's N. P. Cas. 45.

The jactitation suit arising out of a Fleet marriage (Hervey v. Hervey, 2 Sir Wm. Blacks. 877), where the Court of Delegates upheld a marriage before Lord Hardwicke's Act, though no actual proof of it was forthcoming, where the parties lived together as man and wife for eighteen years, and there was evidence of acknowledgment by the husband's family, was mentioned by Hall, V.C. in Lyle v. Ellwood (L. Rep. 19 Eq. 98), and no distinction taken on account of the nature of the suit. There is a strong presumption in favour of the validity of a marriage once the intention to contract one is shown:

Piers v. Piers, 2 H. L. Cas. 331, per Lord Cottenham, L.C., at pp. 362, 368, and 369.

Lord Campbell also, at pp. 379, 380 of the same case, alludes to the presumption in favour of marriage as one which can only be negated by disproving every reasonable probability. In Re v. Inhabitants of Stockland (ubi sup.), thirty years' cohabitation was held sufficient to found the presumption. So in the present case there was sufficient evidence to found the presumption, and it must be rebutted.

E. Beaumont for four children of the first marriage.—The cases relative to Scotch marriages and English marriages before Lord Hardwicke's Act, stand upon a different footing from the present case. I ask for leave to cross-examine the parties on their affidavits.

His Lordship gave leave for the examination to take place in open court.

Feb. 9.—E. Beaumont [after the cross-examination of George and Elizabeth Allen].—I submit that on George Allen's own evidence the presumption comes to naught. Your Lordship asks me to prove a negative. My point is that the law of France is so extremely full upon the points of residence, consents, publicity, and notice, that when this man comes forward and tells the court under what circumstances he was married, the court will not listen to his evidence as proving his marriage. I tender a French advocate as witness that this ceremony, as alleged, could not have taken place in France. According to the practice there it is impossible that this could have taken place. There must be publicity. In Sastry Velaidier Aronegary v. Sembeccutty (44 L. T. Rep. 895; 6 App. Cas. 364) the "rice custom"—an ordinary formality for celebrating marriage in Ceylon—was gone through. The court must have regard to the evidence given to-day.

Re SHEPARD; GEORGE v. THYER.

[CHAN. DIV.]

E. Ford, for one child of the first marriage, adopted the last argument.

KEKEWICH, J.—No one who has listened, however cursorily, to this case can doubt that it is a case of considerable difficulty and peculiarity. Having now heard the evidence to-day, I am prepared to give judgment at once and without hesitation, and it is the examination here to-day, leave to hold which was granted really for the instruction of the court, and not merely, as has been suggested, by way of indulgence to Mr. Beaumont, which has enabled me to dispose of the case. It is a very singular story. George Allen was, in 1873, a widower with seven children. It is said that he desired to be married to Elizabeth Williams, and that she wished to be married to him. That is beyond doubt. They had been living together and there had been intimacy between them which made an early marriage extremely desirable. He was in the police force, and he knew that he should have to report his marriage to the chief constable. He did not intend to avoid that, and he apparently did not intend to conceal his marriage, but he did not wish anybody to know it until after the marriage had taken place. That is the weak point of his story. If he meant to live with her ultimately, I do not know why he did not go to the parish church instead of to France to be married, he did not know how or where. Nor is it easy as regards the wife—except that she desired to be married and, that being the desire on her part, was actuated by a reasonable wish to please her intended husband—and I can the more easily conceive her consenting to go to France to be married than his wishing to take her. She had relations who were “not agreeable.” I understand that to mean that they knew that she had been on very friendly terms with George Allen—whether they knew more does not appear—and they did not care for him as part of the family. She was content that the marriage should take place under the circumstances, not to be disclosed, in fact, until accomplished. That being the state of affairs before they started, Elizabeth Williams had a brother, captain of a merchantsteamer. His name was Johnny Williams. He was engaged to a governess in France, and either Johnny Williams or this lady suggested this marriage in France. How much was resolved on it is impossible to say. According to the cross-examination of Mr. and Mrs. Allen, who were cross-examined with proper severity, there is no doubt that it was arranged that these two should go in Johnny Williams’ ship to France, and that they left Falmouth, stayed for a short time, and came back to Plymouth. What they did in France it is very difficult to ascertain. On the evidence, they went somewhere in accordance with an arrangement made by the intended sister-in-law—they went somewhere where they went through something purporting to be a ceremony of marriage. There was a ring put on by the lady herself not very formally. There was some kind of ceremony, and there was something like an acknowledgment of their being husband and wife. They both agree that there was something in the form of a certificate given them, in what names they cannot tell. What it was, it is difficult to say, and I think it will be safer to leave it out of the question. It is not likely to have been in English;

neither of them know what it was like. They tell a long story about producing it to the chief constable of the county, and somehow or another the certificate was lost and is not forthcoming. We had better leave it out of consideration. They came home and shortly afterwards lived together as husband and wife. There seems to have been some reason for not doing so during the first two or three weeks. They have lived together as husband and wife up to the present time—that is, for thirty years. She has borne several children, whose claim I am considering. There is some evidence on the affidavits of recognition by the family, and there was some given in the witness-box to-day. It is not strong, and might be severely criticised. The question is whether, under these circumstances, I ought to require strict evidence of the marriage before I admit the children to share in the property which has been given to the children of George Allen. Counsel on behalf of the elder children wished to call evidence of a French expert to prove the impossibility of this man and this woman having been married in France in the way alleged. To avoid controversy, I have asked him to assume that this marriage, as alleged, was impossible according to French law, and according to the habits of law-abiding people in France. Beyond that the evidence of an expert could not possibly go. And no one can say that persons might not have met together in a room, and purported to marry them, and go through certain ceremonies, and even give them some certificate. But I will assume, as I repeat, that it was impossible, according to the law of France and the habits of law-abiding people in France, that the marriage as alleged should take effect. Now, what is the proper conclusion? There are many cases where the fact of marriage has been made a great deal of. If we start from the fact of marriage, the presumption arising from cohabitation is exceedingly strong. There are other cases which go very much on the recognition of the children and wife, or more often of the children, and point to that as strengthening the presumption in favour of a valid marriage. But counsel argues that, in the first place, the old law has been largely abrogated by the greater facilities afforded for proof since the establishment of registries; and, secondly, he says that the other cases cited are to a great extent dependent on Scotch law, under which, even at the present day, there are facilities for irregular marriages. But, as I pointed out just now, this case in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, decided in 1881, negatives both these arguments. So far as I know, it is the last case. There we have a case decided in quite modern times, long after all that legislation in favour of publicity and registries, and also it is free from the Scotch law. It was from Ceylon, and no doubt in the judgment there is a most interesting discussion of the law of Ceylon and the people called Tamils; but what was said by Sir Barnes Peacock (44 L. T. Rep., at p. 896) was this: “It appears from the authorities which he (Dr. Phillimore) cited that, according to Roman-Dutch law, there was a presumption in favour of marriage rather than of concubinage. It does not, therefore, appear to their Lordships that the law of Ceylon is different from that which prevails in this country—namely, that where a man and a woman are proved to have lived together as man and wife, the law will presume, unless the contrary be clearly proved, that they are living together in consequence of a valid marriage, and not in a state of concubinage." And later on he alludes to Piers v. Piers (ubi sup.), where there was a reference to Morris v. Davies (5 Cl. & Fin. 163). So that I have here the decision of a high authority getting rid of the fact of marriage and the recognition of children. It does not show that either of these is essential, but the fact that the parties were living together as man and wife for a time was, coupled with other facts, there held sufficient to establish the marriage. If that was enough to support the presumption there, so it is here. I have the intention of marriage. About that there is not a shadow of doubt. I have some evidence about which there is a great deal of doubt. There is a somewhat romantic story, which is certainly doubtful in some of its details, as to a marriage de facto, of something gone through to perfect the intention of marriage. And then I have some evidence of recognition of children afterwards. And now, after thirty years, the court is asked to say that because the marriage has not been proved, and cannot be proved, the children of George Allen are not entitled to share. To hold that would go against the authorities. I must therefore hold that they are entitled to share in the bequest to his children.

Re HOUGHTON (deceased); HAWLEY v. BLAKE. (a)

Administration—Claim on estate—Compromise by executor of co-executor's claim—Parties acting honestly and reasonably—Trustee Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 21—Judicial Trustees Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 3.

Acting co-executors are seised of their office per mie et per tout, and where one of them, acting honestly and reasonably and to avoid the expense of litigation, has allowed the whole claim of his co-executor upon the estate of their testator such compromise will be upheld.

ORIGINATING SUMMONS.

The question on this adjourned summons taken out by residuary legatees under the will, dated the 23rd Feb. 1889, of the testator, Charles Houghton, who died on the 1st April 1894, was as to the effect to be given to an allowance of a claim by one executor upon the estate of their common testator by the other proving executor, where the parties acted honestly and reasonably.

Testator, C. Houghton, gave a life interest in his property to his wife Esther, and directed that, after her death, it should be realised and the net proceeds divided between his nephews and nieces therein specified, two of whom were the applicants, and appointed the defendants John S. Blake and Ferdinand Houghton, with his wife, executors, but his will was proved on the 1st May 1894 by John S. Blake and his widow alone, leave being reserved to the defendant F. Houghton to prove, which power he had not exercised.

Esther Houghton, the widow of the testator, died on the 7th June 1902 leaving a will dated the 25th July 1901, under which her nephew, the defendant J. S. Blake, was sole executor.

In May 1903 the executors of the will of the testator, represented by the defendant J. S. Blake, delivered an account to the residuary legatees, including the plaintiffs, from which they alleged that they first learned that Esther Houghton, claiming to be a creditor of the testator for 1180*l.*, had, shortly after his death, appropriated, with the concurrence of her co-executor, the defendant J. S. Blake, certain securities standing in the name of the testator and also a portion of a debt due to his estate.

The material portions of such account read as follows on the credit side:

April 1, shares, &c., allocated to Mrs. Houghton in discharge of moneys belonging to her separate estate, and lent to the deceased, (see contra) 1180*l.*

On the debit side were particulars of various shares, and 155*l.* "cash proportion of a debt," the shares being stated to be "allocated to Mrs. Houghton at current price in part discharge of 1180*l.* due to her as per contra."

The gross estate of the testator amounted to 2208*l.*

At an interview between J. S. Blake and his aunt, E. Houghton, shortly after testator's death, E. Houghton, as he alleged, took a number of securities from a safe and stated to him that they did not all belong to her husband, but that a great deal of the money they represented was hers, and came partly from her father and partly from her mother, through her father, amounting in all to the sum of 1180*l.*, and she also showed him a memorandum of four items making up such sum.

J. S. Blake consulted a solicitor as to the matter, who had unfortunately since died. He also spoke to his father, who was the personal representative of the relatives of Esther Houghton, from whom the amounts mentioned in the memorandum were derived, with reference to the statements made by his aunt, and he confirmed those statements, and showed the defendant Blake the receipts in his possession as such personal representative for the several sums.

Particulars as to the dates on which the items composing the 1180*l.* were advanced to the testator had been supplied to the Inland Revenue authorities by the solicitor to his estate in June 1894, together with a statement that the money in question was Mrs. E. Houghton's share of her father's estate, and other evidence was given which rendered it probable that Esther Houghton might have been so entitled to the amounts in question, and as to 820*l.* thereof for her separate use. Under these circumstances J. S. Blake, as one of the executors of C. Houghton, did not object to her claim against the testator's estate being admitted, and to her being allowed to retain the securities mentioned in the account delivered to the residuary legatees.

The summons asked for an inquiry and a consequent direction thereupon that all moneys, shares, and property retained by Esther Houghton, deceased, out of the estate of the testator in alleged discharge of moneys alleged to be owing to her from him might be paid or transferred by the defendant J. S. Blake, as executor of E. Houghton, deceased, into the names of himself and the defendant F. Houghton, to be applied as part of the residuary estate of the testator.

Christopher James for the plaintiffs.—This is the case of a claim by one executor upon the estate of their common testator being admitted by another executor, and, without impugning the power of a personal representative to compromise claims of strangers upon his testator's estate, what has been done here is invalid against the residuary legatees. There is no authority for the proposition that an executor can compromise a claim of his co-executor. I submit there is no such power. Sir Barnes Peacock, in the case before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, De Cordova v. De Cordova (41 L. T. Rep. 43; 4 App. Cas. 692) states that there is no decision as to one executor compromising his co-executor's debt (at p. 45). So that up to that date there was no authority that such compromises are valid. There the compromise was injurious to the estate, so here the compromise was unfair and not beneficial to the testator's estate. Both executors receive a certain sum, and they want a discharge. What follows in the judgment in De Cordova v. De Cordova (ubi sup.) relates to compromises between executors and other debtors to the estate. Here one executor made a claim and another admitted it, and there is no evidence of the independent executor doing anything in relation to the compromise. The two admit the claim of one.

Warrington, K.C. and Theodore Ribton, for the defendants, contended that this was a compromise within the powers of an executor under the Trustee Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 21. [They were stopped by the Court.]

KEKEWICH, J.—This is a claim by beneficiaries under the will of Charles Houghton to a sum of 1180*l.* received by the widow, Esther Houghton, and for which, if that be so, the estate of Esther Houghton became accountable, and the summons asks, if necessary, for administration of her estate for that purpose. As regards 820*l.* receipts have been produced which clear the matter up entirely. There is no doubt that 820*l.* really belonged to Esther Houghton. The story is a curious one. Esther Houghton was the widow of Charles Houghton. John S. Blake was with her executor of Charles Houghton, and on Charles Houghton's death Esther Houghton, the widow, produced a number of securities, but said that they did not all belong to her husband's estate, but some belonged to her amounting altogether to 1180*l.* Blake went into the matter more or less, but eventually he did not object to her claim, but allowed her to retain the securities. It is said he did wrong, and that therefore the money is now recoverable from him as executor of Esther Houghton, which he also happens to be. The real question is whether Blake, as one of the executors of Charles Houghton's will, could compromise the claim with Esther Houghton by allowing it in full. I use the word "compromise" advisedly. In one sense there was no compromise, because, the whole claim being allowed, there was no give and take about it. Esther Houghton had all she claimed, and in that sense there was no compromise. But the widow had possession of the securities, and they could not have been got from her without discussion and possibly litigation. It was entirely for those representing the estate to say whether the delay and expenses of litigation should be incurred or whether the claim should be acceded to. I therefore think what happened was properly called a compromise. Very little was given up, and there was reason when once you get the possibility of litigation and its consequences. There being no question about the honesty of the parties, was it competent for Blake, as one of the two executors, to admit the claim of his co-executor, particularly when the co-executor was the widow of the testator? In my opinion, the fact that the co-executor was the testator's widow made no difference. It is not disputed that one of two executors can compromise with a stranger. This power of compromise is a common law power. There is also statutory authority for it, but the statute really adds nothing to the common law powers, which have been recently recognised in Re New's Settlement; Langham v. Langham (85 L. T. Rep. 174; (1901) 2 Ch. 534) in the Court of Appeal. Executors are seized of their office per mis et per tout, each of them representing the estate for all purposes. In my opinion it would be an infringement of the rule to say that an executor cannot compromise a claim of his co-executor. But the position is a delicate one, and I think that an executor in that position would do well to come to the court for its sanction before entering into a compromise of this kind. As regards the Judicial Trustee Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 3, I have no doubt that he acted honestly, and I have no doubt that he acted reasonably. Therefore, whether I take the case on his executorial power, or whether I take only the last statute to which I have referred, it seems to me that I must uphold the executor as having done what is right. There will be a declaration that 1180*l.* was properly allowed to Esther Houghton out of the testator's estate. Costs of all parties to be paid out of the estate; those of the defendant Blake to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

Husband and wife—Policy of the law—Post-nuptial settlements by husband—Trusts for his wife "so long as she shall continue the cohabiting wife or the widow" of husband—Condition—Limitation.

trusts during the natural life of the wife or so long as she should continue the cohabiting wife or the widow of the husband, to pay the income to the wife for her separate use, and from the decease of the wife in the lifetime of the husband, or from and after the dissolution of the marriage or judicial separation between them, a protected life interest in the annual proceeds was given to the husband, with a provision for the maintenance of their children. The deed contained an ultimate trust of the corpus of the trust premises in default of children in favour of the next of kin of the husband. There was also a power of advancement during the joint lives and the subsistence of the marriage with the joint consent of the husband and wife and, after her decease or after the dissolution of their marriage or a judicial separation between them, with the consent of the husband.

The wife separated from her husband in 1889 and had never lived or cohabited with him afterwards, and he became bankrupt in 1890 but the bankruptcy was annulled in 1896.

The question having arisen whether, although the wife was no longer in fact "the cohabiting wife" of the husband, the trust in her favour was still subsisting, on the ground that the settlor had attempted to fetter her interest in a manner which was contrary to public policy:

Held, that the gift of the life interest to the wife was by way of limitation, and was not a gift defeasible on the performance or non-performance of a condition, and that being so long as she cohabited with her husband, it was a gift rather in favour of morality than against it, and upon the proper construction of the settlements it must be held good.

Per Kekewich, J.: "Policy of the law" ought not to be impressed into the service of highly improbable contingencies.

THE question on this adjourned summons, which was directed to be reargued, was, who was entitled to rents accrued and accruing under certain post-nuptial settlements in the following circumstances.

The defendant Emily M. Hope-Johnstone, had been married once only—namely, to her present husband, the defendant William J. Hope-Johnstone—on the 17th Feb. 1877.

By settlement, dated the 11th April 1877, the defendant William J. Hope-Johnstone, in consideration of his natural love and affection for his wife the defendant Emily M. Hope-Johnstone, assigned to trustees (now represented by the three plaintiffs Charles G. Hope-Johnstone, James K. A. Knapperton, and Robert E. Campbell) certain leasehold premises, subject to subsisting mortgages and underleases, upon trust during the natural life of the defendant Emily M. Hope-Johnstone, "or so long as she shall continue the cohabiting wife or the widow of the said William J. Hope-Johnstone," to pay the annual proceeds to Emily M. Hope-Johnstone for her own separate and inalienable use, her receipts, or those of her appointees, to be a good discharge. And from and after the decease of Emily M. Hope-Johnstone in the lifetime of William J. Hope-Johnstone, or from and after the dissolution of their marriage, or judicial separation between them, upon trust as to the annual proceeds for William J. Hope-Johnstone until his decease, for a restricted life interest defeasable on bankruptcy, insolvency, or alienation, and thenceforth for the maintenance of the children of the defendants, William J. Hope-Johnstone and Emily M. Hope-Johnstone, with various trusts as to the annual proceeds in default of children, a trust of the corpus of the trust premises in favour of such children in default of appointment by their parents during their joint lives, with an ultimate trust for the next of kin of William J. Hope-Johnstone. The indenture contained a power of advancement of children, during the joint lives, and the subsistence of their marriage, with the joint consent in writing of the defendants William J. Hope-Johnstone and Emily M. Hope-Johnstone, or after the dissolution of their marriage or a judicial separation between them, with his consent in writing, and after the decease of William J. Hope-Johnstone, in the lifetime of Emily M. Hope-Johnstone if their marriage should be then subsisting, with her consent during widowhood, the powers of sale of the trust premises, and of appointment of new trustees, and of varying trust securities being guarded in a similar way.

By another indenture of settlement dated the 1st Dec. 1880, other leasehold premises were, subject to the mortgages subsisting thereon, settled upon similar trusts, and subject to the like powers and provisions as were contained in the settlement of the 11th April 1877.

The six other defendants to the summons were the only children of the marriage.

A moiety of certain leasehold premises was the only property remaining subject to the trust of the two settlements.

On the 21st Dec. 1889 a receiving order in bankruptcy was made against William J. Hope-Johnstone, and on the 21st Jan. 1890 he was adjudicated a bankrupt.

In April 1896 the bankruptcy was annulled, William J. Hope-Johnstone having obtained the court's approval to a composition scheme.

In March 1889 the defendant E. M. Hope-Johnstone separated from her husband, the defendant W. J. Hope-Johnstone and had never lived or cohabited with him since that date.

MacSwinney, for the trustees, stated the case.

Martelli, for the defendant E. M. Hope-Johnstone, asked that the words "or so long as she shall continue the cohabiting wife or widow of the said W. J. Hope-Johnstone" might be struck out of the settlement on grounds of public policy. Provisions for a contemplated event which the law abhors have been frequently held void on this ground not only in contracts but under limitations in wills:

H. v. W., 3 K. & J. 382.

Such a voluntary settlement as this by a husband upon his wife is bad according to this authority. Turner, L.J. in Cartwright v. Cartwright (3 De G. M. & G. 982), which was the case of an ante-nuptial settlement providing for the event of separation (at p. 991), refers to these conditions in language which does not limit the application of the principle to cases of contract or agreement, but extending, as in Egerton v. Brownlow (4 H. L. Cas. 1)—ex. gr., to wills. There are other cases to the same effect:

Merrycather v. Jones, 10 L. T. Rep. 62; 4 Giff. 509; Re Moore; Trafford v. Maconochie, 59 L. T. Rep. 681, per Cotton, L.J.; 39 Ch. Div. 116.

CH. DIV.] Re HOPE-JOHNSTONE'S TRUSTS; HOPE-JOHNSTONE v. HOPE-JOHNSTONE. [CH. DIV.]

The leading case is Westmeath v. Salisbury (5 Bli. N. S. 339), where the House of Lords was dealing with post-nuptial settlements by the husband on his wife. The same considerations apply to ante-nuptial and post-nuptial settlements. The subject-matter of these settlements being leaseholds there was valuable consideration:

Price v. Jenkins, 37 L. T. Rep. 51; 5 Ch. Div. 619.

I assert the broad proposition that if there is a provision contrary to public policy it must be struck out. If your Lordship is against me on that point then I say that, having regard to the form of the gift over, the wife remained a cohabiting wife, within the meaning of the settlement, until there was either a dissolution of the marriage or a judicial separation. The settlor has been his own dictionary. "Cohabiting wife" is a phrase defined by other parts of the settlement. The gift over is "from and after the decease of the said Emily M. Hope-Johnstone in the lifetime of the said William J. Hope-Johnstone or from and after the dissolution of their marriage or judicial separation." The power of advancement is given to the trustees for the children during the joint lives of their father and mother and the subsistence of the marriage, and so also are the powers of sale and of varying securities. In the case of a partnership deed where the share of a bankrupt partner is given over to the others, it passes to his trustee in bankruptcy on the ground that such a provision is a fraud on the bankruptcy laws:

Higginbotham v. Holme, 19 Ves. 87;

Ex parte Barter; Ex parte Black; Re Walker, 51 L. T. Rep. 811; 26 Ch. Div. 510.

There is a substantial difference between the principle of these cases and that applicable to a gift to a wife if she continues to cohabit with her husband:

Whitmore v. Mason, 5 L. T. Rep. 631; 2 J. & H. 204;

Wilson v. Greenwood, 1 Swanst. 471, per Lord Eldon, L.C., at p. 481, and note [KEKEWICH, J.—I am not satisfied that that distinction is sound, because there is no express provision in the Bankruptcy Acts making such limitations void; it is only the policy of the law which effects that. You must introduce some rule of law from outside to the effect that the limitation is void.] In the bankruptcy cases it is against the policy of a particular set of statutes. In this case it is an infringement of the common law. It is against the morals of society. It was formerly argued that a lease until bankruptcy was void. There is nothing wrong in a settlor contemplating bankruptcy, there is in his endeavouring to induce a wife to live separately from her husband. H. v. W. (ubi sup.) is the only case in which provision was made for the wife if she so long continues to live with her husband, and that was held bad. Provisions for separation where it is immediately contemplated were formerly bad:

Hunt v. Hunt, 5 L. T. Rep. 778; 4 De G. F. & J. 221.

But that is not so now:

Per Lord Eldon, Westmeath v. Salisbury, 5 Bli. N. S. 339, at p. 375.

Nutter for the defendant W. J. Hope-Johnstone.—I put my contention on the following four grounds: The court does not now regard these limitations in the strict way it formerly did before the Divorce Act was passed:

Bishop v. Bishop, 76 L. T. Rep. 409; per Lord Lindley, at p. 414; (1897) P. 138.

This is shown by Westbury, L.C.'s first judgment in Hunt v. Hunt (ubi sup.), at p. 780. The event contemplated is not such an event as would have been regarded as being against public policy, and therefore void within Cartwright v. Cartwright (ubi sup.) and Re Moore; Trafford v. Maconochie (ubi sup.), which is in my favour. The true policy of the law is to prevent the evil of separation of married persons happening and to support limitations, offering, as this does, an inducement to the wife to discharge her duties faithfully. In old days this matter was regarded strictly; now the question must be looked at as a whole:

Per Williams, L.J., Lily Dowager Duchess of Marlborough v. Duke of Marlborough, 83 L. T. Rep. 578, at p. 583; (1901) 1 Ch. 165.

These are voluntary deeds of gift and not settlements, as was the case in both Cartwright v. Cartwright (ubi sup.), in which the separation was induced by the misconduct of the husband, and H. v. W. (ubi sup.). Here there was no consideration at all moving from the wife. Bargains as to the effect of a future separation are bad, and the two cases last mentioned are dealt with by Rigby, L.J. in his judgment in Lily Dowager Duchess of Marlborough v. Duke of Marlborough (83 L. T. Rep. at p. 583). The clause in question must be treated as one single limitation and not as a condition. If it is treated as a condition I must fail; but if it is regarded as a limitation I can succeed. Brown v. Peck (1 Eden, 140) and Wren v. Bradley (2 De G. & Sm. 49) were both cases of conditions and not of limitations. The provisions there induce separation and not cohabitation. The limitation is to the wife so long as she does what she ought to do:

Heath v. Lewis, 3 De G. M. & G. 954.

Cartwright v. Cartwright (ubi sup.) was the case of an ante-nuptial, this is a post-nuptial, settlement.

Owen Thompson, for the children, took no part in the argument.

Martelli, in reply, said that the Divorce Act only altered procedure, and that there is no difference in the policy of the law since it was passed. There is nothing in that Act to encourage the argument that provisions looking to the separation of man and wife or the dissolution of the marriage contract are regarded more favourably now than they were previously to Lord Hatherley's remarks in H. v. W. (ubi sup.). I admit that when separation is necessary the parties may agree on the terms:

Whitmore v. Mason (ubi sup.);

Lily Dowager Duchess of Marlborough v. Duke of Marlborough (ubi sup.).

On the 4th Feb. his Lordship had directed the case to stand over for further argument, saying that it was one of the disadvantages of the procedure by adjourned summonses that important questions thereby raised often did not receive the attention from counsel and the court which they deserved. His Lordship, however, expressed the opinion that the liability to the performance by the trustees of the lessee's covenants in the leases of the subject-matter of the settlements did not make them deeds for value as between donor and donee, although that point had not been strongly urged in argument. He drew attention to the fact that the words "dissolution of their marriage or judicial separation" between the husband and wife were repeated again and again in the first settlement. His Lordship did not concur in the view that that implied that the wife was to be regarded as the "cohabiting wife" of her husband until the dissolution of the union by legal process. The question was whether the limitation as it was written was bad in law, so that the lady would take the income during her life. There was no doubt that if the deeds were regarded as settlements in the ordinary sense of the word or as contracts such a limitation, under the decision of Page-Wood, V.C. and the Court of Appeal referred to in the arguments, would be bad. But the difficulty was raised that these were not agreements, but only gifts by the husband, to which possibly other considerations would apply. The applicability of the law of bankruptcy to similar cases and to those arising under wills ought to be considered. The questions raised deserved the best attention they could receive.

The case having been reargued as above the following written judgment was delivered:

Feb. 25.—KEKEWICH, J.—By the deed which it falls to me to interpret the settlor secured to his wife by the intervention of trustees an annuity in the shape of the rents and profits of the property comprised in the deed, which was directed to be paid during the natural life of the said Emily M. Hope-Johnstone, "or so long as she shall continue the cohabiting wife or the widow of the said William J. Hope-Johnstone." The meaning of this is perfectly clear. There is no occasion for the moment to look beyond the joint lives, but during the joint lives the lady is to receive the rents and profits if and so long as she continues to cohabit with her husband. It is a conditional gift in that a condition is attached to it, but it is a limitation and not a gift defeasible on the performance or non-performance of a condition precedent or subsequent. The lady is no longer cohabiting with her husband, and she insists that she is nevertheless entitled to receive the rents and profits, because her enjoyment of them is fettered in a manner which the law will not sanction. The phrase most frequently used in argument was "public policy"; but, following the example of many eminent judges, I prefer "the policy of the law." The question is whether the fetter or restriction thus placed on the lady's enjoyment is so antagonistic to the public good that the court is bound to refuse its sanction of it. What the court is or is not bound to do must depend on authority. There may be, and, indeed, there certainly are, from time to time modifications of the view taken by the courts respecting restrictions on liberty of gift or contract, but, generally speaking, it is the duty of a judge considering a question of this kind to examine the authorities and to determine whether the particular case submitted to him falls within them. There are many authorities, old and modern, showing that the courts abhor provisions in instruments of whatever kind contemplating the interruption of conjugal relations and hold such provisions void as against the policy of the law. It is sufficient for the moment to refer to the words of Wood, V.C. in H. v. W. (3 K. & J., at p. 387), where he says: "It is forbidden to provide for the possible dissolution of the marriage contract which the policy of the law is to preserve intact and inviolate." There is no desire on my part to narrow this principle, or to avoid the application of language used in connection with it to any case to which it may properly be extended. But it is well to look at some of the cases with the view of ascertaining what the principle was understood to be by the judges who decided them, and how they intended to apply it. Westmeath v. Salisbury (ubi sup.) may be taken as the first of the series. There had been disputes between husband and wife, and an arrangement for continued cohabitation was made. That arrangement was expressed in a deed of 1817, which contained provisions contemplating the renewal of disputes and the cesser of cohabitation. After the execution of that deed the husband and wife continued to live together for a time; but in 1818 they agreed to separate, and another deed providing for their separation was executed. The circumstances under which those deeds were executed, and the conduct of the parties were of the most peculiar character, and formed the main subject of elaborate discussion in the House of Lords. No useful purpose would be answered by following that discussion in detail. The case is abridged for the present purpose with sufficient accuracy in 35 R. R. 54, and the headnote there states correctly the conclusion arrived at. Lord Eldon took a prominent part in the discussion in the House of Lords, and more than once supported the principle on which this conclusion was founded. That is the principle the expression of which I have taken from Wood, V.C.'s language above quoted. In the case of Cartwright v. Cartwright (ubi sup.), to be presently mentioned, Lord Eldon is said to have stated that conclusion in language quoted from Westmeath v. Westmeath (Jac. 126). I have been unable to find the passage there; but the quotation accords in substance with a passage in Westmeath v. Salisbury (5 Bli. N. S., at p. 395; 1 Dow & Clark, at p. 543). Another case declaring the principle and illustrating its application is Cartwright v. Cartwright (ubi sup.). There was an ante-nuptial settlement distinctly providing for the event of a separation by reason of any disagreement or otherwise between the intended husband and wife, and this, first Wood, V.C., and then the Court of Appeal, held altogether void. The judgments are in part concerned with the question whether the provision was in the nature of a condition or was a limitation, and it was determined to be the former. Having determined that Knight-Bruce, L.J. says: "I am of opinion that such proviso is against public policy and therefore void"; and Turner, L.J. expresses the same view. The next case deserving attention is one already referred to—H. v. W. (ubi sup.). In his judgment the Vice-Chancellor referred to Cartwright v. Cartwright (ubi sup.), which he was unable to distinguish from that before him; but the facts were different and require careful observation with reference to the question now to be determined. Income of property vested in trustees was directed to be paid to the wife during the joint lives of herself and her husband if she should so long continue to live with him and should not live separate and apart from him through any fault of her own, and this limitation was followed by a direction that in the event of the wife living separate and apart from her husband through any such fault as aforesaid then, from and immediately after such an event, the trustees should permit the survivor in case of death, and the husband in the event of the wife living separate and apart from him as aforesaid, to receive the income for the rest of his or her life. I am not sure whether the Vice-Chancellor treated this as a limitation or as a gift with a condition. On p. 384 he treats it as a gift with a condition attached, and on p. 387 he refers to Egerton v. Brownlow (ubi sup.) as a leading authority on questions relating to conditions, but further down on the same page he speaks of the gift as a limitation, which I venture to think was the proper view. But however that may be, he expresses himself clearly and strongly on the question of the policy of the law. Immediately after the passage on p. 387, which has already been quoted, he says this: "I cannot look on this limitation for the benefit of the husband in the event of the wife leaving him without cause as otherwise than contrary to the policy of the law, because it would give to the husband a benefit by waiving his marital right, which in the event of the wife leaving him capriciously might induce him to consent to a continued separation in order that he might enjoy this property instead of enforcing those rights which the law requires him to enforce to preserve intact the marital contract." A later case deserving notice is Re Moore; Trafford v. Maconochie (ubi sup.). The subject of decision was a direction by will for payment of a weekly sum to a lady during such time as she should live apart from her husband. The real question was whether this was a gift of an annuity subject to a condition or a limited gift, and it was held by Kay, J. and the Court of Appeal to be a limited gift, the commencement and duration of which was fixed in a way which the law does not allow. Consequently the entire gift failed. On p. 681 Cotton, L.J. is reported to have said: "The testator did not like the husband, and his apparent object was to induce the wife to live separate from him. If so, the gift was for a purpose which is contrary to the law of England, for that law does not allow provisions made in contemplation of a future separation between husband and wife." The only other case necessary to mention in this connection is Lily Dowager Duchess of Marlborough v. Duke of Marlborough. The court had to consider whether a power of jointuring, which, on the face of it, might be exercised in favour of any number of wives in succession, was exercisable in favour of a second wife who only filled that character by reason of the first wife having been divorced, Byrne, J. and the Court of Appeal decided that it was exercisable, holding that the policy of the law did not interfere to prevent that conclusion. Dealing with the authorities which were relied on for a different conclusion Rigby, L.J. is reported to have said (at p. 583) "All these cases are alike in one respect. The parties there to a marriage settlement, or what was equivalent to it, meeting together, chose to bargain about what should take place in the event of a separation of the spouses. One has never had any doubt that such a bargain as to what should be the effect of a future separation of people who are living together as man and wife is absolutely bad. All that was there held was that if you will bargain about an event which you are not entitled to look forward to or to anticipate, your bargain will be bad." The decision of Lord Westbury, L.C. in Hunt v. Hunt (ubi sup.), and other decisions upholding separation deeds as enforceable in equity, cannot properly be regarded as an infringement of the principle thus firmly established. These decisions treat the separation of husband and wife as an event which cannot be styled illegal when it is an accomplished fact, and hold reasonably enough, if I may be allowed to say so, that there is no objection to enforcing the terms according to which the separation took place. That is a very different thing from sanctioning provisions for a contemplated event which the law abhors. It is difficult to see how the provision now under consideration falls within these authorities or the judicial dicta which I have quoted. Here the gift is to the wife so long as she cohabits with her husband, and there is no contemplation of a future separation except so far as the terms of the gift necessarily imply that if she lives apart from her husband she shall no longer enjoy the gift. That seems to be a provision rather in favour of morality than against it; rather to secure the continuance of cohabitation than to encourage a severance. It might possibly be argued, and Wood, V.C.'s language might be quoted in support of the argument, that the interest of the husband arising on the ceasing of the annuity when, according to the terms of the deed, he would be entitled for life to the annual proceeds might induce him so to treat his wife as to provoke a separation, but such an argument, to my mind, is altogether wanting in substance. "Policy of the law" ought not to be pressed into the service of highly improbable contingencies. In this I am supported by the opinion of many of the judges who advised the House of Lords in Egerton v. Brownlow (ubi sup.). The House of Lords decided the particular case before it adversely to the opinion of the majority of the judges, but those opinions are nevertheless entitled to great weight in the consideration of the general question what is against the policy of the law and of the application of the principle to special facts. If that view be correct there is no reason either in principle or on authority for declining to give effect to this deed according to the plain construction of it, and in my opinion the gift must be held good. In saying that I do not consider myself as in the slightest degree differing from Wood, V.C., who was dealing with the case before him from another point of view. In the preceding remarks I have dealt with the only question argued, to which by reason of its importance, apart from the particular case, I have thought it right to devote much attention. But, as at present advised, and I only say that because the point was not argued, the case might equally well be disposed of on another and shorter ground. What is meant by a provision being void as against the policy of the law? The phrase means no more than that the provision is not enforceable by anyone or in any court. This, as I have already said, is a limitation and not a gift defeasible by the performance or non-performance of a condition. In other words, there is no condition which can be rejected, because not allowed by law, and the limitation must be taken as a whole as it stands. The wife is not cohabiting with her husband, and she cannot insist on the gift of an annuity limited to endure only during cohabitation. Granted, for the sake of argument, on this point that the limitation is contrary to the policy of the law then it is still unenforceable, and not less or more so, because the wife is not cohabiting with her husband. On this point the case seems to fall directly within the authority Re Moore; Trafford v. Maconochie already cited. This further point was made. The deed provided that "from and after the decease of the wife in the lifetime of the husband, or from and after the dissolution of their marriage or a judicial separation between them," the annuity shall be held upon trust for the benefit of the husband and ultimately for the children. And this phrase "after the dissolution of their said marriage or a judicial separation between them" is repeated several times in the provisions respecting the application of the settled property, which properly find a place in such an instrument. It is said that this phrase shows the intention of the settlor in limiting an annuity to the lady so long as she shall continue the cohabiting wife, and, that as there has been no dissolution or judicial separation, nothing has occurred to determine the annuity which must therefore be taken to be still subsisting. If I am right in thinking that the gift is by way of limitation only, a decision favourable to the wife on this point would not assist her; but I am not prepared to give such a decision. I do not think that entirely different words, used in other parts of the deed, can be imported into the limitation, so as to enable the court to give it a meaning different from that which, according to ordinary interpretation of the language used, it would bear.

Re COOPER AND CRONDACE'S CONTRACT AND VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT 1874. (a)

Vendor and purchaser—Sale by auction—Maintaining fences—Covenant—Form of conveyance to purchaser.

The object of having a deed of conveyance is not merely to vest the property the subject of it in the purchaser, but to embody covenants as to what must be done under the contract of sale after completion of the purchase. Therefore where a purchaser bought under a contract which made him liable to erect and for ever after maintain fences, as marked on the plan of property sold by public auction, the vendor was held entitled to have the obligations of the purchaser expressed in the conveyance to him of his lot.

(a) Reported by W. P. PAIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VENDOR and purchaser summons.

On the 16th Sept. 1903 freehold premises were, with other lots, offered for sale by public auction on behalf of John Eggar Cooper, by the description in the particulars (so far as material) of "Lot 17 (coloured violet on plan)—A choice freehold building site. Nos. 128 (part of) and 144 (part of) on plan, adjoining the last lot" (lot 16).

The particulars of sale were prefaced by certain printed "General Remarks" annexed thereto, the sixth clause of which was in the following terms:

Each purchaser will have to erect, within six months from the date of sale, and afterwards maintain, a good and sufficient fence on the sides of his plot marked T on the plan within the boundary.

The defendant, Charles Hutton Crondace, was the purchaser of lot 17, described in the particulars subject to the conditions of sale.

By the 7th condition each lot was declared to be sold subject to such chief, quit, and other rents . . . rights of way . . . and to other easements, restrictions, and liabilities as were mentioned in the particulars, or as might be, ascertained to be charged thereon or to affect the same, and to any subsisting liability under inclosure award, private Act, covenant, or otherwise, to repair fences or roads, and by condition 10, the vendor was to execute to each purchaser an assurance of the lot purchased.

The 12th Nov. 1903 was the date fixed for completion of the purchase.

The only question arising upon this summons taken out by the vendor was whether, under the terms of the contract, the vendor was entitled to have inserted in the conveyance by him to C. H. Crondace, a covenant by him as such purchaser to erect forthwith, and for ever afterwards maintain a good and sufficient fence on the north side of the said hereditaments, adjoining lot 18, being one of the sides marked T on the plan annexed in accordance with No. 6 of the general remarks annexed to the contract, the fencing by the purchaser on the west side also marked T on the plan having been waived by the vendor.

Re Birmingham and District Land Company and Allday, 67 L. T. Rep. 850; (1893) 1 Ch. 342.

The object of a deed of conveyance is not only to convey the property sold, but to embody stipulations as to its user and having regard to matters to be done thereon after the date of execution. The applicant is entitled to have the obligations of the purchaser expressed in the conveyance to him of his lot. Stirling, J. granted in that case the application to have the obligations in the case of unsold land under a building scheme, some of the land subject to which had been sold by public auction, expressed and made binding in the conveyance. The same principle applies to purchaser's obligations. The words used in the conveyance must agree with those in the contract:

Re Peck and the School Board for London, 68 L. T. Rep. 847; (1893) 2 Ch. 315.

Hon. T. H. Watson for the purchaser.—There is no mention made in the general remarks, particulars, or conditions of sale, of the vendor having the right to require any covenant from the purchaser. This is a reason why no covenant should be ordered to be inserted in the conveyance. According to ordinary practice, if there is to be a special covenant between vendor and purchaser, it is always mentioned in the particulars:

1 Key & Elphin. Free., 6th edit. pp. 294, 295; 7th edit., p. 311.

According to the contract the purchasers are to make a fence. The vendor settles the particulars and conditions of sale, and must settle them so as to give himself the right to insist on the inclusion of the covenant which he wishes included in the conveyance. Not having done this, the conveyance must be according to the contract between the parties:

Hardman v. Child, 52 L. T. Rep. 465, per Pearson, J., at p. 466; 28 Ch. Div. 712.

The vendor meant to rely on the contract, which in this respect will be operative after conveyance:

Palmer v. Johnson, 51 L. T. Rep. 211; 13 Q. B. Div. 351.

In Re Birmingham and District Land Company and Allday (ubi sup.) there was a special provision in the conditions as to covenants. Re Peck and the School Board for London (ubi sup.) was a case upon the construction of the Conveyancing Act 1881, and has nothing to do with the question here. Secondly, the covenant goes beyond what the vendor is entitled to.

KEKEWICH, J.—This is a case of some novelty. Counsel on behalf of the applicant and defendant cited no authority directly bearing on it. Any authority they have cited goes far from being decisive on the particular case. Going back to the real question in the case, I think it is better to approach it from the proper quarter. I ask myself what is the object of having a conveyance? It is not merely to vest the estate in the purchaser—the estate which he has contracted to purchase and the vendor has agreed to sell—but to express in a definite, concluded form all the terms of the contract which have to be performed by the purchaser. Things which have to be done beforehand it is not usual to include in the conveyance, as, for instance, a stipulation that the vendor before completion will put up a fence. And the purchaser is well advised to see that it is done before the purchase is completed. Again, if there is something entirely dehors the contract—as, for instance, a question of compensation for injury to the property—that would not appear on the conveyance. But otherwise it is meant to express in a binding and clear form once for all the clear contract between the parties so far as it has not been performed. I think that a conveyance that falls short of that is not a well-settled conveyance. For instance, if there are restrictive covenants to which the vendor is liable, and as he is entitled to a covenant by the purchaser—which I have held to be a covenant of indemnity—that must be put in the conveyance. If it is not there I agree the conveyance is not properly settled. And when you have once got a conveyance you cannot go behind that and say there is something more to be done. When once you have passed the bridge of conveyance neither party can go back, and you cannot sue on an agreement made pending the contract, not included in the conveyance, which must be assumed not to have been embodied in the conveyance because it is presumed to be abandoned. That seems to me to be the object of a conveyance. Therefore, when you have to inquire whether this or that ought to be in the conveyance, you must find out if it is part of the contract. Does the contract provide that it must be done, either by the vendor or purchaser, after the estate has been vested. For that purpose you must look at the contract itself. This particular contract is made that "lot 17" described in the particulars and subject to the conditions should be sold by the vendor to the purchaser. It is common knowledge that, although conditions of sale are different things from particulars of sale, the purchaser takes the property in the particulars subject to the conditions. It is the commonest possible occurrence to find in the particulars a reservation of rights of way, some restrictive covenant, some easement, which is part of the description of the property sold, and which is recognised as a part of, or a fetter on, the enjoyment of the property. Now, in this particular instance we have three divisions instead of two. I have seen the same thing before. Besides the conditions which are properly called the signed conditions there are "general remarks." They generally fall into the particulars. Take the general remark 6: "Each purchaser will have to erect, within six months from the date of sale, and afterwards maintain a good and sufficient fence on the sides of his plot marked T on the plan within the boundary." If that obligation had been intended to be imposed as one of some half a dozen out of a larger number on two or three of these lots, it would have probably occurred to the draftsman to have inserted it at the foot of each description in the particulars as a note to each special lot. But it applies to every one. Therefore it comes into the particulars. The purchaser takes lot 17 as described in the particulars with the obligation to erect and afterwards maintain the fences specified. There you have something that must be done after the date of completion. It was possible that it was intended that the fence should be erected before completion. But it is, at any rate, looking to the future as to maintaining the fences, and so it is directed to something after completion. That points to something after completion. So that you have something which ought to be introduced, and to be inside the conveyance, in order to complete it and perform the contract. But it is pointed out by counsel for the purchaser that there is no condition to that effect, and the conditions would have been more perfect had it been there. But I cannot think that the omission removes the obligation—the obligation is to do this; and if the conveyance is prepared without this, the vendor runs great risk of not being in a condition to insist on it at all. It would be extraordinarily difficult to frame the indorsement of a writ so as to enforce this if there was nothing in the conveyance about it. I do not say it would be impossible. The answer would be that it is an obligation which now has no legal means of enforcement, not having been inserted in the conveyance. There will be a declaration that the vendor is entitled to have a covenant regarding the fencing inserted in the conveyance.

HURRELL v. LITTLEJOHN. (a)

Settled Land Acts—Sale by tenant for life—Undervalue—Action by remainderman to set aside sale—Settled Land Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 4 (1), 53, 54.

The mere fact that, upon a sale by a tenant for life under the powers of the Settled Land Acts, the purchase is at an undervalue is not of itself sufficient to invalidate the sale.

In 1902 a tenant for life, purporting to act under the powers conferred upon him by the Settled Land Acts, sold the freehold of certain public-house property to W. for the sum of 2000l.

At the time of the sale the property was subject to a lease which had been granted as from Christmas 1892 for a term of twenty-one years at a rent of 63l. per annum.

Within a few days after the sale W. contracted to resell the property for 3000l., although it was doubtful whether 3000l. was not in excess of the true value of the property.

W. had not, before making the original purchase, made any inquiry as to whether the trustees or tenant for life had had any valuation made.

Held, that these circumstances were not sufficient to sustain an action by a remainderman to set aside the sale.

ACTION to set aside a sale by a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts of a public-house known as the Coach and Horses, Old Bexley.

The facts, which will be found set out in his Lordship's judgment, were shortly as follows:—

The Coach and Horses was settled upon trust for the defendant Richard Littlejohn for life, and after his death for his children equally.

There were seven children, of whom the plaintiff was the eldest; the other six were infants.

The defendant Richard Littlejohn, purporting to act under his statutory power as tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts, had in 1902 sold the Coach and Horses to the defendant Henry Christian Wasmuth for the sum of 2000l.

At the time of the sale the property was subject to a lease which had been granted as from Christmas 1892 for a term of twenty-one years at a rent of 63l. per annum.

Within a few days after the sale Wasmuth contracted to resell the property for 3000l. This contract had not yet been carried out, but it appeared that the purchasers were still willing to pay the 3000l. if they could get a good title.

His Lordship, however, doubted whether 3000l. was not in excess of the true value of the property.

The defendants to the action, other than Richard Littlejohn and Henry Christian Wasmuth, were Edward Norfolk, a mortgagee of Wasmuth, the trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, and the infant children of Richard Littlejohn.

The plaintiff now claimed a declaration that the sale of the Coach and Horses to the defendant Wasmuth was not a valid exercise of the power of sale conferred by the Settled Land Act 1882 on the defendant Richard Littlejohn, and that the sale might be set aside accordingly, and that the conveyance to the defendant Wasmuth and the mortgage to the defendant Edward Norfolk might be delivered up respectively to be cancelled, and that the purchase money might be returned.

W. F. Hamilton, K.C. and W. A. Peck, for the plaintiff, contended that, Wasmuth having purchased the public-house at 2000l. when he knew that it was worth a great deal more, the sale could not stand. An ordinary advance in price would not affect the sale; but an immediate advance of one-half upon the price invalidated the sale. The very fact that Wasmuth knew that he was obtaining the property at a gross undervalue showed that he did not act in good faith. The sale was then a fraud upon the power, and must be set aside. They referred to sects. 3 (1), 4 (1), 42, 53, and 54 of the Settled Land Act 1882 and to the following cases:

Cottrell v. Cottrell, 52 L. T. Rep. 486; 28 Ch. Div. 628.

Badeock, K.C. and George Henderson, for the defendants Henry Christian Wasmuth and Edward Norfolk, contended that Wasmuth, having dealt in good faith with the tenant for life, was protected by sect. 54 of the Settled Land Act 1882. The mere fact that he knew he was making a good bargain did not take away that protection.

Cur. adv. vult.

JOYCE, J.—This is an action by one of a number of persons beneficially entitled in remainder to set aside the sale by a tenant for life under the powers of the Settled Land Act 1882 of a public-house, the Coach and Horses, Old Bexley. The several defendants are the tenant for life, Mr. Littlejohn; the purchaser, Mr. Henry Christian Wasmuth; Mr. Edward Norfolk, a mortgagee of Mr. Wasmuth; Mr. Benjamin Fryer and Mr. Richard Carroll Pearman, the trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts; and the other persons interested in remainder with the plaintiff. At first there were extensive allegations of fraud, not made, I think, perhaps altogether wantonly, but under a misapprehension of certain facts and figures which have subsequently been explained. However, a short time before the trial a letter was written withdrawing the charges of fraud, and other claims were withdrawn in the course of the trial. The action ultimately became reduced to a claim against the purchaser and his mortgagee, Mr. Norfolk, to set aside the sale as being made at an inadequate price; in fact, I may say that practically the question I have to decide is, Whether a purchaser who buys from a tenant for life at less than the market price—or, I should rather say, who succeeds in getting a good bargain—can insist upon retaining it against the beneficiaries, having regard to the Settled Land Act 1882, sect. 4, sub-sect. 1, of which provides that “every sale shall be made at the best price that can reasonably be obtained”; and sect. 13 of which provides that “a tenant for life shall, in exercising any power under this Act, have regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement, and shall, in relation to the exercise thereof by him, be deemed to be in the position and to have the duties and liabilities of a trustee for those parties.” As to Mr. Norfolk, who is the mortgagee of the purchaser, he must, I think, upon the facts proved or admitted, be taken to have been, quoad his mortgage, a purchaser for value without notice; and there is no case for relief against him. Whether he ought to be made a party at all I doubt, but as against him—or, rather, as against his representatives, for he is dead—the action must be dismissed. The principal defendant is Mr. Wasmuth. He is a director of a brewery company or firm, and has been all his life associated with a firm of distillers, to whom he described himself as being advising expert. He thus naturally has had considerable experience with respect to what is called licensed property. One Stapylton, formerly occupier of the Station Hotel, Sidcup, who had had business relations with Mr. Wasmuth or his firm, mentioned to him that he knew of a public-house for sale. He did not at first give the name or any particulars. Later, he came to Mr. Wasmuth and stated that the public-house in question was the Coach and Horses, Old Bexley, and gave the name of the solicitors, Messrs. Barton and Pearman, who had the business in hand. This public-house Mr. Wasmuth knew very well, for his firm were in the habit of supplying the spirits there consumed. Stapylton was then told to get the particulars, and, after some bargaining and negotiation with the solicitors, Mr. Wasmuth ultimately obtained a contract, dated the 22nd Feb. 1902, with the tenant for life for the purchase of the property at the price of 2000*l.*, with a further sum of 50*l.*—or not exceeding 50*l.*, or something of that sort—for the payment of the vendor’s solicitors’ costs. What I have called “the property” was the freehold subject to a lease which had still nearly twelve years to run. The lease was made in Aug. 1893, by the same tenant for life, to Messrs. Beasley, the brewers, for twenty-one years from Christmas 1892, at a rent of 63*l.*. The rent paid by the occupying tenant to the brewers, subject to the usual tie, was 60*l.* per annum. The price agreed to be given by Wasmuth was thus about thirty-two and a-half years’ purchase. I see no reason to suppose that the property had materially increased in value since the lease in 1893; but, of course, the public-house property is or was notoriously of a speculative character. Now, the purchaser certainly thought that he had made an advantageous bargain. Indeed, he bought as a speculation, and, of course, he would not have bought at all unless he had hoped and expected to make a profit. He swears—and I believe him, for I see no reason whatever to question his veracity as a witness—that he did not expect to make nearly so much as 1000*l.*—that is, 1000*l.* profit. Stapylton was an old schoolfellow, and on friendly terms with a member of the firm of Messrs. Barton and Pearman; and, having been in the trade, he was requested by them, in the month of Nov. 1901, to make some inquiry with a view to ascertaining what were the monthly takings of the public-house, the sale of which was then contemplated. He appears to have done so. But on the 20th Nov. 1901 he wrote a letter of that date to Messrs. Barton and Pearman, in which he stated: “After our conversation the other day, I smelt around the Coach and Horses and I attach the result. He probably lied a bit, but if you can get anything like 1800 for your Johnny you are not doing any harm.” This he is supposed to have got from the occupier, the tenant. After the contract Wasmuth promised to give Stapylton, who had introduced the matter to him and who was in pecuniary difficulties—in fact, he was an undischarged bankrupt—one half of any profits that he, Wasmuth, might make out of the transaction. At one time it was rather suggested, though never distinctly contended, that the sale was invalid by reason of Stapylton’s connection with the matter; but, as I say, this was not seriously contended, and I am satisfied that there is no ground for such a contention. Stapylton was never the agent of the vendor or his solicitors to find a purchaser or in any fiduciary relation to them. To my mind it was quite natural that Wasmuth should be disposed to deal generously with him under the circumstances, and I think he was fairly entitled to something in the nature of a commission from Wasmuth. Wasmuth, before purchasing, made no inquiry as to whether the trustees or the tenant for life had any valuation made or anything of the kind. In my opinion he was not bound to make any such inquiry any more than he was bound to inquire whether notice had been given to the trustees—as to which see sect. 45, sub-sect. 2, of the Settled Land Act 1882. Now, pausing here to consider the position on the 22nd Feb. 1902, the date of the execution of Wasmuth’s contract, I cannot find in the circumstances of the case any ground for concluding that Wasmuth in any way dealt with the tenant for life, or his solicitors, otherwise than in good faith. Consequently sect. 54 of the Settled Land Act appears to me to apply; that section providing that “upon a sale a purchaser or other person dealing in good faith with the tenant for life shall, as against all parties entitled under the settlement, be conclusively taken to have given the best price that could reasonably be obtained by the tenant for life, and to have complied with all the requisitions of this Act.” Now, I do not mean to say that in an action for setting aside a sale under this Act the fact of the price being inadequate (whatever that may mean) may not, together with other circumstances, be material; but what I do think is this, that the mere fact that the purchase is at an undervalue of itself without anything more at all is insufficient to invalidate the sale if the purchaser acted in good faith. If I am right in this there is an end of the plaintiff’s case as against Wasmuth; and I think there is no case as against him. As already intimated, no charge is made or relief sought against the tenant for life or any of the other defendants, except Norfolk’s representatives; and, as I have already said, the action must be dismissed against them. It appears that Wasmuth, within a few days after his contract with the tenant for life, offered the property to Messrs. Beasley, the brewers, for 3000*l.*, which offer they, somewhat to his surprise, accepted, entering into a verbal contract to purchase from him for 3000*l.* This had not been carried out, but rescinded by reason of Messrs. Beasley insisting that the beneficiaries should concur for the purpose of confirming the sale. Messrs. Beasley, no doubt, were much annoyed at finding that Wasmuth had purchased without their being aware of what was going on. They, in fact, communicated with some of the beneficiaries, and hence this action. The facts are, however, that Messrs. Beasley, as early as Oct. and Nov. 1901, were in correspondence with the solicitors of the tenant for life in reference to a renewal of the lease, and in effect these solicitors practically offered to sell the freehold to them for 2750*l.* Instead of accepting this offer or making any counter offer, they wrote in such a manner that Messrs. Barton and Pearman considered that any negotiations with Messrs. Beasley for the sale of the property was at an end. There may have been a misunderstanding, but, upon a careful perusal of the correspondence, and having seen Mr. Barton and other members of his firm in the witness-box, who were perfectly fair and straightforward witnesses, I do not think—and I think I am bound to say this after what fell during the trial—that Messrs. Barton and Pearman are in any way to blame. There was no actual valuation before the sale, but Mr. Lucas, one of the trustees, who was himself a competent surveyor and valuer, though without any special experience in reference to valuing public-houses, knew the property well, and considered that Wasmuth's offer of 2000*l.* ought to be accepted if there was to be a sale—and the tenant for life had long been desirous of selling, with a view, no doubt, to investing the proceeds upon securities that would produce a larger income. As to what the value of the property really was, there is a considerable difference of opinion and a conflict of evidence; but I am not at all satisfied with the estimates of value put forward on behalf of the plaintiff. I think they are fallacious, having regard to the fact that it was not a sale of the freehold in possession, but subject to a lease. Without the licence I do not think the property was worth more than 40*l.* a year to rent, if so much. What the value of the licence may be at the end of twelve years when the lease expires cannot, in my opinion, be predicted with anything like certainty. It is quite true that Mr. Furmage, the representative of Messrs. Beasley, the brewers, who are much annoyed with Messrs. Barton and Pearman and possibly with the defendant Wasmuth, deposed that Messrs. Beasley were still willing to give 3000*l.* if they could get a good title. This does not under the circumstances satisfy me that the property was or is really worth in the market anything like 3000*l.*, especially as they would have nothing to say to the offer originally made to them by Messrs. Barton and Pearman to sell for 2750*l.* Upon the whole, as I have said already, I think sect. 54 of the Settled Land Act 1882 furnishes the purchaser with a good defence to this action, which consequently, in my opinion, fails altogether.

(a) Reported by SYDNEY DAVEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Costs—Taxation—Inspection of machinery by arrangement between parties and without order of court—Discretion of taxing master—Order L., r. 3.

Where for the purposes of an action there has been an inspection of machinery by arrangement between the parties and without an order of the court being obtained thereto, the taxing master is not debarred by Order L., r. 3, of the Rules of the Supreme Court from allowing the costs of such inspection.

SUMMONS to review taxation in the above action for infringement of the plaintiff's patent, the action being dismissed with costs on the ground that the patent was invalid in that there was insufficient subject-matter for a patent and on the ground that there had been no infringement.

The taxing master, in taxing the defendants' costs, disallowed the fees to counsel and an expert for inspecting certain machinery, the inspection having been arranged between the solicitors of the parties without the expense of obtaining an order of the court thereto.

The fees in question were disallowed by the taxing master on the ground that, in the absence of an order under Order L., r. 3, he had no discretion to allow such fees.

Order L., r. 3, provides that:

It shall be lawful for the court or a judge, upon the application of any party to a cause or matter, and upon such terms as may be just, to make any order for the detention, preservation, or inspection of any property or thing, being the subject of such cause or matter, or as to which any question may arise therein, and for all or any of the purposes aforesaid to authorise any persons to enter upon or into any land or building in the possession of any party to such cause or matter, and for all or any of the purposes aforesaid to authorise any samples to be taken, or any observation to be made or experiment to be tried, which may be necessary or expedient for the purpose of obtaining full information or evidence.

ASHWORTH v. ENGLISH CARD CLOTHING COMPANY LIMITED (No. 2). (a)

Costs—Interest—Action dismissed with costs—Payment of costs and interest—Order reversed by Court of Appeal—Return of costs and interest—Order of Court of Appeal reversed by House of Lords—Second return of costs and interest—Right to further interest.

On the 22nd June 1901 the plaintiff's action was dismissed by Joyce, J. with costs; and on the 26th March 1902 the plaintiff accordingly paid the defendants' costs, together with interest thereon.

On the 11th July 1902 the Court of Appeal reversed the order of Joyce, J.; and on the 21st July 1902 the defendants repaid to the plaintiff the costs and interest.

On the 9th Nov. 1903 the House of Lords reversed the order of the Court of Appeal and restored the order of Joyce, J. The plaintiff returned the costs and interest to the defendants.

Held, that the defendants were also entitled to interest on the costs as from the 21st July 1902.

MOTION that the order of the House of Lords in the above action made on the appeal of the defendants from the order of the Court of Appeal, dated the 11th July 1902, might be made an order of this court; and that the plaintiff might be ordered to pay the sum of 51*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*, being interest at 4 per cent. less tax from the 21st July 1902 to the 23rd Nov. 1903, on the sum of 1013*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, being the amount of the defendants' taxed costs of the hearing of the action before Joyce, J. returned to the plaintiff on the 21st July 1902.

On the 22nd June 1901 the above action was dismissed with costs.

On the 26th March 1902 the plaintiff paid to the defendants such costs, being taxed at 1013*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, together with 29*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* interest thereon, making in all the sum of 1042*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.*

On the 11th July 1902 the Court of Appeal reversed the order of Joyce, J.

On the 21st July 1902 the defendants repaid to the plaintiff the above sum of 1042*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.*, together with the sum of 13*l.* 3*s.* 7*d.*, the interest thereon, as reckoned from the 26th March 1902—in all, 1055*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*

On the 9th Nov. 1903 the House of Lords reversed the order of the Court of Appeal and restored the order of Joyce, J.

The plaintiff repaid the above sum of 1055*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*, but declined to pay any interest on the sum of 1013*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*, as from the 21st July 1902, alleging that, although he had that sum in his hands from the 21st July 1902 to the 23rd Nov. 1903, he was not liable to pay any interest thereon.

Terrell, K.C. and J. F. Graham for the plaintiff.—The defendants are not entitled to interest on the costs in question at common law; the obligation to pay such interest is merely statutory. That statutory obligation is to be found in the Judgments Act 1838 (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110); sect. 17 of that Act providing that every judgment debt shall carry interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum "from the time of entering up the judgment until the same shall be satisfied," and sect. 18 providing that all decrees and orders of courts of equity and all rules of courts of common law whereby any sum of money, or any costs, charges, or expenses shall be payable to any person shall have the effect of judgments in the superior courts of common law. Thus the defendants were entitled to the interest on their costs as from the time of entering up the judgment "until the same was satisfied." Here the judgment was satisfied on the 26th March 1902 by the payment by the plaintiff to the defendants of their costs before Joyce, J. with interest thereon; and, being once satisfied, there cannot be any further obligation on the plaintiff to pay interest under the statute.

Younger, K.C. and A. J. Walter for the defendants.—The order of Joyce, J. was only suspended by the order of the Court of Appeal. If there had been no prior payment of the costs incurred by the defendants before Joyce, J., no doubt the plaintiff would have to pay interest on these costs from the time of the entering up of the judgment of Joyce, J. until the costs were paid consequent upon the order of the House of Lords. It would seem very unjust that the intermediate adverse decision of the Court of Appeal should deprive them of interest on the costs. They referred to Edge and Sons v. W. Gallon and Son (1899) W. N. 137, where at the trial of the action judgment was given for the plaintiffs with costs. The defendants intending to appeal, it was ordered that they should pay the amount of the plaintiffs' taxed costs to their solicitors, on their personal undertaking to refund the amount in case the appeal should succeed. The Court of Appeal reversed the decision, and ordered that the plaintiffs should pay the defendants' costs in both courts. The defendants had paid 1105*l.* to the plaintiffs' solicitors, this being the amount of the plaintiffs' taxed costs. In drawing up the order of the Court of Appeal the registrar inserted a direction that the plaintiffs should pay the 1105*l.* to the defendants, together with interest thereon from the date of payment to the plaintiffs' solicitors up to the date of the judgment of the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal had not given any express direction for the payment of interest. On the plaintiffs objecting to pay the interest, and moving the court to vary the order accordingly, the court, without expressing any opinion whether the court had power to order interest to be paid, said that the direction for payment of interest ought not to be inserted as common form.

Cur. adv. vult.

JOYCE, J.—In this case, in the court of first instance, the plaintiff's action was dismissed with costs on the 22nd June 1901. On the 26th March 1902 the plaintiff paid the defendants' costs, 1013*l.*, with interest to date, amounting altogether to 1042*l.* On the 11th July 1902 the order of the court below was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and on the 21st of the same July the defendants, being required to do so by the plaintiff, returned to him the amount he had paid for costs and interest as I have mentioned. Now, pausing here for a moment, it appears to me that at that moment matters stood in the same position as if the plaintiff had never paid or been ordered to pay these costs. On the 9th Nov. 1903 the House of Lords reversed the order of the Court of Appeal, and restored the original order. The plaintiff is willing to repay, and has repaid, the defendants' costs and interest that were returned to him under the order of the Court of Appeal, this interest being interest on the defendants' costs from the original judgment to the 21st July 1902. He objects, however, to pay interest on such costs for the period since the 21st July 1902, although he has had the money in his hands, without, as it ultimately turns out, being entitled thereto. But, by law, if these costs had never been paid at all, the defendants would be now entitled to have them with interest from the date of the original judgment; and it appears to me that they ought not to be in a worse position by reason of having, under an order of the Court of Appeal, now reversed, returned the amount of these costs with interest to the 21st July 1902. I think that this return of costs demanded by and received by the plaintiff put the defendants in the same position as if they had never been paid by the plaintiff. Therefore, in my opinion, the motion is entitled to succeed. I should add that the case which was cited to me of Edge and Sons v. W. Gallon and Son (1899) W. N. 137 was altogether different. There the costs refunded were simply costs which an erroneous order of the court below, subsequently reversed, compelled the defendants to pay, and there was no statute or rule entitling the defendants to interest on the costs so refunded. Therefore there must be an order according to the notice of motion with costs.

PROBATE BUSINESS.

Tuesday, Feb. 16.

(Before Sir F. JEUNE, President.)

In the Goods of MARTIN. (a).

Probate—Corporate body—Grant to corporate body and to individuals—Jurisdiction—Bodies Corporate (Joint Tenancy) Act 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 20)—Practice.

The court will not make a grant of probate to a body corporate and to one or more individuals, all of whom have been appointed executors by a will.

MOTION.

This was a motion on behalf of the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, a limited body, for a grant of probate of the will of James Martin, of No. 17, Compton-road, Canonbury, in the county of London, who died on the 2nd Sept. 1903. The deceased executed his will on the 22nd May 1902, and appointed two of his nephews, William Alexander Shearer and Donald Francis Shearer, together with the Law Guarantee and Trust Society, as executors and trustees. On the 17th Sept. 1903 the society duly appointed its syndic to apply for letters of administration to the estate of the deceased with the will annexed. The authorities at Somerset House, however, declared that such a grant could not be made unless the two nephews declined to take probate. A grant of probate could be made to the two nephews or a grant of letters of administration to the society, but not both. On the 13th Oct. a grant of the will in common form was issued to the nephews, no mention being made of the society. The present motion was to ask the President to change the practice, and make it conform with that of other countries. The gross value of the estate was about 12,500*l.*

Priestley, K.C. and Barnard for the society.—The change desired was one which was in accordance with the legal procedure favoured by other countries. In New South Wales probate had been granted in 1902 in a case where the manager of the Permanent Trust Company had sworn that the company would pay the just debts and legacies of the testator. It was true that the grant was there made to the company alone. The Bodies Corporate (Joint Tenancy) Act 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 20) had been passed in consequence of the decision in Law Guarantee and Trust Society Limited and Hunter v. Bank of England (62 L. T. Rep. 496; 24 Q. B. Div. 406) and the partial remedy supplied by the Act of 1892, which only applied to the Banks of England and Ireland. By sect. 1 of the Act of 1899, bodies corporate were enabled to hold property in joint tenancy. Perhaps sooner or later it might come to pass that a society would be appointed sole executor; but that was for the consideration of the testator, who must be taken to know what he was doing. There was a disadvantage in a case like the present under the existing practice. It would be a considerable saving of expense if a grant was made to the nephews and the society direct.

Gordon Brown for the two nephews.

The PRESIDENT.—I should have been very glad to have acceded to this application if I could have seen my way clear to do so, especially as I think that the courts have over and over again lost opportunities in modifying or changing rules of practice. In my opinion the practice should always be extended by the judges whenever it is certain that they have the power to alter it, and there is a manifest advantage in the change. But I do not feel disposed to act in the present case, nor to follow the case mentioned by Mr. Priestley, for it is possible there may have been special legislation in New South Wales upon the subject. I think that a society like the Law Guarantee and Trust Society should obtain special powers from Parliament to enable them to act in the way desired, and I am of opinion that they are well qualified to act. But such a grant as the one now sought for has never yet been made, and I am not sure that this is merely a matter of practice. On the contrary, I think it is a matter with which the Legislature alone ought to deal. As I have said, I should have been glad to grant this application if I considered it was within my power to do so. As I am not of that opinion, the motion will be dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

LEA v. THURSBY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Practice—Staying proceedings—Frivolous and vexatious action—Interlocutory application in County Court—Subsequent action in High Court raising same question—Order XXV., r. 4.

Where an action was brought in good faith to try a legal point which ought to be tried, a motion, under Order XXV., r. 4, to dismiss the action as frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court, on the ground that the point was res judicata, having been raised and determined in previous proceedings, was dismissed with costs in any event.

Decision of Eady J. (89 L. T. Rep. 744) affirmed.

By an indenture of lease dated the 20th Aug. 1880, and made between T. Worthington of the one part and R. H. Milward of the other part, certain property was demised to R. H. Milward for a term of ninety-five years at the rent of 222l. 5s. 6d.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 24th June 1881, and made between R. H. Milward of the one part and James Horsfall of the other part, R. H. Milward demised the term, less three days, at a peppercorn rent, to James Horsfall to secure 2000l. and further advances.

At the present time the sum of 8000l. was due upon the security.

James Horsfall died on the 17th Oct. 1887, and the plaintiffs were the present trustees of his will.

On the 27th March 1882 R. H. Milward procured a conveyance in fee of the property demised to him, and in 1885 he sold the property to W. E. J. B. Farnham.

The conveyance was dated the 1st Aug. 1885, and was expressed to be subject to the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880.

The defendant was a purchaser from W. E. J. B. Farnham, and he claimed that the lease was subsisting.

In July 1902 R. H. Milward became bankrupt.

On the 5th May 1903 an order was made in bankruptcy by the registrar of the County Court of Warwickshire that the plaintiffs should be excluded from all interest in the lease, and that the same should be vested in the defendant, unless they declared their option to accept a vesting order of the lease.

The plaintiffs had not appealed from that order, being advised that if the lease was subsisting the order was right; and that if such lease was not subsisting their rights were not adversely affected. Accordingly they commenced this action against the defendant, and by their statement of claim asked a declaration that when R. H. Milward acquired the fee in 1882 the lease became merged, and that the only term now subsisting was the term at a peppercorn rent to secure the mortgage.

Thereupon a motion was made by the defendant, under Order XXV., r. 4, to dismiss the action as frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court.

On the 22nd Jan. 1904 the motion came on to be heard before Byrne, J., when his Lordship decided (89 L. T. Rep. 744) that the action was brought in good faith to try a legal point which ought to be tried, and that the motion wholly failed and must be dismissed with costs in any event.

The defendant appealed.

Eve, K.C. and Wootten for the appellant.—The question raised in this action is whether there was a merger of the term created by the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880. All we now ask is that the court will say that this very point has been the subject of adjudication between the same parties in the County Court proceedings, and that therefore the present action is frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court:

Order XXV., r. 4.

It is precisely the same question as was determined in the previous case by a court of competent jurisdiction. As to disclaimer, see Bankruptcy Act 1883, s. 55, sub-s. 1. It was open to the plaintiffs to appeal, if they had thought proper to do so, from the decision of the registrar of the County Court. The fact that the question in dispute has already been the subject of adjudication inter partes is a good ground for staying the action; and the defendant ought not to vexed again by an action of this nature. The case is within Order XXV., r. 4, according to the decisions, and it is very similar to Stephenson v. Garnett, 78 L. T. Rep. 371; (1898) 1 Q. B. 677.

They referred also to Reichel v. Magrath, 61 L. T. Rep. 131; 14 App. Cas. 665.

Vernon Smith, K.C. (with him W. C. Druce) for the respondents.—There was, I submit, no jurisdiction to decide this question of title in the bankruptcy proceedings, being a question between strangers to the bankruptcy:

Re Lowenthal; Ex parte Beesty, 51 L. T. Rep. 431; 13 Q. B. Div. 238.

Moreover, the order does not decide that the lease is subsisting. The court ought to be slow to strike out a statement of claim:

Stephenson v. Garnett (ubi sup.).

He referred also to

Attorney-General of the Duchy of Lancaster v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 67 L. T. Rep. 810; (1892) 3 Ch. 274.

Eve, K.C. replied.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—It is evident that the transactions are extremely complicated, and I think that the point raised by the plaintiffs ought to be tried. The decision of Eady, J. is, in my opinion, quite right, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

STIRLING and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

APPEALS FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Conflict of laws—Scotch contract of marriage—Husband domiciled in England—Wife domiciled in Scotland—Trustees subject to English courts—Settlement of wife's property—Real estate in Scotland—Life interest of husband—Alimentary clause—Provision against alienation—Charges created—Validity.

A contract executed in Scotland in Scotch form on the marriage in Scotland of a domiciled Englishman with a domiciled Scotchwoman, whereby certain Scotch heritable bonds, the property of the wife—which according to the law of Scotland are regarded as immovables—were (inter alia) settled, was held to be subject to Scotch law, and the husband was held to be entitled to such interest only thereunder as the courts in Scotland would declare him entitled to, and that he was therefore entitled to the whole income of the settled property during his life free from the claims of any assignees or incumbrancers, but without prejudice to the rights (if any) of his alimentary creditors, and without prejudice to any prior payment in respect of a certain policy of insurance on his life.

So held by Williams and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ. (dissentiente Stirling, L.J.), reversing the decision of Joyce, J. (88 L. T. Rep. 326).

By an indenture dated the 20th Sept. 1862, and made between William Robert Seymour Vesey Fitzgerald of the first part; Sir William Gerald Seymour Vesey Fitzgerald of the second part; Jane Margaret Matilda Macdonald Lockhart, spinster, of the third part; Henry Bullar, Gerald Surman, Charles James Abbott, Sir Hugh McCalmont Cairns, Sir Archibald Alison, and Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart (hereinafter called "the trustees") of the fourth part, being a settlement made in the English form in contemplation of the marriage then intended and shortly afterwards solemnised between Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald and Jane Margaret Lockhart (and hereinafter referred to as "the English settlement"), William Robert Fitzgerald covenanted with the trustees that his heirs, executors, or administrators would within six months after his death pay to the trustees the sum of 6000*l.* with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the day of his death, to be held by them upon trust to invest the same in manner therein mentioned and to pay the income of the trust fund to Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald and his assigns during his life, and after his death to Jane Margaret Lockhart and her assigns during her life, and after the death of the survivor of them to stand possessed of the trust fund in trust for the issue of the intended marriage as therein declared. And Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald thereby assigned unto the trustees a policy of assurance upon his life for the sum of 4000*l.* effected with the Western Life Assurance Company at the annual premium of 7*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, to hold the same upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provisions thereinbefore declared concerning the sum of 6000*l.* so covenanted to be paid as aforesaid.

And the English settlement contained covenants by Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald and provisions for keeping on foot the policy, including a power to the trustees to apply any part of the income of the trust fund for that purpose.

On the same date a marriage contract in the Scotch form (hereinafter called "the Scotch contract") was made by Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald and Jane Margaret Lockhart whereby, after reciting (amongst other things) the English settlement and the assignment of the policy of assurance on the life of Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald upon the aforesaid trusts, it was declared that the trustees of the Scotch contract (being the same persons as were the trustees of the English settlement) might from time to time apply a sufficient part of the income arising from the trust funds comprised therein in payment of the premiums and such other money (if any) as might be necessary for keeping up the policy or any other policy or policies which might be substituted for it under the provisions contained in the English settlement. And Jane Margaret Lockhart thereby assigned and conveyed unto the trustees all and sundry the lands and heritages, goods, gear, debts, and sums of money, and generally the whole property of Jane Margaret Lockhart (except that to which she was entitled under the English settlement, and jewels and other articles of the like nature, and all real or personal property under the value of 100*l.*) to the uses and purposes thereafter mentioned—that was to say: First, for payment of the expenses of executing the trust; secondly, for payment of the free annual proceeds of the trust estate to Jane Margaret Lockhart during all the days of her life, and that on her own receipt alone, exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald; thirdly, in case Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald should be the survivor of the spouses, for payment of the whole free annual proceeds of the estate to him during all the days of his life after the death of Jane Margaret Lockhart, declaring that all payments to Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald should be "strictly alimentary," and should "not be assignable nor liable to arrestment or any other legal diligence at the instance of his creditors"; fourthly, on the death of the survivor of the spouses, the trustees should pay over or assign the whole trust funds and estate in their hands to such one or more of the child or children of the marriage as should then be in life, and to the heirs, executors, administrators, and assignees of such one or more of the children as might have died after having attained the age of majority or been married, and that in such proportions and at such times and under such conditions as were thereafter specified in the contract, with the provision that Jane Margaret Lockhart might, out of the sums provided by her under the contract and relative deeds, make grants not to exceed in all the sum of 1000*l.*

The English settlement and the Scotch contract were both executed in Scotland.

On the 23rd Sept. 1862 the marriage was duly solemnised in Scotland.

At the date of the Scotch contract Jane Margaret Lockhart was a domiciled Scotch-woman; at that date—and ever since—Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald was domiciled in England.

Of the trustees, all, except Sir Norman Lockhart, were domiciled in England, he being a domiciled Scotchman.

The trusts of the Scotch contract were administered in England.

There was issue of the marriage one child only—namely, Geraldine Tryphœna Margaret Seymour Vesey Fitzgerald—who was born on the 19th June 1863.

No part of the sum of 6000*l.* which by the English settlement William Robert Fitzgerald had covenanted that his representatives should pay to the trustees thereof after his death, or of the interest thereon, was ever paid to the trustees.

On the 29th June 1866 Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart executed an instrument in Scotch form, known as a deed of directions, and thereby directed "his said" trustees to assign to five trustees, being the trustees other than himself of the English settlement and the Scotch contract, the sum of 6000*l.* for payment of the annual proceeds to Lady Fitzgerald during her life, and upon her decease for payment to the child or, if more than one, then to the children of the said marriage equally between them, share and share alike.

Lady Fitzgerald died on the 16th May 1901.

Between that date and the date of the execution of the English settlement and the Scotch contract there had been numerous dealings by Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald and Lady Fitzgerald and also by Geraldine Tryphœna Fitzgerald with their respective interests under those instruments and also under the deed of directions. Some of the assignments or charges upon the interest of Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald under the Scotch contract were made by him with the concurrence of his wife and daughter.

Subsequently to 1901 Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald further incumbered his life interest under the instruments, and Colonel Frederick Henry Harford was the first mortgagee of the life interest under the Scotch contract.

The following were the particulars of the funds now subject to the trusts of the Scotch contract: Two sums of 6000*l.* and 850*l.* respectively secured by bond relating to heritable or immovable property in Scotland; three sums of 1350*l.*, 1200*l.*, and 750*l.* respectively secured by mortgages of property in England; 709*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* in New Consols; and 908*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* India Three per Cent. Stock.

The Western Life Assurance Company with which the policy of assurance for 4000*l.* was effected as aforesaid, failed many years ago, and nothing was ever received by the trustees of the English settlement in respect thereof. But Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald subsequently either assigned or caused to be assigned or delivered to the trustees a policy for the like amount which had been effected on his life in the London and Provincial Law Assurance Society, which had since been amalgamated with and was now represented by the Guardian Fire and Life Insurance Company Limited. Such last-mentioned policy had since been kept on foot, and was still subsisting.

It was a policy with profits at an annual premium of 95*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, whereas the former policy was one without profits at an annual premium of 79*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* The amount payable under the policy, with bonuses, was considerably more than 4400*l.*

Henry Bullar, Charles James Abbott, Sir Hugh McCalmont Cairns, and Sir Norman Macdonald Lockhart were all dead, leaving Sir Archibald Alison and Gerald Surman the surviving trustees; and they were the sole trustees at the date of the issue of an originating summons, on the 12th Oct. 1901, for the determination of the question whether Sir William Gerald—Fitzgerald was entitled for his life to the income of the trust funds comprised in or subject to the trusts of the Scotch contract free from incumbrances and without power of alienation, or who was now entitled to such income.

The summons also asked for the directions of the court as to the payment of the premiums upon the policy of 4000*l.* upon the life of Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald in the Guardian Fire and Life Insurance Company Limited.

It appeared from an affidavit made by the Right Honourable Andrew Graham Murray, Lord Advocate of Scotland, that by the law of Scotland it was possible for a person to create a life interest in favour of another person, and, by declaring that life rent to be "alimentary," to exclude (so far as the life interest did not exceed in amount a reasonable provision) the diligence of ordinary creditors, and restrain all power of anticipation; so that when, as here, a lady by ante-nuptial marriage contract conveyed her funds to trustees, it was possible for her to create a life rent of these funds in favour of her surviving husband, and to exclude his ordinary creditors and restrain him from anticipation.

The affidavit went on to state that in the Scotch contract the words used in this connection were of ordinary Scottish style, and were appropriate in a Scottish deed to the effect above mentioned; and, further, that these observations were not affected by any consideration as to whether the settled funds were heritable or movable.

As regarded the property settled under the Scotch contract, affidavits of Scotch advocates showed that the original securities, which consisted of bonds for 6000*l.* and 7200*l.* (being bonds secured over heritable property in Scotland), were both heritable or real estate for all purposes down to the 31st Dec. 1868, when the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 101) came into operation, and certain exceptions were introduced as specified in sect. 117 of that statute.

The affidavits further showed that the security for 6000*l.* which still subsisted remained wholly real or heritable estate in the hands of the trustees; and that as regarded the balance of the security of 7200*l.* (this security having been uplifted in 1881)—namely, 850*l.*, which was reinvested in bond and disposition in security over heritable property in Scotland—that sum of 850*l.* was also real or heritable estate in the hands of the trustees; but that this was subject to the Act of 1868, whereby heritable securities, unless executors were expressly excluded, and except in certain respects specified in sect. 117 of the Act—namely, in regard to questions of legitim taxation, rights of courtesy and terce, jus mariti and jus relicte—were made movable or personal as regarded the succession of the creditor; but that the change in the nature or quality of the security from heritable to movable operated only so far as concerned inter-tate succession of the living to the dead provisions juris, and the provision of the statute did not apply to transmissions from a deceased trustee to a nomination substitute.

A contrary affidavit, however, showed that the bonds in question fell within the description of "movable" in a case of testate succession.

It further appeared that the alimentary provision in the Scotch contract would, according to the law of Scotland, be subject to the alimentary claims of those who were dependent upon Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald for alimentary support—namely, the children of the marriage; and that the children of the marriage would have the right, if he failed to maintain them, to attach the alimentary provision made for him under the Scotch contract, such alimentary provision being arrestable for alimentary debts, though not for other debts.

The summons was adjourned into court, and came on to be heard before Joyce, J. in March 1903, when the principal question argued was whether the Scotch contract must be construed according to the law of Scotland or that of England.

His Lordship, in a considered judgment, decided (68 L. T. Rep. 326) that, even if the construction and effect of the Scotch contract were to be determined by the law of Scotland (Re Barnard; Barnard v. White, 56 L. T. Rep. 9), its validity and operation with respect to the matter now in question must be determined by the law of England; that the prohibition against alienation of the alimentary provision was void and inoperative according to English law, being repugnant and contrary to public policy; and that, therefore, Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald's assignees or incumbrancers were the persons entitled to receive payment of the income from the trustees of the Scotch contract.

His Lordship also decided that, with regard to the policy of life assurance comprised in the English settlement, the trustees should surrender the existing policy with profits for a fully paid-up policy for 4400*l.*, the insurance company having notified their willingness to accept such a surrender.

As to the first part of that decision Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald, and as to the second part Geraldine Tryphena Fitzgerald, respectively now appealed.

Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald's appeal first came on to be heard.

A. H. Jessel for the appellant.—In this case a settlement of the property—mainly heritable property in Scotland—of a Scotch lady was made in Scotch form; and she thereby declared that all the interest that her husband was to take thereunder was to be "strictly alimentary," and should "not be assignable nor liable to arrestment or any other legal diligence at the instance of his creditors." If the settlement had been an English one—which it is not, according to my contention—it is conceded that the alimentary provision would be void so far as English law is concerned. But the contract of marriage being in Scotch form, the necessary inference is that the parties intended that the contract should be governed by Scotch law, which protects the husband's life interest subject to aliment, the children of the marriage being entitled to a reasonable amount thereout. The question that has always to be considered in a case of this nature is, What was the intention of the parties at the time when the contract was executed:

Corbet v. Waddell, 7 Rettie's Ct. of Sess. Cas., 4th series, 200;

Chamberlain v. Napier, 15 Ch. Div. 614;

[WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Re Simpson; Simpson v. Simpson (89 L. T. Rep. 542; (1904) 1 Ch. 1).] The court has always applied the rule that contracts are to be treated as valid, although they may contain provisions which are not consistent with the law of the matrimonial domicile, and that doctrine applies to the present case. Assuming that the Scotch contract deals with the Scotch property, the income thereof is cash in the hands of the trustees in England, so that the learned judge in the court below decided that he could hold the alimentary provision void as being inoperative according to English law. That decision is, however, I submit, contrary to Harrison v. Harrison, 28 L. T. Rep. 145; L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 342.

The form of administration has nothing to do with the matter, as the court will give effect to the law of the country whose forms the parties have chosen. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—The case of Harrison v. Harrison (ubi sup.) deals with the descent of Scotch real estates to the heir on an intestacy. There was no question of contract in that case.] Lord Selborne, L.C. in that case was dealing with the whole question of administration: (see p. 348 of L. Rep. 8 Ch. App.). There is Scotch real estate in the present case. Joyce, J. relied on Noell v. Robinson (2 Vent. 358), but that is contrary to Harrison v. Harrison (ubi sup.). I am desirous of distinguishing the case of Scott v. Alnutt (2 Dow. & Cl. 404), which I say does not apply here. The rule which Joyce, J. laid down, quoting from Westlake on Private International Law, 3rd edit., pp. 71, 76, is inaccurate. If that were correct, those cases which have supported the rights of parties under foreign and Scotch instruments would be wrongly decided:

Anstruther v. Adair, 2 My. & K. 513;

Westlake on Private International Law, 3rd edit., p. 72, citing Lansdowns v. Lansdowne, 2 Bli. 60, at p. 87.

The correctness of that passage has been challenged:

Foots on Private International Jurisprudence, 2nd edit., p. 315 et seq.;

De Nicola v. Curlier, 81 L. T. Rep. 733; (1900) A. C. 21.

As to the passage cited by Joyce, J. from Vaizey's Law of Settlements of Property, p. 1640 et seq., that does not assist here. I submit that the authorities upon which I rely show that the law of the place where a contract is made is to be assumed to be the law according to which the parties intended the contract to be construed.

Re FITZGERALD; SURMAN v. FITZGERALD.

[CT. OF APP.]

Badcock, K.C. and T. T. Methold for the respondent Colonel Harford, the first mortgagee.—English law is the law which properly governs this contract, and is the law to be applied here. It is the law by which the parties intended, or may fairly be presumed to have intended, that the contract should be governed:

Dicey's Conflict of Laws, pp. 74, 540, 563.

This is an attempt by means of an instrument in Scotch form to create an interest which is repugnant to English law, for the contract is contrary to the policy of English law, which requires that if a man has a life interest he cannot enjoy it to the exclusion of his creditors:

Graves v. Dolphin, 1 Sim. 66; 27 R. R. 166;

Brandon v. Robinson, 8 Ves. 429, at p. 433; 11 R. R. 226;

Youngusband v. Gisborne, 1 Coll. 400.

The law of the matrimonial domicile applies to the contract of marriage, and is the proper law to regulate the present contract:

Westlake on Private International Law, 3rd edit., pp. 540, 570, 571, 572;

Dicey's Conflict of Laws, pp. 653, 654.

The validity of a marriage contract is determined on the same principles which govern other contracts:

Foley v. Burnell, 1 Bro. P. C. 274; 4 Bro. P. C. 319.

The question affects the rights of English creditors; and if, as we submit, on the authority of the rule stated in Dicey's Conflict of Laws (ubi sup.), the law of the matrimonial domicile is the law according to which a marriage contract or settlement is to be construed, then English law must apply in the present case. And the court will not enforce a contract contrary to the policy of English law; and it will not, as against the English creditors, assist the protected life interest created by the Scotch contract:

Roussillon v. Roussillon, 42 L. T. Rep. 679; 14 Ch. iv. 351;

Re Megret; Tweedie v. Maunder (ubi sup.);

Brook v. Brook, 9 H. of L. Cas. 193, at pp. 212, 218;

Hope v. Hope, 8 De G. M. & G. 731;

Grell v. Levy, 16 C. B. N. S. 73;

Sottomayor v. De Barros, 37 L. T. Rep. 415; 3 P. Div. 1.

There is no question as to the jurisdiction of the English court, and the proper forum is the English court:

Lord Cranston v. Johnston, 3 Ves. 170, at p. 182; 3 R. R. 80.

[COZENS-HARDY, L.J. referred to Holmes v. Godson (8 De G. M. & G. 152).] The selection of the forum is an important consideration; if the court held that this was a valid provision against the claims of creditors, the court would be deciding on the existence of a right, the nature of which is unknown to English law. To say that Miss Fitzgerald has an alimentary right is merely to beg the question at issue. English courts have regard to English rules even when they are construing contracts which purport to be made according to foreign law:

C. Stafford Crossman for the respondent Geraldine Tryphena Fitzgerald.—The daughter of the marriage is an alimentary creditor, and possesses an independent right of asserting her claim against the fund. She has a creditor's right which this court will enforce. The father, in attempting to assign his life interest, has dealt with property over which there is an overriding charge in favour of the children of the marriage; and he must be taken to have assigned, having regard to the alimentary provision, that which does not belong to him.

W. F. Hamilton, K.C. and W. E. Vernon; G. D. Pepys; G. R. Northcote; A. H. Withers; and G. H. Blakesley for the respondents other incumbancers.

A. H. Jessel in reply.—This Scotch contract is a conveyance and not a contract at all. It is a conveyance except as to 500*l.* of real estate, and as to that the lex situs must apply not only to the land, but to all the incidents thereof—that is to say, to the land and to the rents and income. If it were otherwise, the law applicable would vary from time to time according as the investments were varied—at one time the law of Scotland, at another the law of England. The court will involve itself in no such absurdity. Quite apart from any consideration of whether the property in question is movable or immovable, and assuming this instrument to be a contract—every marriage settlement is a contract—the law of the contract determines the law applicable. It is a Scotch contract, and the Scotch law is the proper law of the contract—that is to say, the parties intended it to be governed by Scotch law. If the matrimonial domicile is to be attached that is overborne by the express provision that the law of another country is to apply. If the court holds otherwise, it will be deciding contrary to numerous cases, including the decision in the case before Buckley, J. of Re Bankes; Reynolds v. Ellis (ubi sup.), and in the case before the Court of Appeal of Vidits v. O'Hagan (ubi sup.), and also in the earlier case of Chamberlain v. Napier (ubi sup.). The intention of the parties prevails; the domicile of the husband has nothing to do with the matter. The nature of the instrument here is such that the parties must have intended that it should be construed by Scotch law. [WILLIAMS, L.J.—Can you draw a line between cases in which English courts will enforce and in which they will refuse to enforce foreign law?] Where those cases offend against public policy—as, for instance, where they offend against the morals or the foundations of society or are expressly forbidden by positive law—the court may decline to enforce the provisions of foreign law. Thus, if a contract validly made abroad and intended to be governed by foreign law is of such a nature that it ought not to be permitted according to the law of civilised countries, it will not be enforced by the courts of this country:

Re Missouri Steamship Company Limited; Monroe's Claim, 61 L. T. Rep. 316; 42 Ch. Div. 321, at p. 336;

Kaufman v. Gerson, 88 L. T. Rep. 691; (1903) 2 K. B. 114.

In the present case the alimentary provision is not immoral nor contrary to the policy of the law. There is nothing contrary to the policy of the English law in a person settling property on another so that he shall not alienate it. And there is nothing in the comity of nations to prevent the English court from giving effect to the present contract although it may contain provisions which according to English law are invalid. As to contracts which are void as being against public policy, cases supporting the statement in Dicey's Conflict of Laws as to this point are Geraldine Tryphena Fitzgerald's appeal then came on to be heard.

C. Stafford Crossman for the appellant.—This appeal relates to the policy of assurance on the life of Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald comprised in the English settlement. I ask that some part of the income arising under the Scotch contract should be applied in keeping up that policy. If not the larger premium of 95*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, at least the original premium of 79*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, should be paid as a first charge out of that income.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 7.—The following written judgments were delivered in the appeal by Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., by the desire of Williams, L.J., read his judgment first:—The first question for consideration on this appeal is whether what I may shortly describe as the Scotch settlement is subject to the law of Scotland, or whether it must be governed by English law. Now, this Scotch settlement dealt with the property of a domiciled Scotch lady, who was about to marry a domiciled Englishman, and there is no doubt that the "matrimonial domicile" was English. It is not suggested that a permanent residence in Scotland after the marriage was contemplated. As a general rule the law of the matrimonial domicile is applicable to a contract in consideration of marriage. But this is not an absolute rule. It yields to an express stipulation that some other law shall apply. See Van Grutten v. Digby (31 Beav. 561), in which case the matrimonial domicile was French, but the contract, though made in France and void by French law, was nevertheless treated by Sir John Romilly as valid so far as it related to property within the jurisdiction; see also Viditz v. O'Hagan (80 L. T. Rep. 794; (1899) 2 Ch. 569). The decision in that case was reversed by the Court of Appeal, but not on a ground in any way affecting this point: (see 82 L. T. Rep. 480; (1900) 2 Ch. 87). It is not necessary that there should be an express stipulation. It is sufficient if the court arrives at the conclusion that the parties in fact contracted with reference to some law other than that of the matrimonial domicile. Applying these principles to the Scotch settlement, I find several important indications. (a) The great bulk of the property—viz., 13,200*l.*—was invested in heritable bonds. It has been settled by a chain of authorities, which ought not now to be reviewed by us—viz., by Sir William Grant in Johnstone v. Baker (4 Madd. 474*n.*); by Sir John Leach in Jerningham v. Herbert (4 Russ. 388); and by Sir James Wigram in Allen v. Anderson (5 Hare, 163), that heritable bonds must be regarded in our courts as immovables. If so, it can scarcely be denied that the lex loci—i.e., the law of Scotland—must apply to the extent of the 13,200*l.* I am aware that there has been a change of investment of part of this sum into English securities, but this change cannot alter the law applicable to the settlement. I may add that, as to the 13,200*l.*, the matter does not rest in contract. There is an actual completed assignment of the heritable bonds. (b) There was, however, 500*l.* cash belonging to the lady, which was paid over to the trustees for investment, and which was, in fact, invested in Consols, although it might have been invested in heritable securities in Scotland. It seems to me that this sum cannot fairly be treated as intended to be subject to a different law from that which is applicable to the bulk of the property. (c) The whole frame of the settlement is in Scotch form, and the limitations are of such a nature that they can only take effect if Scotch law is to be applied. I therefore feel bound to treat this as a settlement made in Scotland by a domiciled Scotch lady of Scotch property, in Scotch form, and subject to Scotch law. The trustees of this Scotch settlement must in Scotland follow the Scotch law, and their residence in England, or their English domicile, is irrelevant. This being so, it follows, in my opinion, that we are bound to hold that Sir Gerald Fitzgerald takes such interest, and such interest only, as the courts in Scotland would declare him entitled to: (Anstruther v. Adair, 2 My. & K. 513). There ought to be no difference in a matter of this kind between the Court of Session and the High Court. The nature and extent of his interest cannot depend upon his domicile, although his capacity to deal with his interest may perhaps depend upon his domicile. To take the somewhat analogous case of a life interest in English property given by the will of a domiciled Englishman for the separate use of a married woman, without power of anticipation, it has never, so far as I am aware, been suggested that the nature and extent of her interest varied according as her domicile was, or was not, English. The trust would be regarded in our courts as valid and operative, even though by the law of her domicile neither the separate use nor the restraint upon anticipation was recognised. And, on general principles, the same view ought to be adopted by the courts of the country in which the married woman was domiciled. In short, by the law of England, it is the Scotch law which must be applied to this Scotch settlement. It is, however, strongly urged that a strictly alimentary provision for an adult male is not only unknown to and inconsistent with the provisions of English law, as in general it undoubtedly is, but that it is contrary to public policy, and ought therefore to be wholly disregarded in an English court. I cannot adopt this argument. There is nothing immoral in such a provision. Indeed, there are many instances in which pensions or retiring allowances are by statute made not transferable, or liable to be attached by any legal process. I may refer to the pension allowed to a retiring clergyman under the Incumbents' Resignation Act 1871, and to the observations of the Court of Appeal on that statute in Gathercole v. Smith (44 L. T. Rep. 439; 17 Ch. Div. 1). Moreover, it has been long settled that at common law, and apart from any statutory enactments prohibiting assignment, certain salaries or pensions are inalienable. For example, the half-pay of an officer. In Flarty v. Odum (3 T. R. 681) Lord Kenyon says: "I am clearly of opinion that this half-pay could not be legally assigned by the defendant. . . . Emoluments of this sort are granted for the dignity of the State and for the decent support of those persons who are engaged in the service of it. It would, therefore, be highly impolitic to permit them to be assigned, for persons who are liable to be called out in the service of their country ought not to be taken from a state of poverty. It might as well be contended that the salaries of the judges, which are granted to support the dignity of the State and the administration of justice, may be assigned." In the following year the same question came up for consideration in Lidderdale v. Duke of Montrose (4 T. R. 249). This was an action by an officer on half-pay against the Paymasters-General of the army to recover arrears of his half-pay, and the only question was whether an assignment by way of mortgage, of which the defendants had due notice, justified them in withholding the money from the plaintiff. The court were clearly of opinion that, "on principles of public policy, as well as on account of the interest of the officers themselves, by law such assignments were void." The mortgagee was not party to this action, but it seems to have been thought that he might obtain equitable relief, and he accordingly filed a bill in the Exchequer: (see Stone v. Lidderdale, 2 Anstr. 533). It was argued that the assignment was good in equity, as a transfer of any valuable contingency or possibility, if made for good consideration, is affirmed in equity. But Macdonald, C.J., in a considered judgment, declined to accept this view, and held that the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief in equity in respect of the mortgage. In short, he declined to affect the conscience of the mortgagor in respect of future instalments of the half-pay. In my opinion it is impossible to disregard this "alimentary provision" on the ground of public policy. The Scotch court would declare that the interest given to Sir Gerald cannot be assigned, and would disregard the claim of his specific mortgagees, and it is our duty to follow and adopt the Scotch law: (Anstruther v. Adair, ubi sup.). But then it was urged that Sir Gerald could bind, and did bind, the income as and when it reaches the hands of the trustees in England, and that, whatever might be the rights of his alimentary creditors, he himself ought not to be allowed to claim from the trustees the income which he has, by a contract binding on his conscience, charged in favour of his mortgagees. I doubt whether this doctrine, which is explained and illustrated by Lord Macnaghten in Tailby v. Official Receiver (60 L. T. Rep. 162; 13 App. Cas. 543), has any application to a vested life interest, the assignment of which takes effect, if at all, for reasons wholly independent of conscience. An assignment of a vested equitable interest is complete and operative, though voluntary. It in no way depends upon contract, or upon anything further to be done by the assignor. The doctrine applies only where there is no present property capable of assignment, such as possibilities and expectancies. The case of Stone v. Lidderdale (ubi sup.) is an authority against the respondent's contention, and I know of no authority in its favour. I may observe that the defendant Lidderdale was a domiciled Englishman, whose general capacity to contract was undoubted. Moreover, this contention is really only another way of presenting the argument that we ought to disregard the Scotch law. If the life interest is capable of assignment, the court would grant specific performance of the contract, and would aid the mortgagees by granting an injunction. If, however, as in Stone v. Lidderdale (ubi sup.), the interest is non-assignable, I think it follows that no effect can be given to a deed purporting to assign by way of anticipation. The decision of the House of Lords in Scott v. Allnutt (2 Dow. & Cl. 404), which was relied upon, does not really touch the case. In my opinion, the order of Joyce, J. was wrong, in so far as it declared that the whole of the income during the life of Sir Gerald is payable to his assignees or incumbrancers, according to their respective priorities. If the amount of the income were very large, any excess beyond a reasonable amount would, according to the Scotch law, pass to the assignees or incumbrancers, but I do not understand that it is suggested that there is any excess in the present case. I think the declaration should be to the effect that Sir Gerald is entitled to the whole income during his life, free from the claims of any assignees or incumbrancers, but without prejudice to the rights (if any) of his alimentary creditors, or of Miss Fitzgerald, and without prejudice to any prior payment in respect of the policy, which is the subject of Miss Fitzgerald's appeal.

STIRLING, L.J. then read his judgment, in which he differed from the other learned Lord Justices:—I agree with Cozens-Hardy, L.J. that Sir Gerald and Lady Fitzgerald entered into a contract that their rights in the property of Lady Fitzgerald (who at the time of the marriage was domiciled in Scotland) should be regulated by the Scotch law: (Este v. Smyth, 18 Beav. 112; Chamberlain v. Napier, 15 Ch. Div. 614). That property is now vested in trustees who are domiciled in England. But that circumstance is merely accidental, and cannot, as between the trustees and Sir Gerald Fitzgerald, affect either the duty of the trustees or the rights of Sir Gerald, which must, I conceive, be governed by the law of Scotland; and if a Scotch court would (as I think the evidence shows it would) hold that trustees domiciled in Scotland ought to pay the alimentary provision made for Sir Gerald by the contract in Scotch form of the 20th Sept. 1862 into his hands from time to time as it becomes payable, regardless of the incumbrances which he has purported to create thereon, then, in my opinion, this court ought likewise to hold that such is the duty of the trustees in the present case. If Sir Gerald Fitzgerald were a domiciled Scotchman there would be nothing more to be said. But he was at the date of the marriage, and has ever since been, a domiciled Englishman, and he is now resident within the jurisdiction of the English courts. His capacity to deal with his property is an incident of his status (see Viditz v. O'Hagan, 80 L. T. Rep. 794; (1899) 2 Ch. 569; on appeal, 82 L. T. Rep. 480; (1900) 2 Ch. 87), and, therefore, is governed by English law. By that law, as stated by Lord Macnaghten in Tailby v. Official Receiver (60 L. T. Rep. 162; 13 App. Cas. 523, 543), "it has long been settled that future property, possibilities, and expectancies are assignable in equity for value. The mode or form of assignment is absolutely immaterial, provided the intention of the parties is clear. To effectuate the intention, an assignment for value, in terms present and immediate, has always been regarded in equity as a contract binding on the conscience of the assignor, and so binding the subject-matter of the contract when it comes into existence, if this is of such a nature and so described as to be capable of being ascertained and identified." In Re Coleman (60 L. T. Rep. 127; 39 Ch. Div. 443) this principle was applied to an assignment of an interest under a will to which the assignor became entitled only by virtue of the exercise, from time to time, in his favour of a discretion vested in the trustees of the will. In this respect the capacity of Sir Gerald Fitzgerald is entirely different from that of a domiciled Scotchman, who, according to the law of Scotland, is unable to alienate an alimentary provision any more than, according to the law of England, a retired officer can alienate his half-pay, either at law or in equity, or a retired incumbent the pension allowed to him under the Incumbents Resignation Act 1871, or a married woman separate estate as to which she is restrained from anticipation. In such cases the person entitled to the property in question is by English law incapacitated from dealing with it. But that law does not in general recognise any restraint as regards the property of a man of full age. I cannot see why the English owner of an alimentary provision, created by foreign law, should be held to be incapable of making a disposition of it when it comes to his hands. The foreign law has full effect given to it when it is allowed to determine what ought to come to the hands of the owner in respect of the alimentary provision; after it reaches his hands he is not under any obligation imposed by the foreign law as to how he should apply it, and, as it seems to me, the English law ought to determine whether that which has come to his hands, and become property at his disposal, is to any and what extent subject to obligations arising out of dealings valid according to that law. In my opinion, therefore, an assignment of an alimentary provision, created under foreign law, by will or voluntary deed (inter vivos) in favour of a domiciled Englishman ought to be held by the courts of this country to bind funds coming in respect of that provision to his hands within the jurisdiction of those courts. In the present case the alimentary provision was created by a contract into which Sir Gerald entered for valuable consideration. But I cannot see that this puts Sir Gerald in a better position than if he were a volunteer; for I take it to be clearly settled that the doctrine on which I rely applies to property acquired by contract for value just as much as to property acquired by gift. In my judgment, therefore, an order ought to be made on the lines of that actually made by the Court of Appeal in Re Coleman (ubi sup.), to which I have already referred. But, although I have been unable to satisfy myself that the opinion which I have expressed is opposed to any existing authority, I can adduce no decision in support of it, while the weighty and considered opinions of my brethren are adverse. In these circumstances I cannot regret that my own view is not to prevail.

WILLIAMS, L.J. then read his judgment:—In my judgment the ante-nuptial contract entered into by Sir William Gerald Seymour Fitzgerald, then William Gerald Seymour Fitzgerald, and Miss Lockhart, with the concurrence of her mother Lady Lockhart, ought not to be construed and applied according to English law, which is undoubtedly the law of the matrimonial domicile of the husband and wife, and which law would prima facie determine all questions arising under that marriage contract, but ought to be construed and applied according to Scotch law. It is the intention of the parties, gathered from the terms and circumstances of the contract, which determines the law which governs it, and in my judgment the Scotch form of this contract, coupled with the fact that Miss Macdonald Lockhart at the time of the marriage was a domiciled Scotchwoman and that the property, the subject of settlement, came from her family, is sufficient to displace the prima facie presumption that the law of the matrimonial domicile is to govern the contract. Now, the Scotch law is thus stated by Mr. Murray in his affidavit: "By the law of Scotland it is possible for a person to create a life interest in favour of another person, and by declaring that life rent to be alimentary to exclude, so far as the life interest does not exceed in amount a reasonable provision, the diligence of ordinary creditors and restrain all power of anticipation. When therefore, as here, a lady by ante-nuptial marriage contract conveys her funds to trustees, it is possible for her to create a life rent of these funds in favour of her surviving husband, and to exclude his ordinary creditors, and to restrain him from anticipation." The late Lord Advocate further points out that the non-chargeable nature of such an alimentary life rent would be upheld by the Scottish courts if the question were there raised by a creditor against a Scottish trustee, and says that it is for the English court to determine whether in a question with the English creditors of an English debtor it will give effect to the Scotch law. Assuming, as I do, that Scotch law governs all the rights created by the express or implied force of the words of the contract, it may be that there are rights which operate upon the contractual rights which are governed not by the law which by the disclosed intention of the parties has come to be the "proper law of the contract," determining all questions of its legal effect and construction, but by the law of the actual domicile at the time when any dealing with the property the subject of the contract is attempted, such as questions of personal capacity in cases of minority, coverture, &c. I cannot, however, persuade myself that in this case any question of personal capacity is raised. The case is simply this: That previous to the marriage a contract in the Scotch form, governed as to its legal construction and effect by the law of Scotland, was executed, whereby Miss Lockhart's property was settled upon trust (amongst other things), in case the husband should survive, that the proceeds of the estate should be paid to him for his life, but that all payments to him should be strictly alimentary, and should not be assignable nor liable to arrestment or other legal diligence at the instance of his creditors. These words of the contract limit the interest which the husband is to take, in the same way as in an English marriage contract the wife's interest is made subject to a restriction on anticipation. The restriction on chargeability in either case arises out of the terms of the contract and the trust thereunder. There is no personal incapacity. Neither the wife in the case which I have put, nor the husband in the present case, can claim more under the trust than is given to her or him by the trust. It seems to me that no equity acting on the conscience of Sir Seymour Fitzgerald can enable him in respect of the life income given to him by the trust created by the contract to do that with that income which is impossible for him to do according to the effect of the Scotch contract when construed by the Scotch law. Indeed, in the matter of the comparison of equities, I think that no obligations can bind the conscience of a person taking a life estate bestowed on him by another more strongly than the trust contract containing the conditions under which the donor has bestowed the gift, and this whether the conditions are express or are imposed by the law governing the contract. Anstruther v. Adair (2 My. & K. 513) is really an authority for the proposition that an English court of equity in construing a Scotch contract or enforcing a trust thereunder will not enforce a wife's equity to a settlement against a husband who comes to the court to enforce against the surviving trustee resident in London his right to have a fund transferred to him absolutely as the survivor of his wife by virtue of a clause in the marriage contract. This seems to me in principle to decide that a court of equity in England will not, in contravention of plain provisions in a foreign contract, enforce equities binding the conscience of a beneficiary claiming under that contract. If I am right in holding that in this case no question of personal capacity is raised, and am also right in what I have just said as to a court of equity not enforcing equities which, though binding the conscience of such a beneficiary, are inconsistent with the instrument under which he claims when construed by its proper law—i.e., the foreign law—the only remaining question is whether the provision in this Scotch marriage contract, "that all payments to Sir William G. S. V. Fitzgerald should be strictly alimentary, and should not be assignable nor liable to arrestment or any other legal diligence at the instance of his creditors," so conflicts with what are deemed in England to be essential public interests that such a provision could not be enforced here. This, as I understand, is the ground on which Joyce, J. refused to give effect to this provision. He relies upon the law as stated in sect. 215 of Mr. Westlake's book on Private International Law, that "where a contract conflicts with what are deemed in England to be essential public or moral interests, it cannot be enforced here, notwithstanding that it may have been valid by its proper law." The law thus stated seems to me accurate and to correspond, as pointed out by Mr. Westlake on p. 40 of his book, with art. 6 of the Code Napoleon: "Private contracts cannot derogate from laws which interest public order or good morals." The question in each case is whether the foreign law or the private agreement conflicts with a law in which the public order and good morals concerned are essential enough to call into operation the reservation in favour of stringent domestic policy which, in principle, is recognised and insisted upon by all civilised nations. The English law, in so far as it refuses to give effect to provisions which affect to control the rights of disposition which are attached to an absolute transfer of property, does not seem to me to be a matter regarding public order and good morals. It is, I think, merely a logical development from legal definitions adopted by the English law. But it is true that in its application this law has been made the means of protecting creditors, and yet I do not think that in a country which allows restriction on anticipation in respect of the separate property of a wife it can possibly be said that to enforce a provision in a Scotch contract inconsistent with this law would be contrary to public order and good morals, even though the result might be to defeat the just rights of a creditor. There are other instances to which my attention has been called by the judgments of my brethren, which I have been allowed to read, in which sometimes the Legislature and sometimes the courts at common law have recognised restrictions as inconsistent as those in this Scotch contract with the alleged essential rule of public order and good morals. I agree with the judgment delivered by Cozens-Hardy, L.J.; I cannot agree with the conclusion of Joyce, J.

stay of execution pending an appeal to the House of Lords, on the terms that the appeal should be presented by the end of the sittings, and that out of the arrears of the alimentary provision 200*l.* should be paid to Sir William Gerald Fitzgerald now, and that, pending the appeal, a moiety of the alimentary provision should be paid to him.

March 7.—The following written judgment of the court (Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.J.) in the appeal by Geraldine Tryphena Fitzgerald was then delivered by COZENS-HARDY, L.J. — The appeal of Miss Fitzgerald deals with a point entirely distinct from that raised in the main appeal. By the English settlement, made on the marriage of Sir Gerald, dated the 20th Sept. 1862, a policy upon his life for the sum of 4000*l.* without profits in the Western Life Assurance Company at an annual premium of 79*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* was assigned to the trustees upon trust, in the events which have happened, for Miss Fitzgerald as the only child of the marriage, and Sir Gerald entered into the usual covenants to pay the premium and to keep on foot the policy. By the Scotch settlement of even date the first provision was that the trustees might from time to time apply a sufficient part of the income arising from the trust funds in the Scotch settlement in payment of the premium and such other moneys, if any, as might be necessary for keeping up the said policy or any other policy which might be substituted for it under the provisions contained in the English settlement. In consequence of the failure of the office this policy was dropped. In 1867 a policy for the same amount of 4000*l.*, but with profits, in the London and Provincial Assurance Company, was assigned by Sir Gerald to the trustees upon and for the like trusts, provisions, and agreements in the English settlement declared and contained, or such of them as were capable of taking effect in reference to the said policy. The deed of assignment has been lost, but there is no dispute as to its purport and effect. All premiums have been paid up to a recent date, but the premium on the substituted policy was 95*l.* a year instead of 79*l.*, and the amount payable under the policy with bonuses was considerably more than 4400*l.* The trustees asked for directions with respect to this premium, Sir Gerald not being in a position to pay it; and Joyce, J. has made an order to the effect that a new policy for 4400*l.* without any premium should be substituted for the existing policy. Miss Fitzgerald complains of this, and contends that she ought not thus to be deprived of the benefit of the larger policy, and that she is entitled to require, if not the larger premium of 95*l.*, at least the original premium of 79*l.* to be paid as a first charge out of the income of the Scotch settlement, and that any provision that might be necessary for raising the difference is a mere matter of administration. It seems to us that this contention is well founded. As the deed of assignment of 1877 is not forthcoming, we are not entitled to assume that it contained any covenant by Sir Gerald to pay the larger premium of 95*l.* But we think it is clear that this second policy was validly settled by Sir Gerald, and that neither he nor anybody claiming under him could take it out of settlement on the ground that it was more beneficial than the original policy. And Miss Fitzgerald is not to be bought off by giving her a policy for 4400*l.*, which is 400*l.* more than the policy originally settled. She can claim the full benefit of the policy which was settled in 1867, and which has been kept up by Sir Gerald for more than thirty-five years. This being so, it cannot be right that, at the instance of the mortgagees of Sir Gerald's life interest, income available for keeping up the policy should be diverted from that purpose. The proper course would have been to direct the trustees to pay 79*l.* a year out of the income of the trust funds, and to arrange either with the office or with someone else to advance the small difference as a first charge on the policy: (Re Leslie; Leslie v. French, 48 L. T. Rep. 564; 23 Ch. Div. 552). Unfortunately this cannot now be done, because the policy has, pursuant to the order of Joyce, J., been surrendered. From inquiries which have been made since the hearing of the appeal, it seems that the surrendered policy cannot be revived or restored. Under these circumstances the only relief which we can give to Miss Fitzgerald is to direct the trustees out of the income of the Scotch settlement to pay her the annual sum of 79*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* as from the date of the surrender of the policy during the life of Sir Gerald. Mr. Badcock's clients must pay Miss Fitzgerald's costs of this appeal.

Will—Forfeiture—Endowment for National school—Gift over in event of school becoming subject to the control of a school board—Education authority—Education Act 1902 (2 Edw. 7, c. 42), ss. 1, 5, 6, sub-s. 2, 7, sub-s. 1 (d), 13.

A testator, who died in 1891, bequeathed certain shares in a bank to trustees "upon trust to pay and apply the interest or income thereof in or towards the annual expenses of" a national school so long as it was "supported by voluntary subscriptions as now and heretofore in addition to the Government grant," with a gift over in the event of the school "ceasing to be so supported or becoming subject to the control of a school board." Since the death of the testator the necessity for subscriptions had practically ceased owing to the bequest, but the managers were in debt to a small extent. By the Education Act 1902 school boards were abolished, and public elementary schools came under the control of the county council as the education authority.

Held, that there had been no forfeiture on either of the grounds mentioned by the testator, and that the gift over did not take effect.

(c) Reported by E. L. HOPKINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

This was an application by the trustees of the will of the late G. H. A. Beard for the opinion of the court as to the effect of the Education Act 1902 upon a trust for the endowment of the Leonard Stanley National Schools, Gloucestershire. The testator died in May 1891. By his will testator bequeathed to the managers for the time being of the Leonard Stanley National Schools thirty shares in the County of Gloucester Bank Limited, to be held by the said managers with power to vary investments, "upon trust to pay and apply the interest or income thereof in or towards the annual expenses of the said schools so long as the said schools shall be supported by voluntary subscriptions as now and heretofore (or by a voluntary rate) in addition to the Government grant; but in the event of the said schools ceasing to be so supported or becoming subject to the control of a school board," then the testator declared, directed, and bequeathed that the said bank shares, or the investments for the time being representing the same, should go and be transferred or paid to the vicar and churchwardens for the time being of the parish of Leonard Stanley, to be held and applied by them, in their absolute discretion in or towards the repairs, improvements, or restoration of the fabric of the parish church.

The thirty bank shares had been duly transferred by the executors into the names of the managers for the time being of the Leonard Stanley National Schools, and still stood in the names of the present managers as trustees of this fund, which produced an income of about 115*l.* per annum.

These particular schools were the only public elementary schools in the parish of Leonard Stanley.

The school-house was provided by voluntary subscriptions, and was erected upon land belonging to a private owner for which the owners paid a rental of 1*s.* per annum.

There was no trust deed, but the schools were founded and had always been conducted as Church of England schools.

Up to the death of the testator in May 1891 the schools had had no endowment except a sum of 15*l.* per annum, and the remainder of the expenses of the schools, other than such as were defrayed by the Government grant, had been provided by voluntary subscriptions, the testator in his lifetime being one of the most generous supporters of the schools.

Since the death of the testator the income from the thirty bank shares had generally proved sufficient, with the 15*l.* and the Government grant, to support the schools without the necessity for private subscriptions. During the last few years there had been a small annual deficit, at the present time amounting to about 63*l.*, which had been provided for by an overdraft at the bank, for which the managers were personally responsible.

By the Education Act 1902, s. 7, sub-s. 1 (d), the managers of a school have to provide funds for keeping the school-house in good repair, and making such alterations and improvements in the buildings as may reasonably be required by the local education authority, and there was evidence that some portion of the income of the fund or voluntary subscriptions, or both, would be needed for this purpose. It also appeared that the income of the fund and the 15*l.*, together with the increased Government grant provided by sect. 10, sub-sect. 1, would probably be more than sufficient to provide for the maintenance of the schools, without any necessity for further help from the rates.

In consequence of the passing of the Education Act 1902, the question now arose whether the income arising from the said thirty bank shares should, as from the appointed day mentioned in the Act, continue to be applied towards the annual expenses of the schools, or be otherwise dealt with as directed by the Act, or whether the bank shares and dividends thereon from that date should be transferred and paid to the vicar and churchwardens for the time being of the parish, to be applied by them in accordance with the trusts of the will.

By the Education Act 1902 (2 Edw. 7, c. 42):

Sect. 1. For the purposes of this Act, the council of every county and of every county borough shall be the local education authority.

Sect. 5. The local education authority shall, throughout their area, have the powers and duties of a school board and school attendance committee under the Elementary Education Acts 1870 to 1900 and any other Acts, including local Acts, and shall also be responsible for, and have the control of, all secular instruction in public elementary schools not provided by them: and school boards and school attendance committees shall be abolished.

Sect. 6 (2). All public elementary schools not provided by the local education authority shall, in place of the existing managers, have a body of managers consisting of a number of foundation managers, not exceeding four, appointed as provided by this Act, together with a number of managers, not exceeding two, appointed (a) where the local education authority are the council of a county, one by that council and one by the minor local authority; and (b) where the local education authority are the council of a borough or urban district, both by that authority.

Sect. 7 (1) (d). The managers of the school shall provide the school-house free of any charge, except for the teacher's dwelling-house (if any) to the local education authority for use as a public elementary school, and shall, out of funds provided by them, keep the school-house in good repair, and make such alterations and improvements in the buildings as may be reasonably required by the local education authority: Provided that such damage as the local authority consider to be due to fair wear and tear in the use of any room in the school-house, for the purpose of a public elementary school, shall be made good by the local education authority.

Sect. 13 (1). Nothing in this Act shall affect any endowment, or the discretion of any trustees in respect thereof: Provided that, where under the trusts or other provisions affecting any endowment, the income thereof must be applied in whole or in part for those purposes of a public elementary school for which provision is to be made by the local education authority, the whole of the income or the part thereof as the case may be, shall be paid to that authority: . . . (2) Any money arising from an endowment and paid to a county council for those purposes of a public elementary school for which provision is to be made by the council, shall be credited by the council in aid of the rate levied for the purposes of this part of the Act in the parish or parishes which, in the opinion of the council, are served by the school for the purposes of which the sum is paid, or, if the council so direct, shall be paid to the overseers of the parish or parishes in the proportions directed by the council and applied by the overseers in aid of the poor rate levied in the parish.

Re BEARD'S TRUSTS; BUTLIN v. HARRIS.

[CHAN. DIV.]

The only question argued upon this application was whether, in the events which had happened, the gift over to the vicar and churchwardens took effect.

Cave for the trustees of the fund.

W. Baker for the present managers.—Owing to the generosity of the testator, there is not now the same need for subscriptions as formerly, but subscriptions will be necessary to provide a fund for the repair of the school buildings in accordance with sect. 7, sub-sect. 1 (d) of the Education Act 1902. The managers will have to subscribe or obtain subscriptions to clear off the debt to the bank, therefore the schools have not ceased to be supported by voluntary subscriptions within the meaning of the trust, and no forfeiture has taken place on this ground. Sect. 5 of the Act expressly abolishes school boards, so the new education authority is not a school board, and the event contemplated by the testator—namely, that the school might become subject to the control of a school board, has not yet happened.

George Lawrence, for the Gloucestershire County Council, adopted the above argument. So long as the schools are not wholly supported by public moneys the gift stands, and the income of this fund is still applicable towards the expenses of these schools.

Gutty for the vicar and churchwardens.—The gift over takes effect on the happening of either of the two events specified by the testator. The schools have ceased to be supported by voluntary subscriptions as heretofore, because since the testator's death subscriptions have not been required. The schools have come under the control of the local education authority, which is only a school board under another name. The county council is substituted for the school board. On both these grounds there has been a forfeiture, and the fund ought to be transferred to the vicar and churchwardens in accordance with the trust.

BYRNE, J.—In this case the testator made his will in 1886, and thereby gave and bequeathed to the managers for the time being of the Leonard Stanley National Schools thirty shares in the County of Gloucester Bank Limited, the same to be held by the said managers, with power to vary investments, upon trust to pay the income thereof in or towards the annual expenses of the said schools, so long as the said schools should be supported by voluntary subscriptions; but in the event of the said schools ceasing to be so supported, or becoming subject to the control of a school board, a gift over. The testator died in 1891. During his lifetime he appears to have found moneys when wanted for the purposes of these schools. The schools are built upon property in respect of which a rent of only 1s. a year is paid, and there were a certain number of subscriptions. As to what the amounts were and when they were paid I have no information; but up to the time of the testator's death moneys were found by himself and by others for the purposes of the schools as required. There was in the testator's lifetime an endowment bringing in about 15*l.* a year, which was applicable to the purposes of the schools, and which has been continued up to the present time. After the testator's death, a Mr. Jones found moneys from time to time for the schools when wanted, but there has never been any occasion to call for subscriptions generally, or to get annual subscribers, except to this extent, that year by year there has been some small sum over and above the receipts to be expended, and it appears that the managers have on their own credit obtained an overdraft from the bank to make the extra payments. In all these years there is somewhere about 60*l.* due to the bankers. That is a sum which, unless the money is forthcoming, the managers have taken upon themselves the liability to pay, and, therefore, if the bank should require them to pay the money, and they were to pay it, they would have no right to get the money back from anyone else, and they would in fact become subscribers for the necessary amount. Now in consequence of the gift of the testator, and in consequence of the passing of the Education Act of 1902 (if those funds given by the testator are available, in addition to the old endowments and in addition to the Government grant provided by sect. 10 of the Act of 1902), there will be ample funds for carrying on these schools properly without having to call for any further subscriptions, and, indeed, perhaps enough to pay off in a short time the sum due to the bankers for past over-expenditure. It is argued on behalf of the vicar and churchwardens that the gift over has taken effect, by reason of the fact that there has been nothing like a receipt of subscriptions, either annually or otherwise, for the period I have mentioned, and, further, that the gift over takes effect either if the schools "cease to be supported by voluntary subscriptions as now and heretofore in addition to the Government grant," or in the event of its becoming "subject to the control of a school board." With reference to the latter, I am satisfied that that event has not taken place, because this school has never yet come under the control of a school board. The local education authority is now the county council. It has many duties formerly discharged by the school boards; but the Act expressly abolishes school boards in so many words. The new education authority is now a different body from the former school board. It has a different constitution and different rights and powers. The question is, Can the schools be said now to be "supported by voluntary subscriptions as now and heretofore in addition to the Government grant"? How were they supported before the testator's death? They were supported by voluntary subscriptions so far as the endowment was not sufficient. Now the testator, knowing the position of affairs, gave only the income of this fund in or towards the annual expenses of the schools so long as they "shall be supported by voluntary subscriptions as now and heretofore." That is, in aid of the endowment for the time being existing; and it appears to me that he must have contemplated that these subscriptions that he referred to would only be such subscriptions, if any, as were necessary, with the endowment, to support the schools. In my opinion there has not yet been any forfeiture under this clause, and consequently the trustees are not bound to transfer this fund to the vicar and churchwardens.

Administration—Bankruptcy and Chancery rules as to distribution of surplus—Insolvent estate—Master's certificate—Estate originally insolvent enabled through fund falling in to pay principal of all debts—Interest payable by law—Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 40—Order LV., rr. 62, 63.

An estate originally insolvent, and so found by the master's certificate in an administration action, was augmented through a fund falling in through the court's setting aside a settlement, and so became able to pay the principal of all debts, but not the full interest even on debts that carried interest at law.

Held, that interest must be paid according to the bankruptcy and not the Chancery rules.

Re Henley (75 L. T. Rep. 307) not followed.

SUMMONS.

On the 13th Feb. 1899 an order was made for the administration of the estate of William Augustus Whitaker, deceased. The plaintiffs were Susannah Matilda Maria Whitaker and others, and the defendants were John William Palmer, executor of the will, and others. The case is reported on another point 83 L. T. Rep. 342; (1900) 2 Ch. 676, and, on appeal, 83 L. T. Rep. 449; (1901) 1 Ch. 9.

It was there certified by the master that two settlements of 5000*l.* and 14000*l.* made by the testator and dated the 1st Oct. 1889 and 21st Dec. 1896 were debts, and it was held in that case that they ranked pari passu with the other creditors, the one estate being deemed to be insolvent. By a deed of covenant of the 30th Aug. 1886 the testator on his marriage with Miss Bryant covenanted to pay her an annuity of 400*l.* per annum, and he subsequently made a voluntary settlement of property on her by an indenture dated the 5th Oct. 1894. By an order of the 29th July 1902, on a second further consideration of the action, the voluntary settlement was declared void against creditors, except in so far as it was necessary to secure the annuity. It was ordered that an annuity should be purchased for her and the rest of the money paid into court. The effect of this decision was that the estate, which was formerly held to be insolvent, became solvent, and that there was a balance of about 400*l.* or 500*l.* to the good. The solicitors of the Cardiff branch of the London and Provincial Bank, who were creditors for a large amount, raised the point whether, in view of the fact that in their case interest was payable by law, while in the case of the other creditors it was only payable under the rules of the court, the bank would be entitled to be paid its interest first, as would be the case if the Chancery rules prevailed. The surplus would not be sufficient to pay the interest of this debt in full. A summons raising the question was taken out and adjourned into court.

S. B. L. Druce for the trustees of the voluntary settlement.

E. Ford for the London and Provincial Bank.—The fact that there is a surplus ousts the bankruptcy rules and makes the Chancery rules apply. The case is covered by Order LV., r. 63.

T. L. Wilkinson for creditors whose debts did not carry interest by law.—The rules of bankruptcy still apply, for the estate is insolvent in that it cannot pay interest on a debt which by law carries interest. In Re Henley the estate was able to pay interest in full on all debts that by law carried interest. Re Whitaker (83 L. T. Rep. 449) is an authority that the bankruptcy rules apply when an estate is insolvent.

E. P. Hewitt for a creditor of the same class.—Even where an estate is unable to pay the costs of administration, the bankruptcy and not the Chancery rules apply:

FARWELL, J.—This is in some way a difficult case. Before the Judicature Act, the rules in bankruptcy and in the Court of Chancery differed as to the payment of interest in the case of an insolvent estate. Sect. 10 of the Judicature Act 1875 provides that "in the administration by the court of the assets of any person who may die after the commencement of that Act and whose estate may prove to be insufficient for the payment in full of his debts and liabilities, and in the winding-up of any company under the Companies Acts 1862 and 1867 whose assets may prove to be insufficient for the payment of its debts and liabilities and the costs of winding-up, the same rules shall prevail and be observed as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors and as to debts and liabilities provable and as to valuation of annuities and future and contingent liabilities respectively as may be in force for the time under the law of bankruptcy. Is this estate now insufficient to meet the debts and liabilities of the deceased debtor? It was insufficient originally when the estate was being administered, but since then a settlement has been set aside, and the estate has been increased by an unexpected fund, so that it is now able to pay the principal of all debts. But there is not a surplus available to pay all interest due up to the date of payment in respect even of debts that carry interest at law. As a matter of fact, is the estate insufficient? Has every creditor who has come in been paid everything that he was entitled in any way to be paid as interest? I think that it is clear that the estate is insolvent within the meaning of sect. 10. I should therefore hold that the bankruptcy rules apply, but I am told that North, J. decided to the contrary in Re Henley (ubi sup.), and I am asked to follow that decision. Now, Rigby, L.J. in Re Whitaker (1901) 2 Ch., at p. 12) says: "Sect. 10 provides (among other things) that the rules for the time being in force in bankruptcy as to debts provable shall apply in the administration by the High Court of the estate of a deceased insolvent. Upon the true construction of the words I think they do not deal simply with the proof of debts. The same rules are to prevail 'as to debts and liabilities provable.' I cannot read these words as meaning simply 'as to the proof of debts and liabilities.' I think they mean that, whatever general rules are in force in the Court of Bankruptcy for the time being with regard to debts and liabilities provable shall apply in the administration of insolvent estates in Chancery." It is said that interest in this case would not be provable in bankruptcy. This in a way is true. Still the creditor gets it there as something incidental to his provable debts. I think, however, that Rigby, L.J. intended to show the true construction of the section in the Judicature Act—that it was broader than was supposed in cases like Re Maggi (46 L. T. Rep. 362; 20 Ch. Div. 545). It would be a curious result if, following the decision of North, J. in Re Henley, the court were on one set of principles to pay the principal debts owing, and on another set of principles to pay the interest due thereon. As to that decision, it may be distinguishable from this case on the grounds urged in the argument, that there the estate was actually solvent, for it was able to pay all principal debts and all legal interest, though unable to pay what may be called bounty interest. In my opinion, however, this is immaterial. Even if the case were the same as the case here, it would be inconsistent with Re Whitaker. I do not, therefore, follow it, and I hold that the surplus is distributable according to the bankruptcy rules.

LAWSON v. REYNOLDS AND OTHERS. (a)

Justices—Mayor of borough—Borough justice ex officio—County Justice sitting within the borough—Mayor's right to preside—Borough business—Municipal Corporations Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), ss. 154, 155.

If a borough has no separate commission of the peace, so that the mayor is a borough justice virtute officii, he is not entitled to take the chair at a sitting within the borough of county justices where the court is sitting as a petty sessional division, the fact that the offence being tried was committed entirely within the borough makes no difference.

The expression "business of the borough," as used in the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, s. 155 (2), means the business which a court assembled by the mayor of a borough transacts. The business of a court sitting as a petty sessional division is county business and remains so, although the particular case being tried might have been treated as borough business.

The principle of R. v. Sainsbury (1791, 4 T. R. 451) applied.

By Royal Charter, dated the 17th Aug. 1903, the Urban District of Hornsey was constituted a borough. The creation of this borough took effect on the 9th Nov. 1903, and the plaintiff was on that day elected mayor of the borough.

By virtue of holding that office he became a borough justice, and on the same day he duly took the oath of allegiance and the judicial oaths required to be taken by a justice in accordance with sect. 157 (2) of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882.

The new borough forms part of the Highgate petty sessional division of the county of Middlesex. There is no separate commission of the peace for the borough, and there has been no grant of a separate court of quarter sessions of the peace to the borough.

For some years the justices of the county have sat at a court house situate in Archway-road, within the borough of Hornsey, where they have held special petty sessions for the Highgate Division.

The plaintiff claimed to be entitled under sect. 155 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882 to take the chair at the meetings of the county justices at the court house whenever business arising out of acts committed within the borough was being transacted.

The county justices passed a resolution on the 25th Nov. 1903 of which the following is a minute:

The justices are not prepared to admit the right of the mayor to take the chair during the hearing of cases arising in the borough.

The justices, however, intimated to the plaintiff that they were prepared to consider any claim made on his behalf to take the chair for any specific business arising within the borough.

On the 9th Dec. 1903, when the county justices had met in the ordinary course at the court house for the transaction of the business of the petty sessional division, the plaintiff claimed to take the chair for the trial of a youth charged under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 54 (15), with throwing stones to the damage or danger of any person. This offence had been committed within the area of the borough.

The defendants (being the justices of the county then present) refused to admit the plaintiff's claim.

The plaintiff thereupon commenced this action, the writ being issued on the 11th Dec. 1903.

The following sections of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, in addition to sect. 155, which is set forth in extenso in the judgment, were referred to in the course of the argument:

Sect. 15 (5). He shall, subject to the provisions of this Act respecting justices, have precedence in all places in the borough.

"He" in the above sub-section is "the mayor."

Sect. 154 (1). Where a borough has not a separate court of quarter sessions, the justices of the county in which the borough is situate shall exercise the jurisdiction of justices in and for the borough as fully as they can or ought in and for the county.

Sect. 156. It shall be lawful for the Queen, on the petition of the council of a borough, to grant to the borough a separate commission of the peace.

Sect. 157 (1). It shall be lawful for the Queen, from time to time, to assign to any persons Her Majesty's commission to act as justices in and for each borough having a separate commission of the peace. (2) A justice for a borough shall not be capable of acting as such until he has taken the oaths required to be taken by justices, except the oath as to qualification by estate, and made before the mayor or two other members of the council a declaration, as in the eighth schedule. (3) He must, while acting as such, reside in or within seven miles of the borough, or occupy a house, warehouse, or other property in the borough.

Sect. 158 (1). A justice for a borough shall, with respect to offences committed and matters arising within the borough, have the same jurisdiction and authority as a justice for a county has under any local or general Act with respect to offences committed and matters arising within the county; except that he shall not, by virtue of his being a justice for the borough, act as a justice at any court of gaol delivery or quarter sessions, or in making or levying any county or borough rate.

Macmorran, K.C. and E. Beaumont for the plaintiff.—We submit that the plaintiff is clearly entitled to the right he now claims in view of the wordings of sect. 155 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882. The older statute—viz., the Municipal Corporations Reform Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) only provided by sect. 57 that the mayor of a borough should have "precedence in all places within the borough." This was held in Ex parte the Mayor of Birmingham (3 L. T. Rep. 270; 30 L. J. 2, Q. B.) to refer only to social and not magisterial precedence. The present Act goes further, and, after providing that the mayor shall have precedence "over all other justices acting in and for the borough," sect. 155 goes on: "And be entitled to take the chair at all meetings of justices held in the borough at which he is present by virtue of his office of mayor; except that he shall not by virtue of this section have precedence over the justices acting in and for the county in which the borough or any part thereof is situate, unless when acting in relation to the business of the borough." This can only relate to magisterial precedence. Where, as in this case, there are no quarter sessions nor commission of the peace, the county justices and the mayor and ex-mayor have concurrent jurisdiction within the borough; the mayor and ex-mayor being borough justices ex officio (Municipal Corporations Act 1882, ss. 154, 155)—that is, county justices, with their powers limited to a special locality, viz., the borough: (Mayor of Reigate v. Hart, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 244, 248). This exactly brings the case within the wording of the exception in sect. 155 (2), and the mayor is therefore entitled to preside when the justices are acting in relation to the business of the borough. The sole question becomes, therefore, what is "business of the borough." We submit that it is any business which comes before the justices for transaction and which has arisen entirely within the borough. Just such a case in fact, as this offence of throwing stones within the borough: (see the definition of "borough business" in 17 & 18 Vict. c. 20, ss. 2, 16.) They also referred to

Reg. v. Whittles, 1849, 13 Q. B. 248;

Wilson v. Strugnell, 45 L. T. Rep. 219; 7 Q. B. Div. 548;

Municipal Corporations Act 1882, s. 15 (1).

Warmington, K.C. and Danckwerts, K.C. (Eustace Hills with them) for the defendants.—Sect. 155 (2) of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882 does not give the mayor the right to preside at petty sessions. The mayor and ex-mayor can hold sittings in their borough, and the mayor is then entitled to preside, even though assisted by county justices. Here the county justices were meeting to take petty sessional business and not borough business, and the mere fact that a certain offence to be tried was committed within the borough does not alter the business from petty sessional to borough business as suggested. If "business of the borough" was intended to mean what has been suggested, why was not the expression in sect. 158, "offences committed and matters arising within the borough," employed? A consideration of the old common law position will throw light on what was meant by borough business. The original position of borough justices, who could, since 27 Hen. 8, c. 24, be appointed by Royal Charter alone, is clearly seen by the cases of

R. v. Sainsbury, 1791, 4 T. R. 451;

Jones v. William, 1825, 3 B. & C. 762;

R. v. Amos, 1819, 2 B. & Ald. 533.

From these we see that the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, in dealing with this subject, was to a great extent declaratory. Sect. 154 (1) stated the recognised position in boroughs where there were no quarter sessions. Then sects. 156, 157, 158, 159, and 160 state how a separate commission of the peace is obtained, and deal with the position of borough justices in such a case, and lay down what had been long recognised at common law, that the borough justices and county justices were to have concurrent jurisdiction. Sect. 155 (1) deals with the case where there is no commission of the peace, and exact that the mayor and ex-mayor shall be borough justices virtute officii, and it is submitted that the intention of the Act was to give them the status of borough justices, as set forth in the subsequent sections and no more. Sect. 155 (2) must then relate to the position when there is a separate commission of the peace for the borough, while the exception in that sub-section exactly covers a case like the present, and gives no precedence to the mayor, because borough business was not being transacted. The county justices had assembled to transact business of the petty sessional division, that is county business. They had seisin of the jurisdiction in the business before them as being county business, and in accordance with R. v. Sainsbury (ubi sup.) no part of that business could be intercepted by the borough justices and treated as borough business. We submit, therefore, that the plaintiff's contention must fail. They also referred to Macmorran, K.C. in reply.

March 1.—FARWELL, J. delivered the following written judgment:—The Mayor of Hornsey claims a declaration that he is entitled, by virtue of sect. 155 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, to precedence over all justices of the peace for the county when sitting at petty sessions within the borough and acting in relation to the business of the borough under the following circumstances. The borough of Hornsey forms part of the county of Middlesex, and was incorporated by Royal Charter of the 17th Aug. 1903. The plaintiff was duly elected mayor of the borough on the 9th Nov. 1903, and has taken the oath of allegiance and the judicial oaths required to be taken by a justice of the peace for the borough and also by a justice of the peace for the county. The borough has not a separate court of quarter sessions, nor has it a separate commission of the peace, and the county justices continue to hold petty sessional courts for the Highgate Division in exactly the same way as they held them before the incorporation, and their jurisdiction is in no way abridged or affected by the incorporation. The question turns on the true construction of sect. 155 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, which is as follows: "(1) The mayor shall, by virtue of his office, be a justice for the borough, and shall, unless disqualified to be mayor, continue to be such a justice during the year next after he ceases to be mayor. (2) The mayor shall have precedence over all other justices acting in and for the borough, and be entitled to take the chair at all meetings of justices held in the borough at which he is present by virtue of his office of mayor; except that he shall not, by virtue of this section, have precedence over the justices acting in and for the county in which the borough or any part thereof is situate, unless when acting in relation to the business of the borough, or over any stipendiary magistrate engaged in administering justice." The Act obviously contemplates that the mayor will sit with the county justices, and gives him the right to take the chair at all meetings of justices held in the borough at which he is present virtute officii, and not merely at meetings of borough justices, for, having regard to the exception, I cannot read "justices" as if it were "such justices." This right to attend meetings of the county justices is in accordance with the general law as laid down in R. v. Amos (1819, 2 B. & A. 533), and stated by Lord Blackburn in Mayor of Reigate v. Hart (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 244, at p. 248), that in a borough where there is no court of quarter sessions and no non-intromittant clause in the charter (which is this case) the justices of the borough have no exclusive jurisdiction within the borough and no jurisdiction beyond the borough, but act in ease and in aid of the county justices, so far as they act upon what are at the same time borough and county offences, and all acts that the borough justices can do can be done by the county justices. The county justices and the borough justices have exactly the same powers and authorities, but the ambit of the exercise of such powers is different—that of the county justices includes, and that of the borough justices is limited to, offences committed within the borough. They may act together (per Lord Kenyon, R. v. Sainsbury, 4 T. R. 451, at p. 456), and the county justices cannot lawfully exclude the borough justices (Reg. v. Williamson, 7 Times L. Rep. 534), and the county justices can, if they please, sit with the borough justices in petty sessions for the borough and dispose of borough business. This brings me to the consideration of the exception. I observe that the sub-section begins by giving precedence and the right to take the chair, while the exception specifies precedence only, and I do not forget that under the Act 5 and 6 Will. 4, c. 76, it was held that words giving precedence only applied to social and not to magisterial precedence, e.g., Ex parte Mayor of Birmingham (30 L. J. 2, Q. B.), but I do not think that it is possible so to limit the exception, having regard to the reference to business. The next question, to my mind, is, "What is meant by 'the business of the borough?'" The facts in the present case, and on which alone I express an opinion, are as follows: On the 9th Dec. 1903 the county justices for the petty sessional division of Highgate sat at Hornsey in petty sessions. The business of the court included an information laid against Gerald Herman for throwing stones within the borough on a summons against Herman signed by a county justice. On the case being called on the mayor claimed the right to take the chair on the ground that he was entitled so to do on all cases in which the offence had been committed within the borough. His right was not admitted, and this action is brought to establish such right. I am of opinion that the mayor has no such right. The court was sitting as a petty sessional division, not as petty sessions. The summons was granted by a county justice, and the county justices had full jurisdiction to deal with the case. The fact that if there were a mayor and ex-mayor, so as to constitute a quorum, they could have sat in petty sessions (see Reg. v. Whittles, 1849, 13 Q. B. 248, at p. 254) and have granted a summons to bring the prisoner before them does not make the trial of this offence business of the borough. It was, in fact, business of the county, and not the less so because it might in certain events have been dealt with as business of the borough. Even if there were a quorum of borough justices, they could not as such try the case after the jurisdiction of the county justices had attached. When a case has once been earmarked as county business or borough business by the issue of a proper summons to appear before the county or the borough tribunal, as the case may be, the county justices or the borough justices, as the case may be, have seisin of it, and the other body of justices, although having concurrent jurisdiction, cannot intercept the case. The question before me is governed, in my opinion, by the decision of the Court of King's Bench in R. v. Sainsbury (4 T. R. 451), that where two sets of magistrates have a concurrent jurisdiction and one appoints a meeting to grant ale licences, their jurisdiction attaches so as to exclude the others, although both might sit together. In that case the mayor and some of the aldermen of the City had by charter jurisdiction in Southwark, but as the charter contained no non-intromittant clause the justices of Surrey had a concurrent jurisdiction. Lord Kenyon, at p. 456, says: "But another question has arisen and which is proper should be settled, whether it be legal (for whether it be decent or decorous no person can doubt) for two sets of magistrates, having a concurrent jurisdiction to run a race in the exercise of any part of their jurisdiction? It is of infinite importance to the public that the acts of magistrates should not only be substantially good, but also that they should be decorous. The facts in this case are shortly these: Some of the justices for the county of Surrey, having before them the statute of 26 Geo. 2, and knowing that the licences ought to be granted on a certain day and time, appointed a day, the 4th Sept., for licensing alehouses in this division, on which day they accordingly held their meeting; and certain of the magistrates of the City of London, who in general are competent to this purpose, appointed another meeting on a subsequent day. But the jurisdiction of the justices who had appointed the first meeting had attached before this time; not, indeed, so as to exclude the City justices from acting at the first meeting, for they might all have acted together; but it excluded the City justices of their jurisdiction to act on the subsequent day. On the general question, therefore, I am clearly of opinion that the Surrey justices and the magistrates for the City have a co-ordinate jurisdiction within this district; and that the meeting of the City justices in this case was illegal, the jurisdiction of the other magistrates having first attached." In my opinion the mayor in the case before me could not issue a summons against, or hold a petty sessions for the borough on, a prisoner already summoned before the county justices, because the jurisdiction of the latter had already appropriated it as county business, and by parity of reasoning he cannot be heard to intervene and say that it is borough business for the purpose of founding upon it a claim to take the chair at a meeting of the county justices sitting for the petty sessional division to try it. It was, in fact, ab initio and remained throughout county business. In the same way, if there were a borough petty sessions and the summons had required the prisoner to attend there, the county justices could not have intercepted it, and if they had chosen to sit at the borough sessions the mayor would have taken the chair. The result is that the action fails and is dismissed with costs.

Re KING; TRAVERS v. KELLY.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Re KING; TRAVERS v. KELLY. (a)

Will—Construction—Settlement estate duty payable on personalty—Direction to pay testamentary expenses—Finance Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28), s. 19, sub-s. 1.

A testator who died in 1899, by his will made in 1895, bequeathed legacies to three sons "free of all duties," and then bequeathed legacies of larger amounts to his daughter and two younger sons without adding the words "free of all duties," and directed his daughter's legacy to be retained by the trustees and held upon the same trusts as her share of residue thereafter given to her. He then gave his residuary real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust for conversion, and directed that out of the proceeds of sale the trustees should pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and legacies and the legacy duty thereon, and should stand possessed of the residue in trust for his daughter and his two younger sons. He afterwards settled the daughter's share upon trusts for the benefit of herself and issue.

Upon an originating summons taken out by the trustees for the determination of the question whether the settlement estate duty payable on the daughter's settled legacy and settled share of residue was payable out of that legacy and share of residue or out of the general residuary estate: Held, that the settlement estate duty was not a testamentary expense, and was payable out of the settled property and not out of the general residuary estate.

JOHN KING, who died on the 26th March 1899, by his will made on the 11th Nov. 1895 gave certain pecuniary and specific legacies, and then gave to each of his sons, John W. King and Henry M. King, a legacy of 12,000*l.* "free of all duties," and to his daughter Annie M. C. Kelly, then and therein described as Annie M. C. King, and two younger sons, Arthur Herbert King and Alfred Philip King, the legacy of 20,000*l.* each, the expression "free of all duties" not being repeated in the case of the last-mentioned legacies. The will then settled the two legacies of 12,000*l.* each upon certain trusts for the benefit of the legatees and their respective families; and the legacy of 20,000*l.* given to his daughter was directed to be retained by the trustees and held upon the same trusts as the daughter's share of residue. The testator devised his residuary, real, and personal estate upon trusts for conversion, and directed that out of the proceeds of sale the trustees should pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and legacies, and the legacy duty thereon, and should stand possessed of the residue in trust for his three younger children, the said Annie M. C. Kelly, Arthur H. King, and Alfred P. King, in equal shares. The will then contained a settlement of the daughter's share of residue for the benefit of herself and issue.

This was an originating summons taken out by the trustees of the will for the determination of the question whether upon the true construction of the will the settlement estate duty payable on the settled legacy of 20,000*l.* and on the settled share of the residuary estate thereby bequeathed on trusts for the benefit of Annie M. C. Kelly and her children, ought to be paid out of the testator's general residuary estate, or whether such duty was payable out of such settled legacy and settled share of the residuary estate.

The settlement estate duty in question had already been paid by the trustees in pursuance of the provisions of the Finance Acts 1894 to 1900.

The testator's daughter Annie M. C. Kelly married on the 28th July 1900, and had issue one child, a daughter.

Stuart Bevan, for the trustees, stated the facts.

George Lawrence for Mrs. Kelly and her child.—The settlement estate duty on the settled legacy of 20,000*l.* bequeathed to Mrs. Kelly, and on the settled share of residue given to her and her children, is payable out of the testator's general residuary estate. The will directs the trustees to pay his testamentary expenses out of the proceeds of sale of his residuary estate, and settlement estate duty is a testamentary expense and is included in that direction. A direction to pay estate duty includes the payment of settlement estate duty:

Re Leveridge; Spain v. Lejoindre, 85 L. T. Rep. 458; (1901) 2 Ch. 830.

And a direction to pay testamentary expenses includes payment of estate duty on personalty, which must be paid before a grant either of probate or administration is obtained:

Re Treasure; Wild v. Stanham, 83 L. T. Rep. 143; (1900) 2 Ch. 648.

Re KING; TRAVERS v. KELLY.

[CHAN. DIV.]

In Re Sharman; Wright v. Sharman (84 L. T. Rep. 859; (1901) 2 Ch. 280) it was decided that estate duty payable in respect of real estate was not a "testamentary expense" within a direction contained in a will of a testator, who died after the Land Transfer Act 1897, for payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, out of his personal estate, but Kekewich, J. said in his judgment that the argument was that "on the principle of Re Clemow (ubi sup.) the estate duty on real estate is not a testamentary expense, because it is not required to be paid by the executor in order to obtain probate," and "applying, therefore, the principle of Re Clemow (ubi sup.) to this case, I think, on this part of the argument, that the expression 'testamentary expenses' does not include estate duty payable in respect of real estate." But in Sharp v. Lush (10 Ch. Div. 468), Jessel, M.R. gives testamentary expenses a wider meaning, stating that he could not distinguish between "executorship expenses" and "testamentary expenses," and that the former were expenses incident to the proper performance of the duty of an executor in the same way as testamentary expenses were, neither more nor less. In Re Prince; Godwin v. Prince (78 L. T. Rep. 790; (1898) 2 Ch. 225) Stirling, J. referred to the fact that since the Land Transfer Act the Probate Division has jurisdiction to deal with realty as well as personalty. In Re Dixon; Penfold v. Dixon (85 L. T. Rep. 622; (1902) 1 Ch. 248) it was held that estate duty on a reversionary fund appointed by a testator under a power was not payable by his executors. In Re Maryon-Wilson; Wilson v. Maryon-Wilson (82 L. T. Rep. 171; (1900) 1 Ch. 565) the settlement estate duty was decided to be payable out of the settled fund; but that does not alter the principle that settlement estate duty is a testamentary expense. It is now made payable out of the settled property unless the will contains an express provision to the contrary; and is payable within six months after the testator's death, or such further time as the commissioners may allow:

Finance Act 1896, s. 19.

Roll for Arthur H. King and Alfred P. King, the other residuary legatees.—The question is whether there is in this case express provision to the contrary under sect. 19 (1) of the Finance Act 1896 so as to prevent the duty from being payable out of the settled property. Settlement estate duty is not a testamentary expense like estate duty, as estate duty must be paid in order to obtain probate, while settlement estate duty is not paid until after probate has been taken out. This is the distinction made in

Re Maryon-Wilson; Wilson v. Maryon-Wilson (ubi sup.);

Re Clemow; Yeo v. Clemow (ubi sup.).

There are two other authorities on the question, Re Lewis; Lewis v. Smith (82 L. T. Rep. 291; (1900) 2 Ch. 176) and Re Duke of St. Albans; Loder v. Duke of St. Albans (1900) 2 Ch. 873, in which settlement estate duty was distinguished from estate duty and not treated as a testamentary expense. The testator has shown an intention that the legacy of 20,000*l.* is not to be paid free of duty, and the onus lies on the legatees to prove that the settlement estate duty on their legacies is payable out of residue. It is not a testamentary expense, but in the same position as legacy duty under the Legacy Duty Act.

George Lawrence in reply.—The case of Re Lewis; Lewis v. Lewis (ubi sup.) is not an authority on the question whether settlement estate duty is a testamentary expense, and that point was not raised in Re Duke of St. Albans (ubi sup.). The question here is: Is it part of the executor's duty, as executor, to pay settlement estate duty? The right answer is yes, and therefore settlement estate duty is a testamentary expense.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 26.—EADY, J. stated the facts as above set out, and continued:—Mrs. Kelly contends that the executors and trustees ought to pay out of residue the settlement estate duty on the 20,000*l.* legacy and share of residue settled on her and her issue. The owners of the other two third shares of residue contend that the duty must be borne by the settled property. Having regard to the provisions of sect. 19, sub-sect. 1, of the Finance Act 1896, the settlement estate duty must be paid out of the legacy and share of residue unless the will contains an express provision to the contrary. The gift "free of all duties" does not apply to the 20,000*l.* legacy. Reliance was, however, placed upon the direction contained in the will to pay "testamentary expenses" out of residue, and it was urged that the case of Re Leveridge; Spain v. Lejoindre (85 L. T. Rep. 458; (1901) 2 Ch. 830) decided that settlement estate duty was estate duty, and that Re Clemow; Yeo v. Clemow (82 L. T. Rep. 550; (1900) 2 Ch. 182) decided that estate duty was included in a direction to pay testamentary expenses, and therefore that settlement estate duty was a testamentary expense, and ought in the present case to be paid out of residue. It was, however, pointed out by Kekewich, J. in Re Clemow that estate duty takes the place of probate duty, and in Re Treasure; Wild v. Stanham (83 L. T. Rep. 142; (1900) 2 Ch. 648) the same learned judge stated (at p. 653) that the previous decision was based entirely on the reasoning that as payment of estate duty was essential to obtaining a grant of probate, that duty must be considered as much a testamentary expense as any other payment necessarily or properly incurred by the executors for that purpose. It is clear that probate duty was a testamentary expense: (Davies v. Fowler, 29 L. T. Rep. 285; L. Rep. 16 Eq. 308). On the other hand, it has been held that estate duty on real estate is not a testamentary expense, as executors are not bound to pay it in order to obtain probate: (Re Sharman; Wright v. Sharman, 84 L. T. Rep. 859; (1901) 2 Ch. 280). Settlement estate duty is not payable in order to obtain probate, sub-sect. 2 of sect. 19 of the Finance Act 1896 allowing in every case six months after the death within which it may be paid, and in my opinion it has no analogy to probate duty. Then how can the settlement estate duty be considered a "testamentary expense"? In Sharp v. Lush (10 Ch. Div. 468) Sir George Jessel said that he could not distinguish between "executorship expenses" and "testamentary expenses," and that executorship expenses were expenses incident to the proper performance of the duty of the executor, in the same way as testamentary expenses were, neither more nor less. After burying the deceased, the first duty of the executor is to prove the will, and formerly the probate duty was, and now the estate duty is, a payment which must be made before probate can be obtained, as it must be paid on delivering the Inland Revenue affidavit, or affidavit made for probate. The settlement estate duty is not then payable. The executor is made accountable for the settlement estate duty, and he must accordingly see that the duty is paid before parting with the legacy or share of residue, or assenting to the bequest; but in like manner the executor is also accountable for and liable to pay legacy duty, on retaining or paying legacies, and certainly it cannot be contended that a direction in a will to pay "testamentary expenses" would extend to legacy duty on legacies not otherwise expressed to be given free of legacy duty. In Re Lewis; Lewis v. Smith (82 L. T. Rep. 291; (1900) 2 Ch. 176) it was held that a direction in a will to pay "testamentary expenses, including all duties payable by law out of my estate," did not include settlement estate duty. Again, in Re Duke of St. Albans; Loder v. Duke of St. Albans (1900) 2 Ch. 873, where the will contained a direction to pay funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, legacies, and annuities out of residue, and charged the real estate with any deficiency, it was held by Stirling, J. that the settlement estate duty on certain contingent legacies, which were to be treated as settled, must be borne by the legatees, in accordance with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Maryon-Wilson (82 L. T. Rep. 171; (1900) 1 Ch. 565). In my judgment a direction to pay "testamentary expenses" does not extend to settlement estate duty, and therefore the will in question does not contain any express provision within the meaning of sub-sect. 1 of sect. 19 of the Finance Act 1896. The duty must be borne by the settled property.

Re CLAYTON ENGINEERING AND ELECTRICAL CONSTRUCTION COMPANY LIMITED. (a).

Company—Debenture-holders' action—Insufficient assets—Cost of second mortgage debenture-holders made defendants.

In an action by first mortgage debenture-holders of a limited company, in which the company and the second mortgage debenture-holders were made defendants, the assets proved insufficient to satisfy the claims of the first mortgage debenture-holders.

On the further consideration of the action the question was raised whether the second mortgage debenture-holders made defendants ought to be allowed their costs.

Held, that the second mortgage debenture-holders made defendants were not entitled to costs.

THE action was commenced in April 1902 by the plaintiff George Boddington, on behalf of himself and all other the holders of an issue of 20,000l. first debentures of the company, against the company and the holders of second mortgage debentures thereof, claiming: An account of what was due to the plaintiff and all other holders of the first mortgage debentures; a declaration that such first mortgage debentures constituted a charge on the undertaking and property of the company; that the security of the first mortgage debentures should be enforced; a receiver and manager; and further relief.

On the 8th Nov. 1902 judgment was obtained in accordance with the plaintiff's claim, and on the 8th Dec. 1903 the master made his certificate stating the result of the proceedings under the judgment.

The company had entered into voluntary liquidation in Oct. 1901, and a liquidator was then appointed for the purposes of such winding-up.

On the 15th Dec. 1903 a summons was taken out by one of the defendants to vary the master's certificate, which summons came on to be heard with the further consideration of the action on the 27th Jan. 1904.

It then appeared that the assets of the company were insufficient to satisfy the claims of the holders of the first mortgage debentures; and the question was raised whether the holders of the second mortgage debentures who were made defendants were entitled to any costs.

Sargant for the plaintiff.—The second mortgage debenture-holders made defendants are not entitled to any costs, but must look to the surplus (if any):

Palmer's Company Precedents, 9th edit., vol. 3, p. 710;

Mortgage Insurance Corporation v. Canadian Agricultural, &c., Company Limited, 84 L. T. Rep. 861; (1901) 2 Ch. 377;

Percy Wheeler for the first mortgage debenture-holders other than the plaintiff.—The first mortgage debenture-holders attending are admittedly entitled to their costs.

Errington for the second mortgage debenture-holders made defendants.—The second mortgage debenture-holders made defendants ought to be allowed their costs. The rule as stated in Palmer's Company Precedents is not established by the case of Mortgage Insurance Corporation v. Canadian Agricultural, &c., Company Limited (ubi sup.)

EADY, J.—The rule is correctly stated in Palmer's Company Precedents, 9th edit., vol. 3, p. 710, that "The defendant company in a debenture or debenture stock action is not entitled to costs unless, indeed, the action fails: Mortgage Insurance Corporation v. Canadian Agricultural, &c., Company Limited, 84 L. T. Rep. 861; (1901) 2 Ch. 377). The company must look to the surplus; nor are second debenture-holders made defendants entitled to costs; they also must look to the surplus" is correct. This is similar to the rule which applies to actions respecting mortgages where subsequent incumbrancers are made defendants; but when subsequent incumbrancers are plaintiffs different considerations arise. In the present case the second debenture-holders are made defendants and are not entitled to costs.

APLIN v. STONE. (a)

Will—Construction—Gift to daughter or her children—Attestation by daughter's husband—Failure of gift to daughter's children—Wills Act 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 15.

A testator who died in 1886 by his will, which was attested by the husband of one of his daughters, directed that after the death of his wife, which happened in the lifetime of that daughter, half of his freehold estate should go to that daughter or her children.

Held, that as the gift to that daughter was void by virtue of sect. 15 of the Wills Act 1837, the gift to her children also failed.

WILLIAM GRANGER by his will, dated the 20th Aug. 1885, after giving to his wife Mary Ann Granger an annuity of 40*l.* for life, charged on his freehold estate in Surrey, and providing that the remainder should be divided between his daughter Hannah Doble's children until the decease of his wife, proceeded as follows:

And after the decease of my wife Mary Ann Granger the whole of the freehold estate shall be equally divided, one half to my daughter Hannah Doble's children and one half to my daughter Ellen Norton or her children. I also give, devise, and bequeath unto my said wife, the said Mary Ann Granger, her executors, administrators, and assigns, my leasehold property consisting of all furniture and the full benefit of the policy of insurance effected upon my life and all other property that I may be possessed of at the time of my decease: and on and after the decease of my wife Mary Ann Granger, whether before or after me, her property shall fall to my daughter Ellen, but subject to the payments of my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and I appoint my said wife and my said daughter Ellen executors of this my will.

One of the attesting witnesses to the will was John Norton, the husband of the testator's daughter Ellen, who was married to him on the 10th Jan. 1884, and by whom she had four children, all infants.

The testator died on the 31st Jan. 1886, and the will was proved on the 23rd Feb. 1886 by the testator's widow, Mary Ann Granger, and his daughter Ellen Mary Norton, in the will described as Ellen Norton, the executrixes therein named.

Mary Ann Granger died on the 26th Jan. 1903.

An action for partition or sale of the testator's freehold estate was commenced on the 14th Dec. 1903, the plaintiffs and defendant being persons claiming under the gift to the children of the testator's daughter Hannah Doble; and on the 6th April 1903 judgment was given directing (inter alia) inquiries as to the persons entitled to the testator's freehold property, and the estates, interests, shares, and proportions to and in which they were respectively entitled.

By the master's certificate, dated the 14th Dec. 1903, made in pursuance of the judgment in the action, it was certified that Ellen Mary Norton was entitled to one half of a moiety of the testator's freehold property in fee simple as co-heiress at law of the testator, and that Robert Doble was entitled to the other half of such moiety in fee simple as co-heir at law of the testator.

This was a summons taken out by Ellen Mary

Norton and her children, who had been served with notice of the judgment and had appeared in the action, asking that the master's certificate might be varied by striking out the finding that Ellen Mary Norton was entitled to one half of one moiety of the fee simple of the testator's freehold property as co-heiress at law of the testator, and that Robert Doble was entitled to the other half of such moiety as co-heir at law of the testator, and by inserting a finding or statement that the said Ellen Mary Norton was entitled to the whole of such moiety as devisee under the testator's will, or (alternatively) that the infant applicants were entitled to such moiety as devisees under the said will.

Austen-Cartmell for Ellen Mary Norton and her children.—The gift must be read as a gift to Ellen Mary Norton, or, if for any reason the gift to her fails, then to her children. Therefore, as the gift to Mrs. Norton is blotted out by the effect of sect. 15 of the Wills Act, her children take. The cases of Jull v. Jacobs (35 L. T. Rep. 153; 3 Ch. Div. 703) and Lainson v. Lainson (18 Beav. 1) show that this applies to the real estate, and Evestaff v. Austin (19 Beav. 591) shows that the same rule prevails with respect to personalty. The decision in Lainson v. Lainson (ubi sup.) was approved by Chitty, J. in Re Townsend's Estate; Townsend v. Townsend (55 L. T. Rep. 674; 34 Ch. Div. 357). [EADY, J.—These decisions all refer to reversionary gifts, and do not apply to the present case.] In Re Clark (53 L. T. Rep. 591; 31 Ch. Div. 72) the rule was applied to an alternative gift.

Gatey for the parties to the action.—This is the case of an immediate alternative gift, and the cases of Jull v. Jacobs (ubi sup.), Lainson v. Lainson (ubi sup.), Evestaff v. Austin (ubi sup.), and Re Townsend's Estate; Townsend v. Townsend (ubi sup.), which are cases of reversionary gifts, have no application; and Re Clark (ubi sup.) is the case of a gift to a life tenant and remainderman. The gift must first be construed as it stands, and must be construed as a gift to Mrs. Norton, if living, or to her children if she is not living. Therefore, as Mrs. Norton is living, she is, on the right construction of the will, the absolute devisee; and the fact that the gift to her is void by virtue of sect. 15 of the Wills Act does not entitle her children to take under the gift.

EADY, J.—The effect of sect. 15 of the Wills Act is that the devise to Ellen Norton is null and void. It is argued that the effect is that the gift to Ellen Norton must be treated as blotted out, so that the alternative gift to her children takes effect immediately. The first answer to this argument is that the Wills Act does not say it is to have this effect. The second answer is that if the words containing the gift are blotted out, there is nothing to identify the children who are to take. Jull v. Jacobs (ubi sup.) merely decided that where there was a gift to a daughter for life, and a direction that after her death the money should be equally divided among her children, the daughters attesting the will accelerated the gift to the children. Malins, V.C. referred to Lainson v. Lainson (ubi sup.), a decision of Lord Romilly, who said: "Although the expression used is that the estate to the son of John Lainson is only to take effect from and after John Lainson's decease, I am of opinion that the meaning is from and after the determination of his estate by death or otherwise." In Re Townsend (ubi sup.) Chitty, J. expressly approves of this decision. In the particular case before him the tenant for life had no children, and Chitty J. held that under these circumstances there was an intestacy. Neither of these cases is any authority for the proposition that if there is an absolute gift to A. if then living, but, if A. is not living, to B., B. would take though A. was living, because A.'s interest failed. The case before Chitty J. is rather an authority the other way. In Re Clark (ubi sup.) Bacon, V.C. construed the gift as to the daughter for life with remainder to her children. The gift in the will being to Ellen Norton if living absolutely, but, if she is not living, to her children, I am asked to treat this as a gift to her children although she is living. The proper way is first to construe the will and ascertain what interests are given, and then to apply sect. 15 of the Wills Act. I am not at liberty to disregard the gift to Mrs. Norton. She takes absolutely in the events which have happened, and there is an intestacy as to her share. The result is her children do not take.

OLIVER AND ANOTHER v. CAMBERWELL BOROUGH COUNCIL. (a)

Public Health (London)—Nuisance—"Intimation" notice by inspector to abate—Compliance with "intimation" without statutory notice—Work which sanitary authority ought to have done—Compulsion—Right of owner to recover expenses as for work done under compulsion—Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 3, 4.

An owner of premises received a written intimation under sect. 3 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, duly signed by the officer of the sanitary authority, making known to him the existence of a nuisance at his premises and requesting him to abate the same within seven days otherwise the sanitary authority would commence proceedings against him by the service of a statutory notice. The owner, without waiting for the service of the statutory notice under sect. 4 of the Act requiring him to abate the nuisance, did the necessary works to abate the nuisance, in the course of which he discovered that the work was a sewer and not a drain, but without communicating with the sanitary authority he completed the work, and brought an action against the sanitary authority to recover the expenses as for work done by him under compulsion which the sanitary authority were legally compellable to do.

Held, but only on the authority of Thompson and Norris Manufacturing Company v. Hawes (59 J. P. 580), that work done under an "intimation" given under sect. 3, is not work done under compulsion, and that as the owner had not waited for the statutory notice under sect. 4, but had done the work under the "intimation" notice, the work was not done by him under compulsion, and he was not entitled to recover the expenses of the work.

Quere, whether, if an owner wrongfully converts that which is properly a drain, for the repair of which he would be liable, into a sewer, he could recover from the sanitary authority the expenses of work done by him to the sewer under compulsion of the sanitary authority.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the Lambeth County Court.

The action was brought to recover a sum of 17l. 13s. for work done by the plaintiffs on a sewer, and the plaintiffs sought to recover that sum from the Camberwell Borough Council, on the ground that they were compelled to do certain work which the council were legally liable to do, and that therefore there was an implied undertaking on the part of the council to repay the plaintiffs for the work so done.

The inspector of the borough council had given to the plaintiffs, as owners of the premises No. 117, High-street, Peckham, a notice to abate a nuisance at those premises. This notice was an "intimation" notice under sect. 3 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

The notice was as follows:

The Vestry of Camberwell—Public Health (London) Act 1891—Intimation—Public Health Department, Vestry Hall, Camberwell—18th March 1903—To the owner, 117, High-street, Peckham,—Take notice, that I, the undersigned, having visited the above premises, find that the nuisances numbered, nine, twelve, twenty-one, thirty-eight, and forty, in the schedule at the back hereof which are liable to be dealt with summarily, exist thereon. I therefore now by this written intimation, make the existence of the said nuisances known to you, as being the person who is required to abate them. And I have to request that the same be abated within the period of seven days. At the end of this time I shall again visit the premises, and if the necessary works have not then been completed, the vestry, as the sanitary authority for the parish, will commence proceedings against you by the service of a statutory notice.—I am your obedient servant, EDWARD HOMER, the officer appointed by the vestry of the said parish to take proceedings under the above-named Act.

The notice was a printed notice, with the numbers of the nuisances complained of written in. On the back of the notice was a "schedule of nuisances," and the nuisances complained of in the notice were:

The water-closet so defective as to be a nuisance; insufficient external ventilation to water-closet; the waste-pipe of sink directly connected with the drain; the drain defective: the drain unventilated.

The plaintiffs did the works required, and in the process of executing the works discovered that the work was a sewer and not a drain, and that therefore the liability to repair it was upon the local authority, and not the plaintiffs, and that the local authority were liable for the expenses of carrying out the repairs.

The plaintiffs then sued the defendants for the recovery of the expenses, upon the ground that they were by the above notice compelled by the defendants to execute works which the defendants themselves, as the local authority, were legally compellable to do.

The County Court judge found as a fact that the plaintiffs knew that the work was a sewer and that they did not raise the question in

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[K.B. Div.]

OLIVER AND ANOTHER v. CAMBERWELL BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[K.B. Div.]

proper way to the borough council, and he also found that the council did not know that it was a sewer until after the work was done.

The judge held that the notice was a mere intimation, and not a statutory notice such as the section requires; that this intimation gave the person receiving it a chance to raise the question whether the work was a drain or a sewer, but that that question was not raised by the plaintiffs; that an intimation of this character, to give an opportunity of raising the question of drain or sewer, was a very different matter from a statutory notice of compulsory steps to be taken; that the intimation was a mere statement, and could not be considered a statutory notice, and that that being so there was no compulsion on the plaintiffs to do this work, but on the contrary it was their duty to raise the issue whether the work was a sewer or a drain, and that it was impossible to hold that under those circumstances the plaintiffs could afterwards come to the court and compel the borough council to pay for these repairs.

He therefore gave judgment for the defendants upon that ground.

There was a further question raised by the defendants, namely, that the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs had, by their own wrongful act, converted that which was properly a drain into a sewer, and as that had been done the drain did not become a sewer so far as concerned the liability of the sanitary authority to keep it in repair.

As to this the judge said that there was the further question of wrongdoers; he found as a fact that plans were submitted to construct these drains in a certain way; that these plans were wilfully disregarded, and drains were deliberately constructed of an entirely different kind. It was alleged that the plaintiffs were not the representatives of the wrongdoers; but on the evidence the inference was that the plaintiffs were the representatives of the wrongdoers; that there was not sufficient evidence before him on this point, and he therefore could not give judgment upon it.

The plaintiffs appealed.

The Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76) provides:

Sect. 3. Information of a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily under this Act in the district of a sanitary authority may be given to that authority by any person, and it shall be the duty of every officer of that authority and of every relieving officer, in accordance with the regulations of the authority having control over him, to give that information; and it shall be the duty of the said authority to make the said regulations, and also the duty of the sanitary authority to give such directions to their officers as will secure the existence of the nuisance being immediately brought to the notice of any person who may be required to abate it, and the officer shall do so by serving a written intimation.

Sect. 4 (1). On the receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily under this Act, the sanitary authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or, if such person cannot be found, on the occupier or owner of the premises on which the nuisance arises, requiring him to abate the same within the time specified in the notice, and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose, and, if the sanitary authority think it desirable (but not otherwise), specifying any works to be executed. (4) Where a notice has been served on a person under this section, and either—(a) the nuisance arose from the wilful act or default of the said person; or (b) such person makes default in complying with any of the requisitions of the notice within the time specified, he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding ten pounds for each offence, whether any such nuisance order as in this Act mentioned is or is not made upon him.

Naldrett for the plaintiffs.—The question is whether the notice of the 18th March, which was served on the plaintiffs as owners of the premises, was a sufficient compulsion on the plaintiffs to do this work on a drain which was found to be a sewer, so as to make the work so done work done under compulsion. The nuisances section is sect. 2 of the Act of 1891, which in sub-sect. 1 (a) provides generally that any premises in such a state as to be a nuisance, or injurious or dangerous to health, and (b) that any drain, &c., in the same condition, shall be liable to be dealt with summarily as nuisances. Sects. 3 and 4 deal with the giving of notice of nuisances to the sanitary authority and of serving notice on the owner to abate the same; and the definition of drain and sewer for these purposes is given in sect. 250 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855. If the notice is given under sect. 3, then sect. 4 specifies what is to take place if the notice is not complied with. The authorities go sufficiently far to cover the case of a notice given under sect. 3. There is no doubt that, when a notice is given under sect. 4 to abate the nuisance, there is a sufficient compulsion to entitle the person doing the work to recover the expenses of doing work which the sanitary authorities were themselves bound to do.

Andrew v. St. Olave's Board of Works, 78 L. T. Rep. 504; (1898) 1 Q. B. 775.

That case followed Gebhardt v. Saunders (67 L. T. Rep. 684; (1892) 2 Q. B. 452), in which the notice was under sect. 4, and the court there held that the work was done under compulsion, and that therefore the plaintiff could recover. [WILLS, J.—The question is whether a notice under sect. 3, with the liability to be proceeded against under sect. 4, which prima facie follows, is a sufficient compulsion.] The decision in Gebhardt v. Saunders (ubi sup.), which was under sect. 4, has to be carried further, so as to make it apply to an intimation notice given under sect. 3. In Proctor v. Islington Metropolitan Borough (67 J. P. 164), where an intimation notice was served, in consequence of which the plaintiff carried out works, some of which afterwards turned out to be repairs to a sewer which it was the defendants' duty to maintain, Wright, J. seems to have held that the plaintiff could not recover because she had not carried the work out under compulsion, but the Court of Appeal intimated an opinion—though they did not decide the point—that the works carried out under this intimation notice were done under compulsion, and the notice in that case was under sect. 3 and in very much the same terms as the present notice. The principle is very clearly dealt with by Channell, J. in North v. Walthamstow Urban Council (67 L. J. 972, Q. B.), which came under the Public Health Act 1875, in which there is no provision similar to this intimation notice in sect. 3 of the Act of 1891. The notice there was a notice by the sanitary inspector,

OLIVER AND ANOTHER v. CAMBERWELL BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[K.B. Div.]

but it was not a statutory notice. Channell, J. there says (at p. 976): "I may add that I am inclined to think that there was no statutory notice in this case, and to agree with the defendants' contention that the document in question was only an intimation of what they proposed to do." Notwithstanding that he held that work done under that intimation notice was work done under compulsion, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover upon that ground. Again, if a wrongful act was done by the builder of this house, whereby what ought to have been a drain was turned into a sewer, the plaintiffs are not estopped by the wrongful act of their predecessors in title from alleging that this drain was a sewer.

The onus rests on the local authority to show that the plaintiffs knew of any fraud. The whole point is whether the intimation notice was a sufficient compulsion. It is submitted that from the terms of the notice it was a sufficient compulsion and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the expenses of the works.

Courthope-Munroe for the defendants.—The learned judge has found that the plans of these drains which had been submitted were wilfully disregarded, and drains of an entirely different character were constructed. That was a fraud on the local authority, and that wrongful act does not make this pipe, which is properly a drain, a sewer, and it is not conceded either that this pipe is a sewer or that the local authority are liable for the repair of it. In Butt v. Snow (89 L. T. Rep. 302), Channell, J. said that he knew of no authority which went so far as to say that a person who had himself wrongfully turned a drain into a sewer could thereby throw the burden of repairing it on the local authority. The drain remained a drain, and did not really become a sewer at all: (Butt v. Snow, ubi sup.; Gorringe v. Mayor of Shoreditch, 112 L. T. 576). But even if this was a sewer the plaintiffs cannot recover, as the work was not done under compulsion—the notice being an intimation only under sect. 3. In Harris v. Hickman (89 L. T. Rep. 722; (1904) 1 K. B. 13), the very point arose before Wright, J. under these two sections (sects. 3 and 4) of the Act of 1891. The notice there, as in this case, was an intimation under sect. 3, and not the statutory notice under sect. 4, and there it was held that the work was not work done under compulsion. Wright, J. said: "It appears that the only notice with respect to this nuisance that was issued to the plaintiffs was a mere intimation of the existence of the nuisance under sect 3 of the Act of 1891. That notice could not operate as a notice under sect. 4, for it was only signed by the inspector, and did not purport to be issued by the sanitary authority at all. This distinguishes the present case from Andrew v. St. Olave's Board of Works (ubi sup.). There a notice was served under sect. 4. . . . He was consequently practically compelled to do the work. Here there was no compulsion at all." So that the very point which arises in this case was there decided. Sect. 4 applies to the whole of London, and is in the same terms as the corresponding section (sect. 94) of the Public Health Act 1875; but in addition there is for London this intimation notice under sect. 3, which has nothing corresponding to it in the Act of 1875. Assuming that the notice went beyond sect. 3, then, in so far as it did so, it was merely a notice by the officer and not by the sanitary authority: (St. Leonard Vestry v. Holmes, 50 J. P. 132). There are three cases which support the view that on the notice under sect. 3 there is no compulsion—namely, Harris v. Hickman (ubi sup.) and Proctor v. Mayor of Islington (18 Times L. Rep. 505), being the decision of Wright, J., that the notice being an intimation, the work was not done under compulsion, and that the plaintiff could not recover the expenses; and when this case went to the Court of Appeal (ubi sup.) the court really did not decide the point in the opposite sense, as what was done there was done by consent of the parties. The third case is Thompson and Norris Manufacturing Company v. Hawes (59 J. P. 580), where the Court of Appeal (Lindley, Lopes, and Rigby, L.J.J.) held that the notice then in question, which was under sect. 3, was, as Lindley, L.J. expressed it, a warning notice, and did not place the party receiving it under any compulsion to do the work, and that consequently the expenses could not be recovered. There are no decisions against the defendants on this notice under sect. 3. The decisions against them are decisions on the statutory notice under sect. 4. Gebhardt v. Saunders (ubi sup.) and Andrew v. St. Olave's Board of Works (ubi sup.) were both decisions under sect. 4, and are distinguishable upon that ground, being based entirely on the notice under sect. 4. The other cases referred to, such as North v. Walthamstow Urban Council (ubi sup.), are based on the Act of 1875, which has no provision corresponding to sect. 3 of the Act of 1891. The form of the notice under the Act of 1875 is given in sched. 4 (form A), and the form of notice under sect. 4 of the Act of 1891 is given in sched. 3 (form A), and these forms are wholly different from the notice in the present case. As long as this was a notice under sect. 3 the plaintiffs were not bound to do anything. What they ought to have done when they found that this was a sewer was to have stopped work and to have gone to the local authority and have said to them that the work was not a drain but a sewer, and that they were not liable to repair it. In Ellis v. Bromley Rural District Council (63 J. P. 711), which was under the Act of 1875, it was held that, where there was no notice but where work was done under the verbal instructions of the surveyor, there was no compulsion and no right to recover expenses. With regard to the question that this pipe was not a sewer, but was still a drain, it is not raised. The work not having been done under compulsion, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. Naldrett in reply.—The notice itself is in such terms that it leaves no doubt that this was the kind of compulsion that is referred to by Channell, J. in North v. Walthamstow Urban Council (ubi sup.), a decision which covers this case absolutely, so that so far as this court is concerned there would seem to be a conflict of authority. Self v. Hove Commissioners (ubi sup.) is distinguishable, as there there was no legal liability on the local authority to do the work, as, the work being a drain, the legal liability to do the work was on the owner.

WILLS, J.—I confess to giving the decision I am about to give with some reluctance, because I do not agree with it, and, if I were free from authority I should not agree with it. But I can hardly think that the decision of this question is really open to us after the decision in the Court of Appeal in Thompson and Norris Manufacturing Company v. Hawes (ubi sup.). It is quite true that decision does not go entirely upon the point now in question, but the point now in question was distinctly raised and is distinctly dealt with in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., because there can be no doubt that he had before him a notice which was substantially in the same form as the notice in the present case. I have already pointed out in the course of the argument the passages in his judgment which led me to that conclusion, and it is not necessary now to repeat them; but it is quite clear he had before him a notice substantially the same as in the present case. Notwithstanding that, he held that a notice under sect. 3 of the Act of 1891 is not equivalent for the purpose of compulsion to a notice under sect. 4. My brother Wright has twice decided the same thing upon exactly the same point, and although sitting here as a divisional court, we are not bound by his judgment, still it is an important factor in considering what our judgment ought to be. Inasmuch as these three cases, to which I have referred, deal with the very point in question, and there is really no substantial difference of any kind to be drawn between the notice which was in question in those cases and the notice which is in question in the present case, I think we are bound to follow those decisions, and to say that there was no legal compulsion in this case upon the plaintiffs to do the work, and therefore they cannot recover against the defendants. I cannot give this judgment without saying at the same time that I do so with great reluctance, and only because I am compelled to do it. To my mind, a perfectly different view of sect. 3 and sect. 4, taken together, might have been taken, and I think it might very well have been held that sect. 3 was intended to be a notice with which a person might comply, if he was so disposed, without waiting for the more formal notice to be given under sect. 4. I will say in a moment why in this case I think it is the intimation of the council and not merely of the inspector of nuisances, and where a person obeys the intimation of the council, which they accompany with a threat that they will make it compulsory upon him to do the work, if he does not do it voluntarily, it seems to me contrary to natural justice that he should stand in a worse position than if he refuses to do what they have told him to do, and waits for a further compulsory order. I think the fact also has been overlooked that in that section there are words which seem to point to the fact that the notice is something more than a mere intimation, because what is said is that the sanitary authority shall give such direction to their officers as will secure the existence of the nuisance being immediately brought to the notice of any person who "may be required" to abate it. That seems to me to indicate that when a person gets that notice he is required to abate the nuisance. It seems to me a very thin distinction indeed to say that if a notice is given, which has been given in this case, the consequences of which it is admitted and it has been decided, are that it amounts to a compulsion to do the thing, there is less compulsion because he is told if you do not do it within a week we, the sanitary authority, will take proceedings against you. It is not like the case of an ordinary litigant or individual saying that, but it is the case of persons saying it who have charge of this matter and whose duty it is to see that all proper steps are taken for the carrying out of the notice. But counsel for the defendant council says that that is only the language of the inspector. With great respect that seems to me to be nonsense. An inspector does not use forms of this kind, which are used all over the district, without the knowledge of his employers, and the sanitary authority which give him these forms to distribute and which allow him to make use of them are, in my opinion, legally as well as morally liable for their contents. If they allow a man to sign himself as the officer deputed by them to take proceedings under this Act, and to state that unless the notice is complied with within a week proceedings, which will be compulsory, will be taken without any further decision of the sanitary authority and without anything beyond what has already taken place, I think they must be bound by such a statement, and that that notice must be taken as their notice that they will proceed to make it compulsory. As I have said, the distinction is a very thin one, and it is not one which commends itself to my judgment. I am far more disposed to take the view in this question which was taken by my brother Channell in the case of North v. Walthamstow Urban Council (ubi sup.) than I am to take the view taken by my brother Wright and by Lindley, L.J., certainly in the Court of Appeal in the case of Thompson and Norris Manufacturing Company v. Hawes (ubi sup.), to which I have referred. However, I am bound by the authority of that case and I adopt it loyally; but, at the same time, inasmuch as this question probably, either in this case or some other, will not rest here, I think there is, and can be, no objection to my expressing what my individual opinion would have been if I were not fettered by authority. I do so the more because I think many of the considerations which I have dealt with both in this judgment and in the course of the argument have not really been before the courts which have decided the question in the way in which it has been decided so as to bind us. It appears also that a question was raised before the learned County Court judge with which we cannot deal, because he has given no judgment upon it. But it is a very important question, and, had our judgment been that the case must go down for a new trial, that question would have had to be dealt with. If it really be the fact that a pipe which ought to have been a drain was, by the fraudulent act of a builder (because that is what counsel for the defendants really suggested), made into a sewer within the definitions applicable to this case, by joining it on to another drain and sending it somewhere else than where the sanitary authority allowed it to go, if that kind of thing had been practised upon the sanitary authority and that was only found out, as on the present occasion, when the investigation came on the opening of the ground, then in that case there would have been a great deal to be said in favour of the view—though I give no judgment upon it—that neither the person who was actually responsible for such misconduct nor those who claimed under him could take advantage of it. But as to that I express no opinion. I do not think, upon the evidence in this case, it has been made out, because the evidence seems to me to be singularly meagre and unsatisfactory on the point, and the learned judge so felt it, because he has given no judgment upon it. I only desire to say that it has not escaped us, but we feel the seriousness of the question which might have to be decided, and which apparently has not yet been decided, although there are expressions used by Channell, J. which indicate the trend of his opinion on the matter. I think that disposes of the case, and that I have said all that is necessary for me to say, as I do not remember any point which has been seriously dwelt upon during the argument which has been omitted by me. I think therefore for these reasons we are bound, however much I feel that if I had been unfettered by authority I should not give this decision myself, to follow the decision which has been cited, and we must dismiss this appeal. I should like to add that I hope, in common fairness, the sanitary authority will alter the form of their intimation notice, because as it is they are taking advantage of a threat, and, when the party comes and says he was induced by the threat to act, they say he had no business to act upon it.

KENNEDY, J.—I have come to the same conclusion, and I think I may without impropriety join in the expression of the feeling of reluctance with which we should pronounce this decision if our own judgment in the matter had been independent and entirely unfettered. The only point which we really have to decide is the question whether or not this was, on the evidence of fact and on the document, a voluntary work on the part of the plaintiffs, whether they incurred the expense of the work voluntarily or not. If they incurred it voluntarily, then, on finding that they need not have gone to the expense of doing the work and that some other person ought to have borne a portion of it, they cannot go to that other person and say, "We have paid what you ought to have paid." If, on the other hand, the payment has been made by them, not voluntarily, but under pressure, and under pressure of the very person who ought to have done the work and incurred the expense, then it is not doubted but that they are entitled to recover the money from that other person. Therefore, shortly put, it is this: Is the fact that the plaintiffs in this case did the work causing the expense, after receiving the document and in consequence of the document of the 18th March 1903—which I call an "intimation" because it is so called by the statute and also in large letters at the head of the paper—sufficient to deprive the conduct of the plaintiffs of its voluntary character for the purpose of saying whether they can get the money back on finding that the work ought to have been done by the sanitary authority and not by them? That it is not an easy question is obvious from the different decisions that have been given and the different views expressed—for they are different in my judgment—in the two decisions of my brother Wright, on the one hand, in Harris v. Hickman (ubi sup.) and Proctor v. Mayor of Islington (ubi sup.), and the decision of my brother Channell, on the other hand, in North v. Walthamstow Urban Council (ubi sup.). But having had the great advantage of full argument of counsel in this case, and having given it consideration, I am entitled to say that I should feel great difficulty in coming to the conclusion to which I have been obliged to come if it had not been for the decision of the Court of Appeal in Thompson and Norris Manufacturing Company v. Hawes (ubi sup.). It seems to me difficult to say whether this notice is under sect. 3 or under sect. 4. If my judgment had been unfettered, I should have found it difficult to say that it really mattered, as regards the voluntariness of what was done by the plaintiffs, whether they did the work on receiving this intimation in this form, or on receiving the statutory notice under sect. 4, sub-sect. 1. Who can say that the work was voluntary? It is not compulsion in the sense of duress or in the sense of having any penalty imposed if they had not complied with the intimation per se. But was it not done, not in the slightest degree because they wished to do it for anybody else or because they were willing to do it for themselves, but because a public authority came to them and intimated to them, to use the exact words, that it was their bounden duty to do it, or if they did not do it legal proceedings would be taken against them before a magistrate? I cannot say, with great respect, that I concur in the illustration given by my brother Channell in the course of his judgment in North v. Walthamstow Urban Council (ubi sup.). In the course of the argument I have already pointed out that the rights of indemnity which may arise where agents of any sort, whether commercial or otherwise, or on the Stock Exchange, are employed, do not seem to me strictly analogous to this question. Here is the duty of a citizen to obey the authority prima facie of a public body governing his district in an urgent matter and a matter of public health which is alleged to be affected by that citizen's want of care or wrongdoing in the management of the premises. In a form, which is the form recognised by the local authority, an intimation is conveyed to the plaintiffs that if they do not do this work actual proceedings will be taken against them. Is not what they do under that notice involuntary? I should have been inclined myself to come to that conclusion, and while, no doubt, it is true that this is an intimation under sect. 3, and not a notice under sect. 4, I am bound to say that it is in either case a notice which emanates from the local authority. It is as if in an action a party were to try to cut his personality into two because he deposes a solicitor or representative to act for him in all the stages of the action as well as in the letter-writing which precedes the action. If we look at the third schedule to the Act of 1891, we shall see that the form of notice requiring the abatement of a nuisance is to have the "signature of officer of sanitary authority." In the intimation which was sent in this case, the person signs himself as "Edward Homer, the officer appointed by the vestry of the parish to take proceedings," and he in effect says, "I am the person through whom the vestry is going to act." So again, under sect. 4, which is admitted by counsel for the vestry to be the section dealing with the act of the vestry, the notice in the form in the schedule to which I have referred is to be signed not by the vestry, but with the signature of the officer of the sanitary authority. In other words, it would be again signed: "Your obedient servant, Edward Homer, the officer appointed by the vestry." It is to be in either case the signature of the same person—the officer of the sanitary authority. In each matter, so far as that goes, whether the notice is signed by the officer or not, the same person who is to constitute what is done afterwards an involuntary act if he signs the notice under sect. 4, signs the intimation in exactly the same way, only calling it an intimation to the person as to what he ought to do under sect. 3. In my view, however, whatever we might have thought on the present argument and the authorities now cited, I feel it is impossible not to do what we are bound to do—that is, loyally to follow the decision of a superior court. It may be that the only report of the case produced to us, which is evidently a summarised report, may not have fully represented in their right proportion the views of the learned Lords Justices. It may be that there was much more stress than appears in the report laid upon the fact that the plaintiffs in that case had taken upon themselves to treat a notice addressed to somebody else as addressed to them. But I am bound to say that, reading that report fairly and in its natural meaning, I think, at any rate, the majority of the court did base their decision upon a distinction between a document served under sect. 3 as an intimation, and a document which is a notice requiring an abatement of a nuisance under sect. 4, as if the one under sect. 4 would constitute a proceeding compliance with which would be an involuntary act, whereas an intimation under sect. 3 would leave the person who received it so far free that he could not say he was acting otherwise than voluntarily. If that case was decided upon that ground, as well as on the other ground there taken—namely, that the person who did the work was not the person who was required by the notice to do it—it binds us and we cannot go behind it. The third Lord Justice no doubt based his judgment on the other ground, but there is no expression of dissent on his part, and, at any rate, the view of the majority is the view of the court, and is binding on us. Therefore it seems to me that we must decide this case as my brother Wills has decided, whatever otherwise might have been our own view. With regard to the other point in this case, it is clear that the learned County Court judge has not decided the matter, as to which I will say no more than that it may be of importance. But as all the facts have not been brought out as to that point, we should at the most have sent the case back for a new trial, if we had taken a different view on the other question, which is the main question to be decided.

Bankruptcy—Proof—Withdrawal before admission—Substitution of fresh proof—Voluntary payment to creditor by stranger—Right of proof for whole debt—Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), sched. 2, r. 22—Bankruptcy Rules 1886, rr. 225, 229.

If the trustee has neither admitted a proof nor given any intimation of an intention to do so, the creditor is entitled to withdraw his proof and present a fresh proof without leave; and it makes no difference that the twenty-eight days limited by rule 228, within which the trustee is required either to admit or reject the proof, has elapsed.

A creditor who has received from a stranger a voluntary payment, not tendered or accepted as part of the debt due from the debtor, is not bound to give credit for such payment in his proof.

APPEAL by creditors against the rejection of their proof.

Messrs. Derenburg and Co., the appellants, were stockbrokers, and in Jan. 1903, when the receiving order against the bankrupt Rowe was made, the bankrupt was indebted to them to the extent of 20,368*l.* in respect of advances on the security of share certificates, which were subsequently discovered to have been forged by the debtor.

On the 3rd June 1903 Messrs. Berwick and Moreing, in whose firm the bankrupt had been a partner, but who were in no way liable for the criminal acts of the bankrupt, sent Messrs. Derenburg and Co. a cheque for 6500*l.* inclosed in a letter which stated (inter alia) as follows:

Although you admit that we are not liable we have pleasure in sending you 6500*l.* This we understand will cover all the losses you have sustained except those for which you hold an insurance policy.

On the 3rd July Messrs. Derenburg and Co. presented a proof in the bankruptcy for 13,863*l.*, giving credit for the amount received from Messrs. Berwick and Moreing. This proof was not formally admitted till the 1st Dec.

In the meanwhile Messrs. Derenburg and Co. having been advised that Messrs. Berwick and Moreing would probably be unable to prove for the 6500*l.*, and that they were entitled to prove for the full amount lent to the bankrupt without giving credit for the sum paid them by Messrs. Berwick and Moreing.

On the 6th Nov. they accordingly sent in a fresh proof for 20,368*l.*, and requested the trustee to substitute it for the proof of the 3rd July.

On the 1st Jan. 1904 the proof of the 3rd July was filed by the trustee, with a note on it to the effect that it had been admitted in full on the 1st Dec.

The trustee rejected the proof of the 6th Nov. on two grounds—firstly, that the sanction of the court was necessary before a creditor could withdraw one proof and substitute another; secondly, that the appellants were bound to give credit for the 6500*l.* received from Messrs. Berwick and Moreing. The Bankruptcy Rules provide as follows:

228. Subject to the power of the court to extend the time, the trustee, other than the official receiver, within twenty-eight days after receiving a proof which has not been previously dealt with by the official receiver, shall, in writing, either admit or reject it wholly or in part or require further evidence in support thereof. Provided that where the trustee has given notice of his intention to declare a dividend he shall, within seven days after the date mentioned in such notice as the latest date up to which proofs must be lodged, examine and in writing admit or reject every proof which has not been already admitted or rejected, and give notice of his decision rejecting a proof wholly or in part to the creditor affected thereby.

229. Where a creditor's proof has been admitted the notice of dividend shall be sufficient notification to such creditor of such admission.

Sched. 2 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883, r. 22, enacts:

The trustee shall examine every proof and the grounds of the debt, and in writing admit or reject it, in whole or in part, or require further evidence in support of it. If he rejects a proof he shall state in writing to the creditor the grounds of the rejection.

H. Reed, K.C. and Bannerman in support of the appeal.—This proof was wrongly rejected on both grounds. A creditor can withdraw his proof before it has been adjudicated on by the trustee, and he can present a fresh proof:

Re Rhoades; Ex parte Rhoades, 80 L. T. Rep. 493; (1899) 1 K. B. 905;

Re Matro Clark; Ex parte Buenos Ayres Company, 84 L. T. Rep. 208; (1901) 1 K. B. 655.

A creditor is not obliged to give credit for a voluntary payment made by a stranger. A debtor could not plead such a payment, for a payment has to be at the request and on behalf of the debtor, and the trustee in bankruptcy is in no better position:

Kemp v. Balls, 10 Ex. 607;

James v. Isaacs, 22 L. J. 73, C. P.;

Lucas v. Wilkinson, 1 H. & N. 420.

A payment by a stranger must also be on account of the debt, and must be ratified by the debtor:

Belshaw v. Bush, 11 C. B. 191.

This was a mere voluntary payment, not on account of the debt, but made to cover a loss, for which the payors considered themselves in some way morally responsible, and it was not ratified by the debtor.

Muir Mackenzie for the trustee.—The trustee not having rejected the proof within twenty-one days limited by the rule, he must be deemed to have admitted it, and the creditor cannot withdraw it without the leave of the court. There is no inherent right in a creditor to amend his proof, and the court has the discretion to prevent him from so doing:

Re Safety Explosives Limited, (1904) W. N. 9;

Ex parte Vaughan; Re Dodds, 62 L. T. Rep. 837; 25 Q.B. Div. 529;

Re Deerhurst (No. 2), 8 Mor. 258.

The payment was on account of the debt, and the amount was ascertained by reference to the amount of the debt:

Ex parte Holland; Re Rogers, 8 Mor. 243.

H. Reed, K.C. replied.

BUCKLEY, J.—The first point taken by the trustee in this case is that the first proof must be deemed to have been admitted, on the ground that it was not rejected within the twenty-eight days limited by rule 228, and that therefore it could not be withdrawn without the leave of the court. Rule 229, however, seems to me to contemplate some notice of admission being given to the creditor, and I think the creditors in this case, not having received any notice, were entitled to take the view that their proof had not been adjudicated upon, as was the fact, and to withdraw it and present a fresh proof. On the second point, in my opinion, this was not a case of a stranger offering to pay a part of the debt due to a creditor. The payment was not tendered or accepted as part of the debt, but was made in consideration of the fact that the creditors had sustained loss by the acts of a person for whom Berwick and Moreing considered themselves to some extent morally responsible. It was a voluntary payment, made, not on account of the debt, but in consideration of the debt turning out a loss through the inability of the debtor's estate to meet it. The proof must therefore be admitted for the full amount of the debt.

Appeal allowed.

Bankruptcy — Proof — Gambling debt — Bills in consideration of withdrawing letters to clubs complaining of nonpayment — Gaming Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 9).

M. had acted as B.'s agent in the making of bets. M. sued B. to recover money paid for B. in respect of bets, and B. successfully pleaded the Gaming Act 1892. M. wrote to B.'s clubs complaining of B.'s conduct, and thereupon an arrangement was made by which, in consideration of M. withdrawing the letters of complaint, B. gave him bills for the amount due. Before all the bills were met B. became bankrupt.

Held, that the bills were not given in consideration of the gambling debts, but on the consideration of withdrawing the letters to B.'s clubs, which was not an illegal consideration, and that M. could prove on the bills in B.'s bankruptcy.

APPEAL by creditor from the rejection of a proof.

The appellant had acted as the debtor's agent in the making of bets, and in 1900 the debtor owed him 800*l.* for losses paid on his behalf. The appellant brought an action to recover that amount, but the debtor successfully pleaded the Gaming Act 1892 both in the King's Bench Division and in the Court of Appeal.

The appellant subsequently wrote to the secretaries of the debtor's clubs and informed them of the defence set up in the action. Thereupon the debtor approached the appellant, and a settlement was arrived at by which the debtor paid 100*l.* in cash, and gave bills for the remainder. In accordance with this settlement the appellant withdrew the letters to the secretaries of the debtor's clubs. The debtor became bankrupt, and the appellant tendered a proof on the bills which had not been paid, which was rejected by the trustee on the ground that they had been given for an illegal consideration.

H. Reed, K.C. and Simmonds in support of the appeal.—The gambling debt was disposed of in the action, and was not the consideration for the bills. The consideration for the bills was a new one—namely, the withdrawal of the letters sent to the secretaries to the clubs—and that was not an illegal consideration.

Muir Mackenzie for the trustee.—Although it may be that the debtor would have had no answer to the claim on the bills, the trustee in bankruptcy representing the other creditors can enquire as to the real consideration. The consideration alleged by the appellant is not such as can stand against the rest of the creditors:

Re Deerhurst; Ex parte Seaton, 64 L. T. Rep. 273.

BUCKLEY, J.—In this case the trustee has rejected the appellant's proof on the ground that it was founded on an illegal consideration. The material facts are that the appellant brought an action against the bankrupt to recover what is called "a debt of honour," and he failed, with the result that the debt is at an end. After that, for a new consideration altogether—namely, the withdrawal by the appellant of certain letters he had written to the secretaries of the bankrupt's clubs—the bankrupt agreed to pay 100l. and to give bills for the remainder. That was a wholly new transaction. It was said that this was merely a fresh agreement to pay the gaming debt, and Re Deerhurst; Ex parte Seaton (ubi sup.) was cited, but that case was the contrary of this. In that case the creditor had obtained by default a judgment on a gaming debt, and the debtor had agreed, in consideration of not being posted as a creditor as a defaulter, to bear the bad judgment as if it were a good one. In this case the bills were given for a new consideration altogether, which was not an illegal consideration, and the trustee wrongly rejected the proof on that ground. The rejection must therefore be reversed, but without prejudice to his setting up within fourteen days other grounds of rejecting.

Bankruptcy—Books kept by bankrupt as agent for several principals—Right to retain—Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 50, sub-s. 1, 2—Bankruptcy rule 349.

The bankrupt had been an underwriter at Lloyd's, and, in addition to his own business, had as agent underwritten policies for others. The agency agreements were in writing, and provided that the bankrupt should keep proper books, which should be open to his principals, and that they should be audited by accountants at the expense of the principals.

Held, that the books were the property of the bankrupt, and that the accountants had no right against the trustee in bankruptcy to retain them on behalf of the principals.

MOTION by the trustee in bankruptcy of P. G. C. Burnand, for an order for the delivery to him of all the books kept by the bankrupt in his business as an underwriter at Lloyd's. The books were in the possession of the respondents, Messrs. Baker, Sutton, and Co., chartered accountants, who had declined to deliver them up except on terms refused by the trustee.

The bankrupt, in addition to his own business, had since 1885, as agent, underwritten policies for other persons, who were known as "names."

The agreements made by the bankrupt and his "names" provided (inter alia) as follows:

1. The said P. G. C. B. for the purpose of underwriting policies of insurance at Lloyd's, and carrying on the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd's, in the name and on behalf of the said A. B., in accordance with the usual custom of Lloyd's, and upon the terms and conditions hereinafter contained.

2. That the said P. G. C. B. shall, during the said period, have the sole management of the underwriting, and all risks shall be taken and all losses, averages, and returns shall be settled by him in the name and on account of the said A. B., and in accordance with the usual custom of Lloyd's.

5. Proper underwriting and account books shall be provided and kept in the usual manner, and shall at all times be open to the inspection of the said A. B. or his agent thereunder appointed in writing, and the said P. G. C. B. shall at all times give to the said A. The said A. B. shall also pay to the said P. G. C. B. in respect of the underwriting of each year during the continuance of the underwriting, as a remuneration for his services in conducting the same, such a commission or further sum as shall be equal to 20 per cent. of the net gains or profits, if any, of each year, to be ascertained and paid at the times and in manner hereinafter mentioned.

The bankrupt kept the usual books of an underwriter, which showed his liabilities and those of his "names." These books were audited by the respondents, who were paid by the "names."

The receiving order was made on the 30th Sept. 1903 on the debtor's own petition, and the trustee was appointed on the 5th Nov., at which date the books were in the respondents' possession.

On the 18th Nov. the trustee applied for the books, but the respondents, on the instructions of the "names," refused to give them up, except on an undertaking to return them on demand, and on other conditions to which the trustee refused to consent. The respondents claimed that the books were "equally the property of the various names."

Subsequent to the adjudication in bankruptcy the "names" determined their agreements.

The Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 50, provides as follows:

(1) The trustee shall, as soon as may be, take possession of the deeds, books, and documents of the bankrupt, and all other parts of his property capable of manual delivery.

(2) The trustee shall, in relation to and for the purpose of acquiring or retaining possession of the property of the bankrupt, be in the same position as if he were a receiver of the property appointed by the High Court, and the court may, on his application, enforce such acquisition or retention accordingly.

Rule 349 of the Bankruptcy Rules is as follows:

No person shall, as against the official receiver or trustee, be entitled to withhold possession of the books of account belonging to the debtor or to set up any lien thereon.

S. G. Lushington for the trustee in support of the motion.

Muir Mackenzie for the respondents.

BUCKLEY, J.—In my judgment the respondents have neither any property in these books nor any right to their possession. They have set up a jus tertii, and admit that the bankrupt had a joint right of property with the "names" to these books. As to the right between the bankruptcy and the "names," it appears to me that bankruptcy makes no difference. The books were provided and kept under contracts between the bankrupt and the "names," and by the terms of these contracts they were to be open for inspection by the "names," and there could have been no object for that contractual right of inspection if the books were the property of the "names." These books show the sums receivable by the names and the amounts for which they were severally liable. As between the names not one could have demanded the books as against the others or as against the bankrupt. They were not the books of any one of the "names" as against the others, but they were the bankrupt's books which, under his contracts with the "names," he was obliged to provide and keep.

Order in terms of the notice of motion.

THE HAWTHORNBANK. (a)

Collision—Vessel "not under command"—Duty to keep course—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 4 (a) (c) (d).

A vessel exhibiting two red lights under art. 4 (a) of the Collision Regulations as a signal that she is "not under command" ought to keep her course when approaching another vessel so as to involve risk of collision.

A collision occurred between the brigantine R. and the barque H. The R. was at the time close-hauled on the starboard tack; the H. was sailing free, but, having been recently in collision with a steamship, was exhibiting "not under command" lights. The helm of the R. was put up in order to pass ahead of the H., while the helm of the H. was ported.

Held, that the H. ought to have kept her course and let the R. get out of her way.

ACTION for damage by collision brought by the owners of the brigantine Ringleader against the owners of the barque Hawthornbank.

The collision occurred about midnight on the 16th Oct. 1903, in the English Channel, some five miles S.W. of Dover.

The Ringleader was a brigantine of 162 tons register, and at the time was on a voyage from the Tyne to Folkestone with a cargo of coals, and manned by a crew of seven hands all told. She also had a pilot on board. The Hawthornbank was a steel barque of 1369 tons register, and was on a voyage from Antwerp to San Pedro, U.S.A., with a cargo of rails, and with a pilot on board, and manned by a crew of twenty-two hands all told.

She had been in collision with the mail steamship Orinoco, and had received considerable damage. Her foretopmast and headstays and sails and gear had been carried away, and her bows had been stove in. The services of a tug had been engaged accordingly, and she was putting back to the Thames for repairs.

The weather at the time was clear but overcast, the wind was a strong breeze from W.N.W., and the tide was running to the westward with the force of about a knot an hour.

The plaintiffs' case was that under these circumstances the Ringleader was sailing close-hauled on the starboard tack, heading about S.W. $\frac{1}{2}$ W. magnetic, and making from two to three knots an hour with jib, foretopmast staysail, two topsails, two mainstay sails, and single-reefed mainsail, when a red light was seen nearly ahead, but on the starboard bow withal, and distant one or two miles. The Ringleader kept her course, and shortly afterwards another red light was seen a little broader on the starboard bow, and, after a further interval, a third red light appeared about a quarter of a mile off. Those in charge then came to the conclusion that the vessel approaching, which proved to be the Hawthornbank, was not under command, and the helm of the Ringleader was starboarded, as she was unable to port owing to the presence of a steamer showing her masthead and green lights on the starboard bow, and nearer to her than the vessel exhibiting the three red lights. The Hawthornbank, however, still keeping her port light open, continued to come on with considerable speed, and with her stem struck the Ringleader on the starboard side of the bowsprit, carrying it away and doing so much damage that she sank shortly afterwards, and her pilot was drowned.

The plaintiffs then charged the defendants (inter alia) with proceeding at an improper rate of speed for a vessel carrying "not under command" lights, with failing to keep her course and speed, and with improperly porting. They also charged them with the breach of arts. 4 and 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The defendants' case was that the tow-line of the tug that had been engaged to tow the Hawthornbank had slipped before it was hauled on board, and the tug was following and hauling in the tow-line, while the barque, under her lower main topsail, was moving through the water, making about three knots an hour, and heading about E.N.E. magnetic. The regulation side lights and a stern light and the red lights for a vessel not under command were being duly exhibited.

Under these circumstances the red light of the Ringleader was seen about two miles off, and bearing about three or four points on the port bow of the Hawthornbank. The Ringleader approached, with her red light open, on the port bow of the Hawthornbank, and, as she approached, the helm was ported a point and steadied. The Ringleader, however, shut in her red light and opened the green light, and appeared to be attempting to cross the bows of the Hawthornbank, and, coming on as if under a starboard helm, with her jibboom and stem struck the port bow of the Hawthornbank.

The defendants charged the plaintiffs (inter alia) with improperly starboarding and attempting to cross the bows of the Hawthornbank. They also charged them with breach of art. 29 of the regulations.

Arts. 4 and 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea are as follows :

Art. 4. (a) A vessel which from any accident is not under command, shall carry at the same height as the white light mentioned in art. 2 (a), where they can best be seen, and if a steam vessel in lieu of that light, two red lights, in a vertical line one over the other, not less than six feet apart, and of such a character as to be visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least two miles. . . (c) The vessels referred to in this article, when not making any way through the water, shall not carry the side lights, but when making way shall carry them. (d) The lights and shapes required to be shown by this article are to be taken by the vessels as signals that the vessel showing them is not under command, and cannot therefore get out of the way.

Art. 21. Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed.

Aspinall, K.C. and Nelson for the plaintiffs.—The Hawthornbank was in fact under command, and was proceeding at a considerable speed. If she was in fact not under command under her lower main topsail only, she had brought herself to this condition by improperly reducing sail, and art. 4 (a) did not apply. The red lights were exhibited too late and not at a proper time. In any event the "not under command" lights are a signal to other vessels to get out of the way; and it is therefore the duty of a vessel to keep her course and speed. The Hawthornbank must be found to blame for porting her helm. There was a bad look-out on board the Hawthornbank, and the light of the Ringleader was not reported to the pilot.

Pickford, K.C. and Adair Roche, for the defendants, contra.—The Hawthornbank was making sufficient way through the water to justify her in exhibiting "not under command" lights. See

The P. Caland, 68 L. T. Rep. 469; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 317; (1893) A. C. 207.

There was a bad look-out on board the Ringleader, and hence the collision. The steamer alleged to have hampered the movements of the Ringleader was the tug, which was much further astern, so that she was not really in the way.

Nelson in reply.

BARNES, J.—This is an action by the owners, master, and crew of the brigantine Ringleader, and the owners of her cargo, against the owners of the barque Hawthornbank in respect of a collision which occurred at about midnight on the 16th Oct. 1903, in the English Channel, off Dover. The result of it was that the Ringleader was so damaged that she sank shortly afterwards and was lost with the cargo and crew's effects, and the pilot which she had on board was unfortunately drowned. The case of the Ringleader is in substance that those in charge of her noticed the red light of the Hawthornbank nearly ahead, but slightly on the starboard bow, about a mile and a half off; that afterwards a second red light was seen about in the same position; and that afterwards a third red light was seen in the same position, or thereabouts; that when the third red light came into sight the vessels were about a third of a mile apart. The plaintiffs also say that they saw the lights of a steamer a little broader on the starboard bow than the lights of the Hawthornbank; and, according to the evidence of the master of the plaintiffs' vessel, the lights of that steamer seemed to him to be about the same distance off as those of the barque. On that point there was a conflict of evidence, because the defendants sought to make out that the lights of this steamer, which proved to be the tug of the Hawthornbank, were really a good deal further away from the brigantine than the plaintiffs' witnesses put them. However that may be, the case for the plaintiffs is that, when they got all those three red lights of the barque in sight, pretty close to, they came to the conclusion that she was a vessel not under command, and that they must act; and thereupon they acted by starboarding their helm, in the hope of getting across the barque's bows, being unable, according to the view of the master, who was the responsible man to act, to do anything else, because, if they had luffed by porting, they would have thrown themselves under the bows of the steamer, and, if they had kept on their way, they would have gone into the barque, and so he starboarded. The case of the Hawthornbank, shortly stated, is that she had, the day before, received damage by collision in the English Channel, and was putting back in distress with the object of making the Thames, and, no doubt, procuring the repairs rendered necessary by the first collision, which had, according to her master, damaged her stem, forcing it across to starboard, carried away all the headgear and foretopmast, stove in her bows, and done some other damage. The Hawthornbank had taken a pilot, had engaged a tug, and was endeavouring to make fast to that tug. There had been two attempts to get a tow line on board. The first attempt failed just as the line was about to be made fast, and the second attempt also failed, and the tug had again to occupy itself in hawling in the steel hawser. From that time up to the collision the Hawthornbank, which, when they first tried to take a tug, had brouched to, was proceeding with only the lower maintopsail set; that is to say, for about two hours before the collision she sailed under the lower maintopsail, and during those two hours the tug was getting in the tow rope after the first attempt, and was making the second attempt to get fast. There is no doubt that two red lights, in addition to the side lights, were put up, and the case for the Hawthornbank is that those two red lights were put up at about 10 p.m. in the mizzen rigging, on the starboard side, at a proper height, so as to show that the vessel was not under command. They then say that they saw the red light of the Ringleader something like two miles, or thereabouts, away, three or four points on the port bow. That is the pleaded case; but the master of the Hawthornbank said a mile or two miles off. It is then stated that the red light of the Ringleader kept open and gradually broadened on their port bow, and that, after they saw the light, when the Ringleader was a considerable distance off, they ported about a point, and then steadied, so as to give, according to the master of the defendants' ship, more room, and to enable the Hawthornbank to steer better. Then their case is that the Ringleader shut in her red light, when about four or five ships' lengths off, and about six points on the port bow, and showed her green light, as if attempting to cross the bows of the Hawthornbank, and shortly afterwards the collision happened. Now, those two cases present certain difficulties. The first question is, what were the manœuvres of these two vessels, involving the further questions, at what time were the lights put up on the Hawthornbank—the plaintiffs contending that these extra red lights were only put up at the last moment before the collision, and the defendants contending that they were put up about two hours before—and what was the relative position of the two vessels to one another at the material time. I think that the weight of the evidence is in favour of the view, which I adopt, that the two extra red lights were put up somewhere about 10 p.m. I think it is probable that was so from the fact that that seems to have been about the time when the vessel was in difficulties with her tug; and they seem to have had those lights up from that time onwards to the collision. With regard to the manœuvres of the two ships, I accept the plaintiffs' view that the vessels were green to red—that is, that the Ringleader had the other vessel slightly on the starboard bow—whereas the defendants' case is that the two vessels were red to red; but I cannot see how the defendants' story can be correct on this point. In the first place, the courses on which the vessels were favours the view which the plaintiffs present. In the second place, if the vessels were red to red, as the defendants suggest, there could be no reason for the plaintiffs starboarding in the way it is said by the defendants they did; because, if they were red to red, the Ringleader had only to keep her course and avoid the two difficulties in her way—namely, the Hawthornbank, which they would pass easily, and the steamer, which would have to keep out of her way. Again, I cannot see how the collision—which undoubtedly took place between, in the first instance, the starboard side of the Ringleader's bowsprit and afterwards her bows, and the port bow, near the stem, of the Hawthornbank—could have occurred on the story told by the defendants; because, if it were correct to say that the plaintiffs' vessel got six points on the port bow of the defendants' vessel and then starboarded, and the ships were proceeding at the same speed as they had been going, I do not see how it is possible to bring about a collision with the bows of the Hawthornbank, and at an angle leading aft. I therefore accept the view of the position of the ships and the general outline of the story of the navigation told by the plaintiffs. There are still left some questions of difficulty. The first relates to the charge against the plaintiffs that their helm was improperly starboarded. That involves, I think, bad look-out, because it is said that, if these two extra red lights were up, those in charge of the Ringleader ought to have seen them; but I think a good look-out was being kept on the Ringleader. I think the men were doing their duty and looking out as well as they could. They saw the first red light—that is, the side light—of the Hawthornbank at a considerable distance, although they did not see the other two lights at the same time. They first saw one and then they saw another, and I think it is quite possible that the lights may have had some obscuration from the masts or rigging of the Hawthornbank, because they were hung three or four feet to starboard of the mizzen mast. It is obvious that anybody on the port bow, fine on the bow, might have something between them and those lights, especially if the vessel were not keeping quite steady on her E.N.E. course. The exact obscuration would depend upon how the vessel was moving. Then, again, the lights were globular, which would not necessarily come into view so readily or so brightly as the side light which was first seen. I am satisfied that those on board the Ringleader saw the two extra side lights as soon as they reasonably could be expected to do so. The question whether those in charge of the Ringleader were wrong in starboarding depends very much on the opinion of the nautical assessors who are assisting me. If the plaintiffs are right in saying that the steamer which they saw appeared to be about the same distance off as the ship, there certainly was a position of very considerable difficulty, because there was the Hawthornbank intimating by her signals that she was out of command, a little ahead of the Ringleader, and the steamer on the starboard bow. The master of the Ringleader did not know that it was a tug at the time. It might be any steamer coming up. It might be a large steamer, and, if he luffed, it would throw him right under the bows of that steamer. To get rid of that difficulty the defendants try to make out that the tug was farther away. My view is that the master of the Ringleader was justified, from what he saw, in thinking that the steamer was pretty close to him, in the same way as the barque was, when he made out that the barque was not under command. It must not be forgotten that the tug's side lights may have been showing more brilliantly than those of the barque, and therefore may have produced the appearance of being closer. I am not prepared to accept the defendants' view of this case, that the tug was so far astern as they make out. Some time had elapsed since the last attempt to get the tow rope fast, and I see no reason why the tug would not make up to the barque again as fast as she could. That being my view, I have consulted the Elder Brethren, and they agree that the plaintiff's vessel cannot reasonably be expected to have done differently—in other words, there was no negligence or breach of any rule on her part in starboarding in the circumstances. The reasons appear to be these: As her master says, it would have been risky to have gone about and ported under the steamer's bows; it would have been a very serious danger if the steamer had been close up; he could not keep straight on with safety, because the vessels were approaching, and so he starboarded and tried to get across the bows of the barque. The only point that can be made against him for doing that is that he said something to the effect that sub-sect. (c) of art. 4 (1) was not properly in his mind; but I think that, when his evidence is fairly considered, what he meant to convey was very much what he said in his evidence in chief—namely, that he had made up his mind that the vessel showing the three red lights was a disabled vessel, scarcely having any way through the water, and if he had thought that she was going at any great speed he would not have starboarded. That seems to me very much a nautical question, and the Elder Brethren take the view that the plaintiffs' master could not reasonably have done in the circumstances other than what he did do. I think, therefore, he cannot be considered to blame. Now, the other side of the case is also a matter of considerable difficulty. The broad points taken by counsel for the defendants are that the barque was not under command, that she had her proper lights showing in the circumstances, and that she did nothing wrong. Was the barque under command? Or was she not? She was proceeding in the damaged condition which I have already described, with only the lower maintopsail set, for something about two hours before the collision, and she was put into that position with the object of getting her tug and getting safely into the Downs. The question is, Was she at this time under command, or not under command from any accident? There is no doubt that her condition was due to the previous collision, which was an accident, and I have asked the Elder Brethren—it is a matter purely for them—whether she was under command or not. Their view is that the defendants' ship was, in the circumstances, not under command, having regard to all the conditions of the traffic and the action which she might be called upon to take—to act promptly and properly for other vessels. I understand by that, that although it would be possible for a vessel going, as she was, to alter her course slowly, or to take action in some way for the purpose of altering her course for a vessel which she might meet, and so get out of the way, she had not only one vessel to consider when she put up these lights. She had to consider the traffic in the Channel, and all the vessels out of the way of which she might have to keep. I may add these observations. Either she would pay off very slowly indeed, or she might, if she tried to come up, come up very quickly, and then she would not be in a position, certainly not in the latter case, to act for other vessels. That is the answer to the first broad point in connection with the defendants' case. Then another point was made—namely, that she was proceeding negligently, having regard to the circumstances of the case, in reducing herself only to this sail that she had set at the time. I have asked the Elder Brethren a further question about this, and they advise me that the circumstances were not such as to justify the court in holding that she was proceeding in an improper manner. There is positive evidence from the defendants' master, and from the surveyor, to the effect that she could not set her headsails, and it must not be forgotten that what she was doing was being done with the object of proceeding to the Thames, and she was, it seems to me, acting reasonably in endeavouring to take a tug to proceed to the Downs. A further point was taken—namely, that if the defendant vessel says, in effect, "Here I am in a crippled condition, and not under command," and exhibits "not under command" signals, she should act accordingly, and leave other vessels to get out of the way; but the evidence is that she, some time before this collision actually happened, ported her helm. I have already said that I do not accept the view that they ported because of a position of lights such as they contend for, but they ported their helm to a green light. The Elder Brethren take the view, and I agree, that that was a material cause in bringing about this collision. The helm was ported, the vessel paid off, and I think, but for that having taken place, there was a great probability that the plaintiffs' ship would have got across the bows of the barque. My view, therefore, is that, having signalled that she was not under command, and that the other vessel must act for her, she ought not to have acted in the way she did, but should have kept her course and let the brigantine get out of the way. She did not do so, and the result is that the Hawthornbank must be held alone to blame. There is one other matter. As I have already said, the story told by those on the Hawthornbank, that they ported to a red light in order to give more room and to steer better, I do not accept as regards the light that was seen. I think the vessels were green to red. I think, therefore, that the look-out was defective on board the Hawthornbank, and that the pilot was not properly informed that there was a green light in sight, which light really must have been visible at the time the helm was ported. It seems to me that, if that is so, the Hawthornbank must be held alone to blame, and her owners liable, because the look-out was defective—perhaps because they were looking after the tug and not paying sufficient attention to the navigation ahead. That disposes of the question of compulsory pilotage.

[ADM.]

THE HAWTHORNBANK.

[ADM.]

pilot and a tug. A tug came up in response and offered to pilot and tow the vessel into harbour, but the offer was refused by her master, and the tug sent back for a pilot. In the meanwhile the hawser parted, and the vessel drifted ashore. Her value at the time the services of the tug were offered was 8500*l.* The costs of re-floating were 1150*l.*, and of the repairs in consequence of the stranding 5600*l.* In an action for salvage by the owners, master, and crew of the trawler:

Held, on the facts, that they were entitled to salvage, and to an award of 750*l.*, and that, for the purposes of arriving at a proper award, the value of the salvaged property must be taken at 8500*l.*

Held, further, that the steamship ought to have taken the services of the tug when offered.

ACTION for salvage.

The plaintiffs were the White Star Fishing Company Limited, the owners of the trawler Waago, and her master and crew. The defendants were the owners of the German steamship Germania.

The Waago was a steam trawler of 155 tons gross register, fitted with engines of 350 horsepower effective, and was at the time on a voyage from the Faroe fishing grounds to Grimsby with fish, and manned by a crew of ten hands all told.

The Germania was a steamship of 2607 tons gross register, and was bound for Kratzwick to Newcastle-on-Tyne in water ballast.

About 7.30 a.m. on the 3rd Dec. 1902, the Waago was about thirty miles E.S.E. of Girdlestone Light, in Aberdeen Bay, when the Germania was seen flying signals of distress. On coming up to her it was found that she had broken her tail-end shaft and lost her propeller the day before, and was drifting to the N.N.W. with two anchors down. The master of the Germania hailed the Waago, and it was agreed that she should render assistance. After three attempts, during one of which the hawser parted and the Germania collided with the quarter of the Waago, a connection was made, and towing commenced about noon for Aberdeen, and a W.N.W. course was shaped. About 5 p.m. Aberdeen Bay was reached, and the Waago held the Germania head to wind while flares were exhibited for a tug and a pilot. A tug came alongside, and, after signalling the Germania, told the master of the Waago that there was too much sea for a pilot boat to cross the bar. The tug then left to fetch a pilot. Between 8 and 9 p.m. the master of the Germania hailed the Waago to slack away the warp, and the Waago accordingly dropped astern to do so, but as she did this the Germania drifted to leeward, and, on the Waago being again hailed to go ahead, the hawser parted. The Germania then dropped anchor, and steps were taken to make the Waago fast again, but before this could be done the Germania drifted ashore. She was eventually floated off at a cost of 1150*l.*, and the subsequent repairs due to the stranding cost 5600*l.*

The value of the Waago was 5000*l.*, and of her cargo 254*l.* after allowance had been made for deterioration of the fish owing to the delay caused in rendering the services. The value of the Germania at the time the services were rendered was 8500*l.*

Vol. XC., 2321.

It was contended by the defendants that no salvage was due to the plaintiffs, as the Waago had not completed the services she had agreed to render. They also contended that, if any salvage was due, the cost of floating her off and the repairs due to the stranding ought to be deducted from her value.

Aspinall, K.C. and Batten for the plaintiffs.—The master of the Germania was unwilling to avail himself of the services of the tug at once. It was an error on the part of the master to order the Waago to be slacked away, and in consequence of his mistake the hawser parted and the Germania's anchor dragged, and she drifted ashore. It is submitted that the value of the vessel before she stranded—viz., 8500*l.*—must be taken as her value for the purposes of the award.

Laing, K.C. and Stubbs for the defendants contra.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to any salvage award. The Waago ought to have towed the Germania into Aberdeen Harbour, and it was owing to unskilful towing that the hawser parted and the Germania drifted ashore. Assuming, however, that the plaintiffs are entitled to some award, it is submitted that the value on which the award is based must be what she was actually worth to her owners—namely, 1750*l.*

Batten in reply.—The services of the Waago came to an end when signals were made by the master of the Germania for a pilot and a tug. The intention of the master was to employ others to take him into harbour, and, as far as the Waago was concerned, her services were then completed.

BARNES, J.—The question is whether any salvage is to be given in this case, and, if so, upon what basis. The plaintiffs contend that they ought to be treated as having brought into safety, at the time they finished their services, property to the value of 8500*l.*; whereas the defendants contend that there was no salvage at all, and that, in any event, the value of the Germania can only be taken at 1750*l.*, as 6750*l.* has to be deducted, made up of 5600*l.*, the cost of repairs, and 1150*l.*, the cost of the salvage operations to get her off. The Germania had met with bad weather, in which she had broken her tail-end shaft and lost her propeller. When she was found by the Waago she had two anchors down, but they did not prevent her drifting generally in a north-westerly direction. The Waago was asked to assist her, but there was some confusion as to the exact words used by the English master of the Waago and the German master of the Germania in connection with the arrangement made for the towage. It has, however, been practically agreed by counsel that the matter, so far as salvage is concerned, must be treated as an open arrangement—to render salvage services with the object of getting into a place of safety—and on that basis I propose to treat the case. The Waago was made fast to the Germania about midday on the 3rd Dec., and started to tow her. It took her a long time—I think some four hours—to make fast, and afterwards the vessel was towed in the direction of Aberdeen. They appear to have reached Aberdeen Bay at about 5 p.m., or a little later, in the afternoon; and, so far, matters went fairly well. It had been bad weather, with a strong wind and sea from the

S.E., and I think—and the Elder Brethren agree—that if the vessel had not had assistance from towing she would have been in danger of going on the coast further to the northward than she did. When the vessels came near to Aberdeen, according to the master of the plaintiffs' vessel, a white flare was burnt for a tug and a pilot, and I think it is fairly obvious that the master of the trawler is right in saying that he would not like to have taken such a large vessel as the Germania by himself into Aberdeen, but that he could take her where she would be in a position to get tugs, and I think his statement is correct that signals were made for tugs. In response a tug came out and came alongside the Germania, and a conversation ensued between the two masters. The master of the tug said that he told the master of the Germania that he could not have a pilot, because it was too rough for a pilot to come out; but he himself had a licence for Aberdeen for the tug and could take the Germania safely in, and get a pilot afterwards; that he could go ahead, and the trawler, if wanted, might make fast astern, and the remuneration could be settled ashore. Then there was a discussion, according to his evidence, as to the price; but the master of the Germania said he would not give more than 10*l*. There the negotiations, such as they were, broke off, without anything further being done. There is one point which it is material to mention here. The master of the tug said that it was not safe for the trawler alone to take the Germania in, and that he told the master of the Germania he must dismiss the trawler from ahead, but she could work astern. Now, the master of the Germania says that when he had this conversation he understood the master of the tug to say, "Clear out the trawler altogether; I will bring you into a safe place"; and that he himself said to the master of the tug, "You had better let one of your men go on board the trawler, and you can go astern, inside." Then he went on to say that the tug went to the trawler, but came back and "asked if I would pay him if he brought out a pilot. I said he had better bring two, and that I would pay him 6*l*. to 7*l*. He asked 200*l*. for going astern, and I offered him 10*l*., and he laughed at that and went to the trawler." It seems to me that there may have been some confusion between what these men understood each other to say; but one thing I do not think is established by the defendants, and that is that any stipulation was made by the tug that the trawler should be absolutely dismissed. The general inference I draw is that there was bargaining going on, and that the defendants' master had the offer of a tug; but that he seems to have thought that if he could obtain a pilot he could get in with the trawler, and probably would have to pay but a very little more for a tug astern. My view is that the trawler's master was right in saying that he would not like to take the big ship in alone, but would bring her to a place where she could get a tug, and that those in charge of the ship should have recognised that position and never have allowed the tug to go. The master of the Germania should have taken that tug, and then this disaster would not have happened. However, the two vessels remained out in this weather, and the hawser near the steamer began to chafe. Those on the steamer started to get it in, but could not, because it was weighted between the two vessels by a chain cable. The master of the trawler seems to have thought, from their calling constantly to him to go astern, that he must take the weight off somehow, and that there might be some risk in doing it, but that he must, as they were drifting nearer the shore, get a tant hawser between them. I have consulted the Elder Brethren about this, and they do not see that there is any ground for suggesting that the master of the trawler was doing anything wrong in the circumstances at all. Their view is that it was not his fault that the hawser parted and that this misfortune happened. I think the evidence of the master of the trawler must be accepted, and that he tried to make fast again and could not. Unfortunately the steamer's anchor did not hold, and she went ashore. What is the general result? It seems to me that the plaintiff trawler had done what she could to bring the defendants' vessel into a place of safety, and that if the tug had been taken there would have been no difficulty. I regard it as a case in which there ought to be a salvage award made on the basis of the plaintiffs' vessel having assisted the Germania from where she was taken in tow to a place in Aberdeen Bay, close to Aberdeen. Looked at from that point of view, it is a case of towage, though for a very short time, of a very valuable character, because it was from a position where the vessel, if unassisted, would have been in danger of going ashore at a spot more northerly than Aberdeen, to a place where she could get a tug. I have considered the case very carefully, with the assistance of the Elder Brethren, and I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled, on a value of 8500*l*., to an award of 750*l*.

Feb. 29 and March 1.

(Before WILLIAMS, STIRLING, and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ.)

TOWERS v. AFRICAN TUG COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Company—Payment of dividend out of capital—Ultra vires—Bonâ fide mistake of directors—Knowledge of shareholders—Action by them against directors—Retention of dividend by plaintiffs—Right to maintain action.

Where a company had, by a bonâ fide mistake of its directors, illegally paid a dividend out of capital, and an action was brought against the company and the directors by shareholders (purporting to sue on behalf of themselves and all other the shareholders of the company) who had received—and still retained—their shares of that dividend with full knowledge of all the circumstances, it was held that the plaintiffs, having the dividend in their pockets which they knew was wrongfully there, ought not to be allowed to complain, and could not obtain any greater right of complaint because in form their action was an action by themselves and all other the shareholders of the company.

Dictum of Brett, L.J. in Re Exchange Banking Company Limited; Flitcroft's case (48 L. T. Rep. 86; 21 Ch. Div. 519, at pp. 534, 535) applied.

Decision of Byrne, J. reversed.

THE above-named company was a company limited by shares and was incorporated in 1896 under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1893 with the object (amongst other things) of carrying on the business of steam-tug owners, with a nominal capital of 4000*l.* in eighty shares of 50*l.* each, of which the sum of 2550*l.* was duly subscribed for.

Art. 36 of the articles of association of the company authorised dividends to be paid to "the members according to their rights and interests in the profits"; and art. 37 empowered the directors from time to time to "pay to the members such interim dividends as in their judgment the position of the company justifies."

Thomas Norne Alexander, James Ambrose Wood, and Joseph Lawson were the first directors of the company; and at a meeting of the directors, held on the 7th Sept. 1896, at which Alexander, Wood, and Lawson, as directors, and William Hunter Towers, as secretary of the company, were present, Alexander was appointed chairman of the company, and Towers was appointed its manager and secretary.

At the same meeting it was resolved that the quorum of directors of the company for the transaction of business should be two.

Subsequently Lawson retired from the board and Paskel Wedlake was appointed a director in his place.

Up to the 20th March 1900 the business of the company was carried on at a loss of its capital of about 700*l.* subject to profits made in the company's business which for the year ending the 31st July 1899 amounted to 245*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* (on the footing that no part of such profit was applied in reduction of such loss) and up to the 13th March 1900 no dividend on the company's capital had been declared or paid except a dividend of 5*l.* per cent. paid in the year 1897, of which the sum of 36*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.* was improperly paid.

On the 13th March 1900 Alexander wrote a letter to Towers (as secretary of the company) stating that the shareholders in the company were much disappointed that no dividend was being paid on their shares and adding:

I talked the matter over with Mr. Wood in London yesterday and, considering that we have made over 500*l.* (at least 300*l.*) last year, we think you could with safety pay 5 per cent. dividend which would swallow up about 100*l.* and so satisfy them.

On the 16th March 1900 Towers replied by letter as follows:

I do not know much about limited liability law; but at the same time it appears to me that paying a dividend in our present position is tantamount to paying it out of capital, which, I believe, is illegal. If, however, Mr. Wood and yourself as a majority of the board will send me a joint letter instructing me to pay a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. I will, of course, be pleased to follow your instructions.

On the 17th March 1900 Alexander wrote a letter to Towers (as secretary of the company) asking whether the company "made any money last year or not?" to which letter, on the 19th March 1900, Towers replied by letter as follows:

The figures I have given you as to the profits are perfectly correct, our profit from the 1st Aug. to the end of Dec. amounting to a little over 300*l.* exclusive of what we recovered from Mr. Lawson. I was under the impression that before we could pay a dividend it would be necessary to wipe off the debit balance amounting to about 700*l.*; but, if you think otherwise, if you will let me have the joint letter from Mr. Wood and yourself I shall be pleased to at once issue cheques for the dividends.

On the 20th March 1900 Alexander and Wood wrote a letter to Towers (as secretary of the company) as follows:

It is resolved that you send out a dividend of five per cent. to the shareholders of this company and that this resolution be entered into the minutes of next directors' meeting.

Cheques on the company's banking account signed by Wood for sums to be paid as a dividend of five per cent. on the company's subscribed capital of 2550*l.* and amounting altogether to the sum of 127*l.* 10*s.* were shortly afterwards paid by the company to its shareholders.

At a meeting of the directors of the company held on the 5th July 1900 at which only Alexander and Wood, as directors, and Towers, as secretary, were present, a resolution was passed by those two directors of which the following minute appeared in the company's minute-book:

Dividend.—The secretary reported that, acting on the directors' instructions, he had on the 23rd March sent out a dividend at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. His action in so doing was confirmed.

Wedlake was never consulted as to or took part in the declaration or payment of the 5 per cent. dividend.

A balance-sheet correctly showing the state of the company's affairs on the 31st July 1900 was prepared by the company's auditor, and was on the 28th Aug. 1900 signed and sent by him to the directors of the company.

In that balance-sheet it was stated, as was the fact, that a dividend not earned to the amount of 127*l.* 10*s.* (being the dividend hereinbefore referred to) had been paid by the company, and that sum was inserted in the assets or credit side under the item "Debtors."

It further appeared by the balance-sheet, as was the fact, that up to the 31st July 1899 the company had lost 756*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.* of its capital, but as against this had made for the year ending the 31st July 1899 a profit of 245*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*

With the balance-sheet the auditor sent a letter, dated the 28th Aug. 1899 and addressed to the chairman and directors of the company, in which, after stating that he had completed the audit of the company's books up to the 31st July, and inclosed certified balance-sheet, which showed the position of the company at that date, stated as follows:

The dividend paid in March last not having been earned, I have added the amount and dividends overpaid some time ago, which makes the total on the asset side 164*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.* I should like to point out that it is illegal to pay dividends unless they are earned, and the directors are liable in such cases, as it amounts to paying dividends out of the capital.

[CT. OF APP.]

On the 12th March 1903 Towers' engagement as manager and secretary of the company was terminated.

A few days later he and Wedlake commenced this action against the company and Alexander and Wood, purporting to sue on behalf of themselves and all other the shareholders of the company other than those who were defendants, and claiming (inter alia) a declaration that the resolution purporting to have been passed by the defendants Alexander and Wood as directors of the company, and dated the 20th March 1900, and the payment of the dividend therein referred to were respectively ultra vires and illegal; and also a declaration that the defendants Alexander and Wood were jointly and severally liable to make good to the company the sum of 127*l.* 10*s.* on account or in respect of the dividend with interest thereon; and judgment against them jointly and severally for payment of such moneys and interest accordingly.

Subsequently to the commencement of the action all the other shareholders of the company obtained an order joining them as defendants to the action to oppose the plaintiffs' claims therein.

By their defence the defendants objected that the action could not be maintained, inasmuch as the company was not plaintiff, and the action was brought by two shareholders only, and not in fact on behalf of any other shareholder of the company.

They alleged that the dividend paid on the 20th March 1900 was an interim dividend; that in fact in the half-year profits had been made to more than double the amount of the interim dividend; that both plaintiffs accepted payment of the dividend, and had ever since kept the same without question; that it was paid in good faith, and in the honest exercise of the directors' discretion, and in the reasonable belief that it was properly payable; that all the shareholders of the company had had all the contentions and facts relied on by the plaintiffs placed before them, and were satisfied that in the circumstances it was proper to declare such a dividend, inasmuch as repairs had been debited to revenue account that might properly be debited to capital account, and the company was under no obligation to make good any such loss as was alleged of its fully paid share capital, but such loss was necessarily incident to the inevitable depreciation of the company's property; that in any case all the shareholders of the company acquiesced therein and accepted payment of the dividend, and no creditor was or had been in any way affected thereby; and that in the circumstances the plaintiffs were estopped from putting forward the claims which they made, and in any case were barred by their own laches and acquiescence, and were not entitled to the relief claimed contrary to the wishes of the company and of all the other shareholders.

The defendants counter-claimed that in the event of the plaintiffs being declared entitled to any such relief as was claimed by them in respect of the dividend the sums paid to the plaintiffs on their then holdings amounting to 15*l.* and 17*l.* 10*s.* respectively, which the plaintiffs took and had ever since retained with full notice of all the facts relating thereto, should, if the same were illegally paid, be repaid by the plaintiffs respectively with interest and costs.

On the 6th Nov. 1903 the action came on for trial before Byrne, J., when the following judgment was delivered:—

BYRNE, J.—This case is regretful in some respects; but I have to deal with it as it stands. I have dealt with one branch of the case, and that has failed. Now, this is the second branch of the case. It is an action by Mr. Towers and Mr. Wedlake on behalf of themselves and all other the shareholders of the defendant company, other than those who are defendants against the company, and two of the directors of the company. Subsequently the other shareholders came in by arrangement, because they asked to be joined as defendants not coinciding in their views with the plaintiffs. Now, what is sought is to get paid into the company's coffers by the defendants, as the trustees, is a sum of 127*l.* 10*s.*, which represented, as stated in the balance-sheet for the year 1890, the amount of a dividend paid, but not earned at the time it was paid. Now, the company had carried on business from the year 1896, and there were three directors of the company—Mr. Alexander, one of the defendants, Mr. Wedlake, one of the plaintiffs, and Mr. Wood, another of the defendants. Two were a quorum. The plaintiff Towers was the secretary of the company. In the month of March 1900 the state of the accounts of the company was this: That there had been a debit of, in round figures, about 700*l.* at the date of the previous balance-sheet. Mr. Towers, the secretary, first of all had an interview with Mr. Alexander, and afterwards in writing to him recognised the fact that they had made a profit during the month since the last balance-sheet and the month of March 1900 of from 300*l.* to 500*l.* Mr. Alexander and Mr. Wood had had the situation pointed out to them by Mr. Towers in a letter, in these words: "I do not know much about limited liability law, but at the same time it appears to me that paying a dividend in our present position is tantamount to paying it out of capital, which I believe is illegal." Mr. Alexander took another view. He, as he said in the witness-box, was under the impression that a company might pay dividends out of profits earned for the year irrespective of the fact that there was a debit balance in the books. That is how I understood the effect of his evidence. The dividend was paid upon the faith of the signatures of Mr. Alexander and of Mr. Wood, Mr. Wedlake refusing to sign. Then comes at a subsequent meeting the balance-sheet, which was the 14th Sept. 1900, which, with a letter or report from the auditor, was considered. At all events, the balance-sheet was there produced and read. Mr. Alexander moved and Mr. Wedlake seconded that the same be adopted, and that was agreed to. Then there was a general meeting of the company, and that is bringing the matter down to date—the 31st July 1900. Then there was a subsequent general meeting at which the balance-sheet was passed, and the report was before the meeting. Now, that balance-sheet shows on the face of this sum, as I have mentioned, as having been paid out of profits not earned 127*l.* 10*s.* There had been a previous over-payment in respect of dividend which is brought in as the amount of 36*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.* The total result of the profit and loss account, taking the deficit as of the previous year at 756*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.*, taking off profit for the year 245*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*, leaves still a deficiency of 510*l.* 12*s.* 7*d.* All this is in accordance with the balance-sheet, and in accordance with the method of keeping the accounts which the company had practised. They had not, it is true, written off as for depreciation something which might, in some years, have been written off as for depreciation. In the report to which I have referred of the 28th Aug. the auditor says: [His Lordship read it, and continued:] Now, these two gentlemen who are suing have allowed a very long time to elapse, and the suggestion was that there was no evidence on the subject, but disputes had arisen between them at a subsequent date. They now come to have this sum made good. Now, this is a question of doing an act ultra vires and in respect of which, as it appears to me, the directors must be liable as to the company to recoup the capital. Being illegal, the fact that individuals have received dividends under it would not operate so as to prevent an order directing the return of the amounts illegally paid, although it may be as against every one of the shareholders the directors paying the money will have the right against the shareholders to get back the money paid to them. That, I take it, depends upon special circumstances. As regards Mr. Towers, he certainly knew, when he received the dividend, not only that it was a payment, but knew also that in his view it was a wrongful payment. Therefore whatever order is made against the two directors, the order will also have to be made against him to make good his share to them to recoup to them what they have had to pay—that is, the sum of some 7*l.* odd. Now, the argument on behalf of the directors has been put in this way: There was power under the articles to declare the dividend, for by clause 36 the company in general was authorised to declare a dividend to be paid to the members according to their rights and interests in the profits. And by clause 37 the directors were empowered from time to time to pay to the members such interim dividends as in their judgment the position of the company justified. There is no question in this case about honesty or bona fides. There is no doubt that these two gentlemen were acting perfectly bona fide and perfectly honestly, and they thought that they were justified in making payment of this interim dividend. But I am bound to say that, having carefully listened to the arguments, I must accept the argument of the plaintiffs' counsel with reference to this matter. The directors knew that from the books there was no amount in respect of profit available for an interim dividend. They did know this that for some months previously there had been certain profit made, and they hoped that at the end of the year the future profit which they should make would be more than sufficient to wipe out the old deficit and to justify this interim dividend. I confess I do not think that that justifies it. The money at the time of the interim dividend must be there before it can be paid in one form or another. Of course, if the money is there at the time, or something to represent it is there at the time, the interim dividend is paid, it will matter not, as

I am at present advised, that subsequently during the year there were losses or other events had happened, so that it turned out at the end of the year there were no profits as for the whole year justifying even such a payment as had been made. It could not then be possible I mean to attack the directors. The plaintiffs in the present case do not appeal much to my sympathy. They rested under this a long while. They have accepted their own dividends, but they come insisting on a legal right, and I cannot say that Mr. Wedlake having declined to join in the payment of this dividend (although he subsequently accepted payment of it) is not entitled to sue as on behalf of the company and as on behalf of the other shareholders to have this money replaced. Therefore I shall make an order for the replacing of the money. But I think that I shall be right in doing this, and I do not know that it will be opposed. The company has had what is termed a windfall, and there will be on the making up of the accounts for the present year more than sufficient to make good the whole of the debit balance. And that being so, unless the plaintiffs' counsel give me some good reason to the contrary, although I make the order for the repaying of this money, I think I shall be justified in saying that the order is not to be enforced until after the next general meeting, when the balance-sheet is produced. I am not now saying in what form it may be done; but I can very well see that the accounts may be put in such a form as that the court need not go through the farce of making these gentlemen pay up the money, and then let them go again to the different shareholders and ask for payment from such of those as they can recover it from, having regard to the circumstances of the accounts. Therefore, so far that is with reference to the order I propose to make. That leaves only one point, and that would be as to the interest upon the amount. Of course, I assume that the directors would be liable to repay with interest but then I take it that possibly that may be made good too. The interest, Mr. Norton reminds me, would be profit. Then the right thing would be to make an order for payment of it with interest at 4 per cent. up to the date of payment. But the order is not to be acted upon until after the next general meeting of the company; and not then if legal matters are put straight. Then with reference to costs of the action. On a very large part of the case the plaintiffs have most undoubtedly failed—on by far the largest claim. I think that the right form of order will be for the plaintiffs to pay the defendants' costs, except so far as increased by that part of their claim which failed. I think I must do that, and then the one can be set off against the other; unless the parties can come to some sort of terms now with regard to costs. I said what I have said advisedly, because, supposing I made the order in another phraseology that might lead to this, having regard to the effect of a case in the Court of Appeal where the point was very much considered. It was thought that the true view really was that if the plaintiff succeeded in his action, if it was only as to part although the court might sometimes make a difficulty as a general rule he could not get that which he was entitled to without incurring what might be called the general costs of the action except so far as they are increased by the claim upon which the defendants have failed. Then there will be judgment on the counter-claim with costs to be dealt with in the same way, and there will be liberty to apply.

From that decision the defendants now appealed.

Eve, K.C. and Ashton Cross for the appellants. —There are two points raised by this appeal: First, whether the action can be maintained by the plaintiffs at all; and secondly, whether if the action be maintainable there is any liability on the part of the defendant directors to repay to the company the interim dividend declared by them. On the first point they referred to

WILLIAMS, L.J.—On the whole I do not think that the plaintiffs are entitled to any relief here. It would not be very satisfactory if we had to determine this case ultimately upon the pleadings. I quite feel the force of what the respondents' counsel said as to there being the allegation in the statement of claim in the action that, "The plaintiff Wedlake was never consulted as to or took part in the declaration or payment of the said 5 per cent. dividend." I quite agree that when you come to look at the defence there is no denial of that allegation in the statement of claim. But it does not seem to me that that disposes of the whole case. I mean that it does not dispose of the whole of the case even if you take that allegation as having been admitted by the defendants, because the truth of the matter is that that allegation is quite consistent with the plaintiff Wedlake having received this dividend with full knowledge of all the facts. If that is so, the matter referred to in the allegation does not in any way negative the incapacity of the plaintiff Wedlake to sue in this action. But that is in all probability the true state of things. I mean that it is, in all probability, true that although the plaintiff Wedlake may not have been consulted as to the declaration and payment he was perfectly well aware of all that was being done. And that is strongly confirmed by the fact that the counter-claim alleges in so many words: "The dividends paid to the plaintiffs on their holdings amounted to" so-and-so, giving the figures, "which the plaintiffs took and have ever since retained with full notice of all the facts relating thereto." I believe that that is true, not only because the plaintiffs when they come to plead to the counter-claim seem to me, on the face of the pleadings, to admit the truth of that, but also because when I turn to the minute-book and see the minutes which were there—and in particular the minute of the meeting of the 14th Sept. 1900 at which the plaintiff Wedlake was present—I cannot doubt that he must have been perfectly well aware of all the facts connected with the declaration and payment of this interim dividend and the state of the accounts at the time. In that state of things, what ought to be done with this action? There is no doubt that the payment of this interim dividend was an ultra vires payment. I start with the assumption that one is bound to make, that if an act done is by a company which is ultra vires, no confirmation by shareholders—not even by every member of the company—can convert that which was ultra vires into something intra vires. It always must be ultra vires. As has been pointed out in one or two of the cases, the result of that is that if the company are plaintiffs, no amount of acquiescence or resolutions by the shareholders can form an answer to the action by the company for the reinstatement of things in the state in which they would have been but for the ultra vires act complained of. But, to my mind, it is a different thing where the action is brought by a shareholder on behalf of himself and other shareholders. I am assuming in this case that this was one of those cases in which the facts were such that the plaintiffs ought to be able to sue in a representative action for the purpose of preventing acts from being done in reference to the company in which they are interested, and which might damnify the company by reason of the acts being ultra vires. I assume that an action not only to prevent but to remedy matters that have been done ultra vires is an action which can be brought in the form in which the present action is brought. But although that is so, my own judgment is that this is an action which has to be brought by all the shareholders, as the plaintiffs, personally. It is an action which the plaintiffs cannot bring without having an interest. It is an action which a stranger could not bring. Under these circumstances what is it we have to ask ourselves here? If it be the fact, as I think it is, that these plaintiffs knew of all these things which have been done, received the dividends with knowledge of all the facts, and then brought this action with the money still in their pockets, ought they to be allowed to bring this action, which, as I have pointed out, to my mind is an action which they can bring in consequence of their personal interest in the matter? I think not. I think that an action could not be brought by an individual shareholder complaining of this matter which is ultra vires if he himself had in his pocket, at the time he brought the action, the proceeds of that very ultra vires act. I think, in the same way, that it does not alter matters that the plaintiff says that he is suing on behalf of himself and others. I think that that which ought to make us say he ought not to bring the action ought equally to make us say that he ought not to be the peg upon which the action is to be hung for the benefit of others. Assuming that to be so, what answer is sought to be made here? I think that the respondents' counsel were disposed to put the only logical answer that could be put, and to say that they were bound to contend that the very wrongdoer himself, who had got the proceeds of the wrongdoing in his own pocket, might, if the matter was a matter which was ultra vires, sue as a plaintiff to have put it right, and bring his action against the other shareholders who had benefited by it, and compel them to restore the capital which had been wrongfully paid out to them. But I do not think that that is right, and if that is not right I think that the return of the capital in the course of the trial after the action has been brought does not make things any better. Admittedly these dividends were still in the pockets of these plaintiffs when they brought this action. The dividends were still in their pockets when this action came to be tried. It is quite true that in the course of the trial the plaintiffs said they were prepared to pay this money back. I think that the form is that they were content that judgment should go against them personally in respect of it. But I do not think that would make an action good which was not otherwise a good action in its inception. I must say in this particular case that there is a strong inclination in my mind not to give the plaintiffs the relief which they ask, because, starting with the fact that capital had been distributed in the payment of this interim dividend, that fact had been recognised by the company and by the shareholders. It appears on the face of the balance-sheet, and they were minded to replace this capital and had every prospect of doing so, even out of the very current year's profits. Under these circumstances this action was wholly unnecessary and wholly uncalled for. It seems to me that the court is not bound, when it sees that this ultra vires act is in course of being put right, and will very shortly be put right, to give relief to a plaintiff of this sort who has acquiesced in the wrong, and who has got part of the proceeds of the wrong in his pocket. Under those circumstances I think that this appeal ought to succeed. The only part of the order of the court below which stands is that which relates to the counter-claim. The defendants to the counter-claim (that is, the plaintiffs) will have to pay the costs of that, but in the action and on the appeal there will be no costs at all on either side.

STIRLING, L.J.—I also think that this appeal ought to succeed. I desire to rest my decision on the particular facts of this case, and to abstain from laying down, so far as possible, any general rule on the question whether a shareholder, who has been party to the payment of a dividend out of capital, or who has taken his dividend with knowledge of all the facts, can or cannot come to the court afterwards and complain that the dividend has been paid out of capital, and seek to make either the directors or his fellow shareholders restore what they have paid or received with notice that the dividend had been improperly paid. Now, the facts of the present case are these: According to the balance-sheets of the company down to the 31st July 1899 there was a debit to the company—a loss—of 750*l.* odd. In March of the following year, that is 1900, the company had made a certain amount of profit, but not enough to wipe out the debit balance of the 31st July 1899. In these circumstances the directors thought fit to pay an interim dividend, the amount of which was 127*l.* 10*s.*, a small sum. On the 31st July 1900 it appeared that the profit for the year amounted to 245*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* That, of course, was not nearly enough to wipe out the debit balance of the previous year of over 750*l.* The auditor made his report on the 20th Aug., and pointed out by his report that they had no right to pay this dividend, and he, in drawing up the balance-sheet, put on the face of the balance-sheet an entry which showed this—for we find these entries in the balance-sheet—over-paid dividend, 36*l.* odd; dividend not earned, which is the dividend in question, 127*l.* 10*s.* That balance-sheet is submitted to the shareholders, and is approved by them. Therefore it stands recorded on the face of the transactions of the company that a dividend had been improperly paid, and in any future dealing, supposing it was honest, the credit against the company has to be wiped out before any dividend can be properly paid. That being so, in July 1901 a further profit is made, which amounts to 510*l.* odd, and on the 31st July 1902 the debit balance was completely wiped out, but not enough was made to pay a dividend. Then this took place in March 1903: Mr. Towers, who was one of the plaintiffs, and who had been secretary and manager of the company, is dismissed from his office. Thereupon, on the 20th March following, he and one of the directors—Mr. Wedlake—bring this action, and they charge that an ultra vires act had been committed, and that the 127*l.* 10*s.* which had been made and had been lost by the company ought to be brought back into the coffers of the company, and that is the object of the action. Now, it is proved beyond all contradiction by documents under the hand of Mr. Towers that he was perfectly well aware of the circumstances in which the dividend was paid. It is not true that he was in the same position as Mr. Wedlake; but, I think, having regard to the admissions which he made by not denying the allegation in the counter-claim that he received his dividends with full notice of all the facts relating thereto, and submitted to judgment against himself on that footing, and also the high probabilities of the case, that, inasmuch as he did not choose to go into the box and deny it, we ought to assume that he, like his co-plaintiff Mr. Towers, knew the facts under which the dividends were declared. Now the form of the action is one by the plaintiffs against the company and other shareholders. Originally all the shareholders were not made parties, but at the request of the other shareholders they ultimately were made defendants to the action. So that we have here all the shareholders of the company. I think this is a form of action which, no doubt, in certain circumstances may be maintained. That a shareholder who had received a dividend without knowing anything of the illegality of it might maintain such an action I do not doubt. Whether he ought not to return what he had received in respect of dividend is another question; and that may depend upon whether he had notice, at the time when he took it, of the acts complained of. Why is it that this form of action is allowed? The proper plaintiffs prima facie where it is sought to bring back the property of the company into its own coffers, is the company itself. But there are exceptions to that rule—and what is the reason or meaning of the exceptions? Sir George Jessel, M.R., in the case which has been referred to, of Russell v. Wakefield Waterworks Company Limited (32 L. T. Rep. 685; L. Rep. 20 Eq. 474), says this: "The exceptions turn very much on the necessity of the case, that is the necessity of the court doing justice." Now this is a case, to begin with, in which no one suggests any fraud or dishonesty on the part of the directors or anyone else. The directors who paid this dividend made a mistake, but no one charges anything more than a mistake. Everything was perfectly open. The fact was disclosed by the balance-sheet of 1900, the first balance-sheet which was submitted to the shareholders after the making of the dividend. The fact appeared. Further, the subsequent dealings seemed to show that the company did not intend to overlook the fact that this dividend had been improperly paid, or that there was an intention on the part of anyone to do anything other than that which was right, and to make good the deficiency in the capital of the company which had been created by the payment of that dividend. That seems to me to have been the result of the subsequent balance-sheets. Moreover, what do we find the plaintiffs themselves doing? They acquiesce in this course being taken by the company from the 14th Sept., when they certainly knew it, down to March 1903, when this action was brought. It does not seem to have ever been suggested by any one party that an action should be brought by the company to recover this deficiency of the capital, and I think that we ought to infer that what commended itself to the plaintiffs, as well as to the other shareholders, was to go on. The company was prosperous, it was wiping out year by year a great part of the deficiency, and ultimately, when the whole deficiency, including this deficiency in capital, had been replaced, the intention was to pay a proper dividend, and not until then. I do not think that there was any necessity shown, looking at all the circumstances of the case, for the intervention of the court to compel the payment of this small sum—for such it was really—in the way in which the plaintiffs seek to throw the duty upon the court. In truth Byrne, J., although he gave a judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, was so far from desiring to press that that he directed it not to be enforced, in order to see what might be the result of the further trading, and whether the deficiency in capital would not be wiped out in the ordinary course. I think, on the whole, that justice would have been met if this action had been dismissed on the ground of the personal conduct of the plaintiffs.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In my view there is no question really here which admits of argument on one part of it—namely, that this was an illegal payment because it was a payment out of capital. Nor do I think that it can be contested, and it certainly was not contested by Mr. Eve, that a transaction of that kind cannot be ratified by the shareholders. But, in order to constitute what is relevant in this case, one must go further. An action in respect of or arising out of an ultra vires transaction ought properly to be brought by the company. But it has been long well established that there are cases in which such an action may be maintained by a shareholder suing on behalf of himself and all other shareholders against the company as defendants. I will not pause to consider under what particular circumstances such an action may be maintained; but I assume that this is one of those cases in which such an action may be maintained. I mean in point of form. I think, however, it is equally clear that the action cannot be maintained by a common informer. A plaintiff in an action of this form must be a person who is really interested. When you get that fact clearly established it seems to me impossible to avoid taking the next step, that all personal exceptions against the individual plaintiff must be gone into and considered before relief can be granted. Here I have no intention of going through all the facts again. I think it is clearly proved, as it is certainly admitted by the counter-claim, that both the plaintiffs took this dividend with full notice of all the facts relating thereto. It is also clear that they had the dividends, which they took with full notice that it was payment out of capital, in their pockets at the date when this action was commenced. Now, can a shareholder who has, with full notice of all the material facts received, part of the capital by way of dividend, and who still retains that money in his pocket, maintain an action against the directors who have paid the dividend? I think the true answer to that question is, he cannot. It may be that there is no direct authority on the point, but the dictum of Brett, L.J. in Re Exchange Banking Company Limited; Flitcroft's case (48 L. T. Rep. 86; 21 Ch. Div. 519) is really, I think, very nearly in point. That was a case of the winding-up of a company. It was a case where there had been an illegal payment of capital, and Brett, L.J. there says (at pp. 534, 535 of 21 Ch. Div.): "I think that there was no ratification at all, because the assent of the shareholders was procured by improper accounts, the untruthfulness of which the shareholders did not know. But suppose they had known it, I think that what was done was a breach of trust which they could not ratify. If they had with full knowledge assumed to ratify what was done, they could not individually have complained, but the shareholders are not the corporation." The view of Brett, L.J. was that shareholders who assumed to ratify could not have individually complained. And it seems to me to follow that a shareholder, having the money in his pocket which he knows is wrongfully there, ought not to be allowed to complain; and he cannot obtain any greater right of complaint because in form his action is an action by himself and all other the shareholders in the company. In fact he must succeed by his own merits, and not by the merits of the other shareholders. Whether this action could have been maintained by these plaintiffs if, before action brought, they had repaid the amount of the dividend which they had received, it is not necessary for us to decide. Speaking for myself, I doubt whether that payment could have sufficed to put the plaintiffs in the right. Here, however, nothing of the kind happened. There is actually a judgment against the plaintiffs upon the counter-claim for payment of these sums. In my view the judgment in the action of the learned judge in the court below ought to be set aside, the judgment on the counter-claim, with costs, being the only part of the order which can stand.

BARRETT v. KEMP BROTHERS. (a)

APPEAL UNDER THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897.

Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Employment—"Factory"—"Wharf"—"On or about"—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

Every wharf is a "factory" within the meaning of sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co. (80 L. T. Rep. 554; (1899) 2 Q. B. 136) is overruled by the decision of the House of Lords in Raine v. Jobson and Co. (85 L. T. Rep. 141; (1901) A. C. 404).

APPEAL by the defendants from the award of the County Court judge at Sittingbourne in proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

The plaintiff was a workman in the employment of the defendants, who were builders and contractors, and he was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

The defendants were the lessees and occupiers of a wharf on the river Medway, which was used by them for loading and unloading goods and materials for the purpose of their business.

There was no machinery or plant upon the wharf; and anyone was allowed to use the wharf upon payment of wharfage charges to the defendants.

A private road, of which the defendants were the lessees and occupiers, led from the high road to the wharf. This private road was about 250 yards long; it was entered from the high road through a high gate; the gate was always kept locked, except when the private road was being used by the defendants or their servants, and the key was kept by the defendants; the defendants' name was upon the gate; and the private road was bounded on both sides by a hedge.

The plaintiff was employed upon the private road, breaking stones for its repair, at a point about thirty yards from the gate and 220 yards from the wharf, when his eye was injured and destroyed by a piece of stone. He had never been employed upon the wharf itself.

The defendants did in fact give notice of this accident to the inspector of factories, and they entered it in a book which they kept for the purpose.

The plaintiff claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. The defendants contended that the wharf was not a "factory" within the meaning of the Act, and that the plaintiff was not employed "on, in, or about" the wharf.

It was admitted that, if the wharf was a "factory" within the meaning of sect. 7 (2) of the Act, the defendants were the "undertakers" within the meaning of the Act.

The Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37) provides:

Sect. 7 (1). This Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined, on or in or about a railway, factory. . . . (2). In this Act "factory" has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts 1878 to 1891, and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant, to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act 1895.

The Factory and Workshop Act 1901 (1 Edw. 7, c. 22), which consolidates and amends the previous Factory Acts, provides:

Sect. 104 (1). The provisions of this Act with respect to (i.) power to make orders as to dangerous machines (section seventeen); (ii.) accidents; (iii.) regulations for dangerous trades; (iv.) powers of inspectors (section one hundred and nineteen); and (v.) fines in case of death or injury (section one hundred and thirty-six) shall have effect as if every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and all machinery or plant used in the process of loading or unloading or coaling any ship in any dock, harbour, or canal were included in the word "factory," and the purpose for which the machinery or plant is used were a manufacturing process.

The County Court judge found that the plaintiff was employed, at the time of the accident, on, in, or about the wharf; and he held that the wharf was a "factory" within the meaning of sect. 7 of the Act; and he made an award in favour of the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

G. A. Scott for the appellants.—The learned County Court judge was wrong in holding that this wharf was a "factory" within the meaning of sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. A wharf is a "factory" within the provisions of that section only if it is a wharf to which some "provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act 1895"—that is, now, to which some provision of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 is applied. Every wharf is not made a "factory," but only a wharf to which some provision of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 is applied:

Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co., 80 L. T. Rep. 554; (1899) 2 Q. B. 136.

The facts of that case were very like the facts of the present case. It was there held that a wharf, used much in the same way as this wharf, was not a "factory" because no provision of the Factory Acts was applied to it. No machinery was used on this wharf, and no provision of the Factory Act 1901 was applied to it. There is no distinction between the present case and that of Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co. (ubi sup.), and the decision therein is conclusive of the present case. The decision of the House of Lords in Raine v. Jobson and Co. (85 L. T. Rep. 141; (1901) A. C. 404) did not overrule the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co. (ubi sup.). The decision of the House of Lords was only that a dock in which a ship was being repaired was a "factory," and that an accident which happened to a workman on the ship was an accident which happened in a "factory." That decision proceeded upon an admission made by counsel for the employers that every dock was a "factory," but the grounds of the decision in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co. (ubi sup.) were not dealt with, and the House of Lords did not purport to overrule that decision. It was not in any way a decision that every dock is a "factory." Some evidence must be given that some provision of the Factory and Workshop Act applies to the wharf in order to show that it is a "factory" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and there was no such evidence in the present case. The accident in this case did not happen on the wharf itself, and therefore the provisions of sect. 104 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 as to notice of accidents do not apply. Further, even if this wharf was a "factory," the accident did not happen "on or about" the wharf. This accident happened at such a distance from the wharf that it cannot be said to have happened "on or about" the wharf:

Cecil Walsh, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

Jan. 14.—COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the learned judge of the Sittingbourne County Court, who held that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. The plaintiff was injured by accident while engaged in breaking stones upon a private road within the curtilage of a wharf. The learned County Court judge found that the employment on the road leading to the wharf was employment on or about the wharf, and he held that the wharf was a "factory" within the meaning of the Act. It was admitted that, if the wharf was a "factory," the defendants were the "undertakers," within the meaning of the Act, in respect of the wharf. Upon the hearing of the appeal we took time to consider our judgment in order to see what is the true bearing of the decision of the House of Lords in Raine v. Jobson and Co. (85 L. T. Rep. 141; (1901) A. C. 404), and what effect it has upon the earlier decision of the Court of Appeal in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co. (80 L. T. Rep. 554; (1899) 2 Q. B. 136). Upon considering that case, I think that the House of Lords in Raine v. Jobson and Co. (ubi sup.) has overruled the decision of this court in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co. (ubi sup.). It is true that in the House of Lords the case was not argued upon the question which arose for discussion in this court in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co. (ubi sup.); and the decision proceeded upon an admission made by counsel on behalf of the employers that, by the combined effect of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 and the Factory and Workshop Act 1895, every dock was a "factory" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. That admission would, of course, equally apply to the case of a wharf as to the case of a dock. That case, therefore, was decided without there being any evidence whether any of the provisions of the Factory Acts were applied by sect. 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895 to the dock there in question. It is true that an admission made by counsel cannot alter the law or make a decision; but the decision is that of the court. In Raine v. Jobson and Co. (ubi sup.) the House of Lords adopted that admission as the basis of their decision, and they decided the case without any evidence that any of the provisions of the Factory Acts had in fact been applied to the dock. It seems to me, therefore, that the decision in the House of Lords was contrary to the decision of this court in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co. (ubi sup.), and is decisive of the present case. I think that we should not be properly respecting the decision of the House of Lords if we were to hold otherwise, although, indeed, the grounds of the decision of this court in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co. (ubi sup.) were not dealt with in the House of Lords in Raine v. Jobson and Co. (ubi sup.). I know that the Court of Session in Scotland, in Jackson v. Rodger and Co. (2 Ct. of Sess. Cas. 533, 5th series), has not taken the same view as that taken by this court in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co. (ubi sup.). I must confess, however, that I am still unable to see any answer to the argument of Mr. Bray in Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co. (ubi sup.). The Legislature in defining a "factory" have not said in clear language that every dock and wharf is to be a "factory." On the contrary, sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 only says that "factory" includes every dock, wharf, . . . to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act 1895," and thereby seems to assume that there may be a dock or wharf which is not a factory. The decision of the Court of Session in Scotland, which coincides with the opinions expressed in the text-books upon the subject, seems to me to entirely ignore the prima facie limitation placed upon the definition of "factory," in relation to a dock or wharf, in sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. It is not necessary, however, now to go into that question, because the House of Lords, in Raine v. Jobson and Co. (ubi sup.), have adopted the view that sect. 7 (2) of the Act of 1897 must be construed as if the limiting words were not introduced at all. The decision of the learned County Court judge upon that point is therefore correct. It seems to me that he was right also upon the other question. He has found that the accident happened while the workman was employed on or about the "factory"; that was a question of fact, and there was ample evidence to justify his finding. This appeal, therefore, fails, and must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

CARYLL v. DAILY MAIL PUBLISHING COMPANY.

[CT. OF APP.]

Monday, Feb. 22.

(Before COLLINS, M.R. and ROMER, L.J.)

CARYLL v. DAILY MAIL PUBLISHING COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Discovery—Interrogatories—Action for libel—Defence of fair comment—Interrogatories as to previous statements concerning plaintiff—Leave to administer—Order XXXI., rr. 1, 2.

In an action for damages for libel in respect of a criticism, published in the defendants' paper, of an opera composed by the plaintiff, the defendants pleaded that the words complained of were fair and bona fide criticism of and comment on the opera, and were published without malice.

The plaintiff applied for leave to deliver interrogatories to the defendants asking them whether they had not previously published an incorrect statement about the plaintiff, what information they had which induced them to believe that statement was true, from whom they derived such information, whether it was derived from the same source as the article complained of, and what steps they had taken to verify it.

Held (dismissing the appeal), that leave to deliver the interrogatories had been properly refused as not being relevant to the question of malice.

APPEAL of the plaintiff from an order of Bucknill, J. at chambers refusing leave to deliver interrogatories for the examination of the defendants.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendants damages for an alleged libel published in their newspaper.

The plaintiff was a musical composer, and was also the conductor at a theatre in connection with his own musical compositions.

The alleged libel was a very severe criticism of an opera called the "Duchess of Dantzic," composed by the plaintiff, and was published in the newspaper on the 19th Oct. 1903.

The defendants set up the defence that the words complained of were fair and bona fide criticism of and comment on the opera, and were published without malice.

On the 24th Jan. 1903 there had been published in the defendants' newspaper the following article:

Theatrical Changes.—Several interesting changes are about to be made in connection with the musical directorships of West-end theatres. Of these perhaps the most important is that of Mr. Ivan Caryll, of the Gaiety Theatre, who will take up the baton at the Empire when the conductor's chair there is vacated by Mr. Wenzel. To present-day patrons of the Gaiety Mr. Ivan Caryll is as closely associated with that theatre as Herr Meyer Lutz was in years gone by, while Mr. Wenzel's ballet music has for years been a distinct feature at the Empire. It is understood that Mr. Howard Talbot will succeed to the Gaiety chair.

After the publication of that article the defendants published in their newspaper a letter from the plaintiff's solicitors as follows:

A paragraph has been published stating in effect that our client, Mr. Ivan Caryll, was about to sever his connection with the Gaiety Theatre in order to conduct at the Empire. The statement so made was inaccurate, as Mr. Caryll has never contemplated accepting a permanent position as a conductor except in connection with his own pieces. As a matter of fact he has recently entered into a new contract for three years to conduct at the old and new Gaiety Theatre.

The plaintiff applied for leave to deliver interrogatories for the examination of the defendants, first asking them whether they had published the article on the 24th Jan. 1903, and then asking: "What information, if any, had you that induced you to believe that the said statement relating to the plaintiff was true? From whom was such information derived? Was the said information, if any, derived from the same source as that from which the article set out in the statement of claim was derived? Did you take any and, if so, what steps to verify it?"

The master refused leave to deliver these interrogatories, and his order was affirmed by Bucknill, J. at chambers.

The plaintiff appealed.

Lush, K.C. and George Elliott for the appellant.—The plaintiff ought to be allowed to administer these interrogatories. Since the decision of this court in McQuire v. Western Morning News (88 L. T. Rep. 757; (1903) 2 K. B. 100) it is settled that, where an article which is complained of as defamatory appears upon its face to be a criticism only, unless there is extrinsic evidence of malice, there is no case to go to the jury. The plaintiff is entitled to give extrinsic evidence of malice, and these interrogatories are directed to obtaining that evidence. The previous article published by the defendants was calculated to injure the plaintiff, and was untrue. It was in reality an attack upon the plaintiff. If the plaintiff can show that it emanated from the same source as the article complained of in this action, that will be evidence that the defendants without due inquiry have allowed their newspaper to be used for the purpose of attacking the plaintiff, and so will be evidence of malice. These interrogatories are strictly relevant to the question whether the defendants published the article complained of without malice. Similar interrogatories were permitted, for the purpose of showing malice, in Elliott v. Garrett (86 L. T. Rep. 441; (1902) 1 K. B. 870), where the defendant in an action for slander pleaded that the words were spoken on a privileged occasion in good faith and without malice, and the Court of Appeal held that an interrogatory, asking the defendant what information he had and what inquiry he had made, ought to be allowed.

Hugh Fraser, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—I think that both the master and the learned judge have properly exercised their discretion in this matter. This court stands in a somewhat peculiar position with regard to appeals of this kind. We have not to deal with such questions as those relating to the delivery of interrogatories upon our own judgment, as if we were deciding the matter in the first instance; but we have only to see whether the discretion vested in the judge has been properly exercised. It seems to me that we cannot reasonably hold in this case that these interrogatories were so relevant to the question of malice that they ought to be allowed. They set out, in the first place, what seems prima facie to be a laudatory notice of the plaintiff, and then proceed to ask what steps (if any) the defendants took to verify the statements in that article, what information they had which induced them to believe that it was true, and whether it came from the same source as the article complained of in this action. The master and the judge came to the conclusion that there was no such indication of malice on the face of the earlier article as to make it relevant to inquire as to its source. A newspaper is not always bound to disclose the secrets of its office, unless the interests of justice make it right that it should do so. The master and the judge have decided that it was not right in this case to make the defendants give this information, and I am not prepared to differ from them. I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It does not follow that, because the issue of malice is raised, therefore all matters which might be the subject of cross-examination at the trial are proper matters for interrogatories. It is noticeable that the matter about which the plaintiff seeks to interrogate the defendants has nothing to do with the subject-matter of the present action. Upon its face the earlier article is merely a statement of fact and not defamatory. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the master and judge have exercised a wise discretion, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Feb. 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, and 17.

(Before FARWELL, J.)

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. MAYOR, &C., OF NOTTINGHAM. (a)

Public and private nuisance—Smallpox hospital—Injunction—Public convenience—Public health—Scientific evidence as to the effects of similar hospitals.

A quia timet action was brought by the Attorney-General on the relation of certain owners and occupiers in a district near a populous city, and by the same owners and occupiers as plaintiffs to restrain the use by the corporation of the city of certain buildings as a smallpox hospital, both as a public and a private nuisance.

Held, that to succeed in such a case it is necessary for the plaintiffs to show, not merely that inconvenience may be experienced or a sentiment of danger may exist; but a strong probability, amounting to a moral certainty that the hospital, if established, will be an actionable nuisance, and that the plaintiffs having failed to show this, that their action must be dismissed.

In the course of the trial the plaintiffs adduced scientific evidence to show from the experience of other smallpox hospitals that such hospitals tended by aerial convection to spread the disease; and rebutting scientific evidence was adduced by the defendants. At the desire of the parties his lordship heard the evidence; but expressed considerable doubt as to its admissibility.

(a) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

WITNESS ACTION.

The corporation of Nottingham, who were the local sanitary authority for the city, determined in the early part of 1903, under their statutory powers, to establish a new smallpox hospital for the accommodation of smallpox patients in their city, the existing accommodation being insufficient.

For this purpose, after much consideration, they acquired a piece of land in the parish of Bulwell, Nottingham, containing four acres of land or thereabouts, and commenced to erect buildings thereon.

About August in the same year the buildings were opened for the reception of smallpox patients, and for the accommodation of a medical staff and nurses.

The buildings stood on a piece of land, triangular in shape, the base being about 350 yards long, and abutting on an old forest road, which was at present used as a highway, and adjoining on another side a private road leading to the pumping station of the Bestwood Coal and Iron Company Limited, and lying between the main line of the Midland Railway and a branch line of the Great Northern Railway, 152 yards from the former and twenty-seven yards from the latter.

The plan of the institution was that every building which was to contain infected persons or things should be placed 40ft. distant from the boundary.

There was an inner fence of barbed wire round the premises; and an outer fence, 6ft. 6in. in height, with barbed wire at the top, inclosed the grounds except in one place, where they were separated from the adjoining properties by a precipitous bank and a wide stream.

The old forest road or highway which led from Bulwell to a place called Papplewick, on which the premises abutted, was used by the public (but only to a small extent) for pedestrian, vehicular, and bicycle traffic.

On either side of the road near the hospital there were only a few dwelling-houses. The nearest was a cottage occupied by a man named Barrow, a servant of the Bestwood Coal and Iron Company Limited, who lived there with his family—five in number altogether.

The nearest residences after Barrow's cottage were six cottages with twenty-three inmates, 157 yards distant.

The village of Bestwood was situate half a mile or thereabouts from the hospital; there was there a parish school, and the headmaster, William English Robinson, resided in a school house attached to the school.

Thomas Asken Loeth, a miller and farmer in the neighbourhood, was owner of a house and three cottages adjoining his mill, all of which premises were within 200 yards or thereabouts of the hospital.

The Bestwood Coal and Iron Company Limited were the owners and occupiers of a colliery, mines, and ironworks in the parish. They employed altogether a large number of workpeople, 230 being employed in the Bestwood Ironworks, part of which was within a quarter of a mile radius of the colliery; and 1280 in the colliery, which was without the quarter, but within the half-mile radius, but the majority of these worked underground.

[CHAN. DIV.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MAYOR, &C., OF NOTTINGHAM.

[CHAN. DIV.]

There was a resident population of 204 persons within the quarter-mile radius of the hospital, and of 510 persons within the half-mile radius.

The plans of the site and buildings had not been approved by the Local Government Board since the corporation did not require to raise any loan for the building.

It was, however, alleged that in the selection of the site and in the erection and laying out of the building and grounds the corporation had complied with the conditions upon which the Local Government Board insists in cases in which it sanctions a smallpox hospital.

The hospital, which was prepared to accommodate forty patients, appeared to be well managed. It seemed that a single patient had actually been seen in the grounds outside the inner fence, but he appeared at the time to be convalescent. There was no evidence that the hospital had tended to spread infection either in the neighbourhood, or among the school children, or among the men employed in the works.

An action was brought by the Attorney-General on the relation of the above-mentioned William English Robinson, Thomas Aken Loeth, and the Bestwood Coal and Iron Company Limited, also by these same individuals and company as plaintiffs against the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of Nottingham for (1) an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants, and agents, from using the buildings known as the Bulwell Smallpox Hospital as a hospital for the reception of persons suffering from smallpox, so as to cause a nuisance to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood or to persons passing along the neighbouring highway; (2) an injunction to restrain the defendants, their agents, and servants, from using the building as a hospital for the reception of persons suffering from smallpox, so as to cause a nuisance to the relator plaintiffs as owners and occupiers in the neighbourhood.

Both sides at the hearing of the action relied to a considerable extent on scientific evidence, and both desired that it should be heard, the plaintiffs calling scientific experts, who insisted that smallpox is disseminated by aerial convection, and the defendants also calling scientists who substantially denied this theory.

Dr. John Clough Thresh, lecturer on public health at the London Hospital, examiner at the University of London, and medical officer of health for the Essex County Council, who gave evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs, gave as his opinion that the presence of hospital ships in the Thames had caused a great increase of smallpox in the district opposite to the place in the river where they were moored.

Dr. Thresh showed that in one year the smallpox cases in the Orsett Union (which included a parish West Thurrock, which parish had two centres of population, West Thurrock and Purfleet, Purfleet being opposite to the hospital ships) were fifty-three, and the outside cases in the same district 185, while the proper proportion would have been for the Orsett Union one-fiftieth of the whole. Of these fifty-three cases of infection, thirty-one arose in the parish of West Thurrock, and the greater the distance from Purfleet the less was found to be the infection.

In cross-examination the doctor stated that he had done his best to ascertain if there was any communication between the ships and the Essex side of the river, and that he had not the slightest doubt but that there was very little. Public opinion in the district was, he stated, very strong on the subject.

Doctor McVail, examiner in medical jurisprudence and public health in the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, president of the Sanitary Association of Scotland, and of the State medicine section of the British Medical Association, who gave evidence on the same side, stated that the theory of the dissemination of smallpox by aerial convection over a considerable space was not a new theory in medical circles, it being found stated in medical books a hundred years old, and there being an instance of such infection across the Charles River, Boston, in North America, where the width of the river was 1500ft.

On the defendants' side Dr. Edward W. Hope, professor of health in the Victoria University, Manchester, and medical officer of the Port of Liverpool, gave evidence from his Liverpool experience to the effect that smallpox hospitals did not spread infection. In Liverpool every effort was made by patient, continuous, and painstaking observation to trace the origin of every case of smallpox, with the object of suppressing every outbreak of the disease. The largest smallpox hospital in Liverpool was the Park Hill Hospital, and he could not name a single case of smallpox in the neighbourhood which could be traced to the hospital. In his opinion the scientific theory of aerial convection was pressed much too far by some medical scientists. He disbelieved that particles of disease could be conveyed in this manner for a quarter or half a mile.

Similar evidence was given by other eminent scientists.

Witnesses were also examined on both sides as to the site and management of the hospital, the effect of which is summarised in the statement of facts in this report and in the judgment.

Among other witnesses called in this connection by the plaintiffs was Dr. Joseph W. R. Fletcher, who had examined the hospital premises on behalf of the Local Government Board. This gentleman produced a letter from the President of the Local Government Board, in which the President objected to the production of this report, and desired the doctor to represent to the court that the production would be injurious to His Majesty's service. He was further directed by the Local Government Board, subject to the directions of the court, to confine his evidence to matters of fact. In reply to his Lordship this witness stated that the inspectors of the Local Government Board were accustomed to visit all parts of the country, and to consult with the members of all sanitary authorities; that these gentlemen generally gave them full information, but in confidence, and that, if it became known that inspectors were liable to be examined in court in respect of information so obtained, confidence would not in future be reposed in them.

The witness was not examined; but his Lordship stated that in his opinion, as he had to protect the public health, he ought to have been assisted by the representatives of the Local Government Board, and that he respectfully protested against the refusal to allow him to see the document containing the report.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Upjohn, K.C. and Llewellyn Davies for the plaintiffs.—The number of inhabitants in the district is sufficient to make this smallpox hospital a nuisance against which the court should grant an injunction. There is, further, no guarantee but that the hospital premises may be enlarged. The best scientific authorities agree that this disease may be disseminated by the air. The nuisance is here both public and private. When the Local Government Board allows smallpox hospitals, it insists on their being placed far from populous places and at a distance from traffic:

Hill v. Metropolitan Asylums Board, 40 L. T. Rep. 491; 42 L. T. Rep. 212; 47 L. T. Rep. 29; 6 App. Cas. 193.

It is certainly necessary for us in a quia timet action to show that there is a high probability that the nuisance will be of an irreparable character, but here it appears that it will be a great danger. With regard to the hospital as a public nuisance, they referred to

Ree v. Vantandillo, 1815, 4 M. & S. 73;

Ree v. Burnett, 1815, 4 M. & S. 272;

Asquith, K.C., Macmorran, K.C., and R. J. Parker for the defendants.—The onus that lies on the plaintiffs to show that the hospital will be a cause of infection to residents in the district and persons passing along the road has not been discharged. Further, this is a matter in which the general public interest must be considered. Supposing that there were no smallpox hospital here and that persons suffering from the disease were treated in their own homes, the risk of infection would be greater. The arguments of the plaintiffs would render impossible the building of a smallpox hospital in any populous district; but the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) expressly empowers local authorities to provide hospitals: (sect. 131). In this case the site has been carefully selected, and the defendants have met the requirements of the Local Government Board. The plaintiffs' scientific evidence is fallacious. It rests entirely upon a mass of affirmative evidence, which a single negative instance is sufficient to destroy. They have, in fact, fallen into the fallacy which Lord Bacon describes as "inductio per enumerationem simplicem, ubi non reperitur instantia contradictoria." If it can be shown in a single instance that a smallpox hospital has not in fact spread contagion, the plaintiffs' case is gone; and more than sufficient evidence has been adduced by the defendants for this purpose. As to the authorities, Hill v. Metropolitan Asylums District was not a quia timet action. It was a case of a nuisance. The cases which the present resembles are Attorney-General v. Rathmines, &c. (an Irish case as yet not reported).

Upjohn, K.C. in reply.—The plaintiffs have shown that there exists a considerable and well-founded apprehension of danger, and this will justify the granting of an injunction. In the case of Attorney-General v. Corporation of Manchester the hospital was not intended to be permanent.

Cur. adv. vult.

FARWELL, J.—This is an action by the Attorney-General on the relation of several owners and occupiers of land and collieries in the parish of Bestwood, and by the same owners and occupiers as plaintiffs against the mayor and corporation of Nottingham to restrain them from using a building lately erected and for the last six months used as a smallpox hospital from so using it, on the ground that it is a nuisance, necessarily causing serious danger to the public health and causing special damage to the relator plaintiffs. No actual case of injury has arisen; and the action is quia timet. In order to succeed in such an action the plaintiffs must show a strong case of probability that the apprehended mischief will in fact arise (see Attorney-General v. Corporation of Manchester (68 L. T. Rep. 608; (1893) 2 Ch. 87), or, to quote FitzGibbon, L.J. in Attorney-General v. Rathmines, &c. (which is not yet reported), "to sustain the injunction the law requires proof by the plaintiffs of a well-founded apprehension of injury—proof of actual and real danger—the strong probability almost amounting to moral certainty that if the hospital be established it will be an actionable nuisance. A sentiment of danger and dislike, however natural and justified, certainty that the hospital will be disagreeable or inconvenient, proof that it will abridge a man's pleasure or make him anxious, the inability of the court to say that no danger will arise, none of these accompanied by depreciation of property will discharge the burden of proof which rests on the plaintiffs or justify a merely precautionary injunction restraining an owner's use of his own land upon the ground of apprehended nuisance to his neighbours." Further, the defendants are entitled in my opinion to ask the court to assume that the hospital will be properly managed and that all the precautions that scientific skill and knowledge usually require will be taken, and they are entitled in the present case to the benefit of the observation that the hospital has been open and has received patients for the last six months, during the last half of which it has been full, and that no mischief has at present arisen therefrom. The hospital stands on a piece of ground four and a half acres in extent, roughly triangular in shape, the base of the triangle being about 350 yards long and abutting on the highroad. It is inclosed on all sides except one with a close wooden fence 6ft. 6in. high, with barbed wire on the top, and there is an inside fence of barbed wire 20ft. distant. The hospital building is 51ft. from the highroad. On the side where there is no fence there is a stream nearly 20ft. wide with a steep bank 15ft. or 20ft. high sloping abruptly from the hospital grounds down to the river. There are 204 residents within a quarter-mile radius from the building and 510 within the half-mile radius. There are 230 men employed on the Bestwood Ironworks, part of which is within the quarter-mile radius, and 1280 on the colliery, which is without the quarter-mile radius but within the half-mile radius; but the majority of the latter work underground, and some forty-five men work at the bleach works outside the quarter-mile radius and within the half-mile radius. The hospital is some miles from the populous parts of Nottingham and has access to the city by means of a road which has few houses on either side and is not much used for general traffic. The nearest residence is Barrow's cottage, with five inmates, forty-eight yards distant, and the next nearest are six cottages, with twenty-three inmates, 157 yards distant. The plaintiffs' allegation that the hospital is a nuisance rests on the establishment as a general affirmative of the proposition that all smallpox hospitals necessarily constitute a serious danger to the health of persons resident, working, or passing by within a radius of at any rate 51ft. This is obviously a very serious question. Having regard to the impossibility of stamping out smallpox under the existing laws and to the practical impossibility of isolating an outbreak in crowded areas, the court ought not to come to any conclusion that would result in closing the majority of the smallpox hospitals in the kingdom unless the expert testimony is really conclusive. Now, it is clear from the evidence that I have heard in this case that the medical profession are divided into two camps on this question, each containing persons of eminence and experience. The first point of difference is on the theory of aerial convection for any considerable distance—say for more than 50ft. This is a purely scientific question, and I gratefully adopt Lord Bowen's statement in Fleet v. Metropolitan Asylums Board (1886, 2 Times L. Rep. 363) that "it would be most dangerous to form an independent opinion on a scientific question from the smatterings of science that might be picked up during the hearing of a case." The plaintiffs do not contend that there is a consensus of expert opinion upon the point, and it is enough for me to say that it is therefore not proven, and that I am not competent to form an opinion of my own on the question. If the plaintiffs could have established aerial convection for the requisite distance, they would have had a strong case in that they would have shown the reason why danger did exist; but, failing this, they are driven to the empirical opinions of the experts. This is, of course, a legitimate and usual mode of proof; and the court, in the case of a conflict of experts, may either say that the onus is on the plaintiff and has not been discharged, or it may examine the facts and the reasoning given by the experts as the ground of their opinion; and if and so far as that reasoning can be tested by ordinary rules independent of special scientific knowledge, I feel bound to test it and not to state simply that the conflict is such that the plaintiffs have not discharged the burden cast on them. I will take Dr. Thresh, who is the protagonist on the plaintiffs' side, as an example of the reasoning of the plaintiffs' witnesses. His opinion is based on his experience and knowledge of a large number of cases of smallpox and of several hospitals, and is a conclusion of logic, not of medical science. His train of reasoning seeks to extend an induction founded on cases observed by or known to him to all other cases; but the induction fails, for the conclusion that all hospitals are sources of danger does not necessarily follow from the premise that some hospitals are such; or, in other words, his cases are not sufficiently exhaustive, and his reasoning is a mere instance of the method of the ancients described by Bacon as "inductio per enumerationem simplicem, ubi non reperitur instantia contradictoria." It is a mere ascription of the character of a general truth to all hospitals because in all hospitals known to the witness the fact is found to exist. There is the further difficulty that the cases are complicated by so many varying circumstances that the application of the methods of agreement and difference is impracticable. If the case had rested on the plaintiffs' evidence alone, I should have had great difficulty in adopting that conclusion as sufficiently proved; but the court is in possession of a number of other cases in which smallpox hospitals have been full during outbreaks of the disease, and no case has occurred within the quarter-mile radius which could not be accounted for by some means other than the hospital. Mr. Upjohn attempted to minimise the force of this evidence by criticising some of the witnesses and suggesting that Dr. Reid's instances only were trustworthy and asking me to treat the plaintiffs' affirmative cases as outweighing these. But this is a fallacy. The plaintiffs' case depends on the inference to be drawn from an unbroken series of facts. In all cases where A has occurred B has followed, therefore A causes B. But the conclusion depends on the universality of the premises, and a negative instance unexplained spoils the chain. The defendants' case does not, however, rest on Dr. Reid alone. It would serve no useful purpose for me to go through the evidence in detail, but with regard to the plaintiffs' historical instances, if I may so call them, they have already figured in former actions, and very recently in the Irish Court of Appeal in the Rathmines case, and have never been accepted as sufficient. It is important to remember that the Compulsory Notification of Diseases Act came into force only in 1899, and that before that it must obviously have been far more difficult, if not impracticable, to obtain trustworthy and sufficient data from which to generalise; and, indeed, I may well adopt FitzGibbon, L.J.'s comment in the Rathmines case on them. "Cases such as Fulham, Sheffield, Bradford, and Nottingham may be explained by reason of the character of a neighbourhood and their other circumstances." The defendants' evidence is very strong. It is not for them to prove the negative, but their instances—especially Dr. Reid with his large experience in Staffordshire, Dr. Hope with his three hospitals in Liverpool, and Dr. Boobyer in Nottingham—are amply sufficient to break the chain of the plaintiffs' affirmative cases, even if I were satisfied that they had proved them. There is, of course, some risk of infection wherever there is smallpox owing partly to the folly of bystanders and of friends and relations of the patients and partly to the human fallibility of doctors and attendants, however careful. But, in considering the question from the point of view of a public nuisance, one must bear in mind that it is necessary for the public safety that some provision should be made for isolation, that the difficulties in the way of isolating in the case of the poor living in one or two rooms or crowded together in a single cottage are very great, and that it is (as Dr. McVail put it) a choice of evils. This consideration is mentioned by Chitty, J. in Attorney-General v. Corporation of Manchester (loc. cit., at p. 92). "The apprehended future danger in the present case is danger to the public health. Now, undoubtedly, there are many cases of public nuisance—by interference with an unquestionable right of the public, such, for instance, as the permanent obstruction of a highway—where the court did decline at once to permit evidence to be given of any supposed public benefit arising from the wrongful act complained of, and would refuse to balance the good alleged to accrue to some portions of the public against the mischief to the public in general. But in the case where the health of the Queen's subjects in general is concerned, it may possibly be a question whether, if the evidence shows that the maintenance of a smallpox hospital is, on the whole, balancing the good against the evil, more beneficial to the health of the public at large, or to that portion of the public that inhabits or frequents the neighbourhood, than the leaving of the persons suffering from the disease scattered in their own homes, some weight might not be properly allowed to this circumstance. If Lord Hardwicke is rightly reported in the case of Coldbathfields Smallpox Hospital; Baines v. Baker (Amb. 158), he appears to have entertained some such question when he stated his opinion that the hospital was a 'charity like to prove of great advantage to mankind.' And the same consideration applies, though perhaps not to the same extent, to the private nuisance alleged by the plaintiffs. If the fact of a public nuisance were established, it would, of course, be no answer to the private owners to say that the hospital must be placed somewhere (see per Lord Blackburn in Hill v. Metropolitan Asylums District, 47 L. T. Rep. 29; 6 App. Cas. 207), but where the question is whether the nuisance in fact exists or not, all the circumstances must be taken into consideration; and, after all, the owners and occupiers of the adjacent lands have a far more effective prophylactic provided for them by medical science than any injunction of any court. I respectfully agree with the following passage in FitzGibbon, L.J.'s judgment in the Rathmines case: "It seems probable that the dread of smallpox is to a great extent the result of tradition. That scourge of the eighteenth century retains its terrors for those who do not realise that it has been deprived of most of its dangers. Vaccination is not only a preventive, but it also modifies the disease. The evidence of Dr. Thresh is that vaccination and re-vaccination at proper intervals confer practical immunity. In applying the maxim Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, the duty of reasonable precaution for one's own protection is not to be ignored. An isolation hospital reduces the risk for every inhabitant of the district. It is, in fact, a necessity, and, though the individual must be protected, the public advantage should not be forbidden unless the danger and injury to the individual are clearly proved." In the present case I find as the result of the evidence that the site of the defendant's hospital was carefully chosen, is in a proper situation, and constitutes no appreciable danger to the public health and no nuisance to the relator plaintiffs' property. As I understand that this case is likely to go to the House of Lords, I desire to add an observation as to the evidence in the hope of obtaining some direction from a superior tribunal. Both parties concurred in asking me to accept evidence in chief of what had happened with other hospitals, and I acceded to the request in deference to the opinion expressed in Hill v. Metropolitan, &c. (42 L. T. Rep. 212; 47 L. T. Rep. 29), and also because the same evidence of the same cases (with the same result) appears to have been admitted in the other reported cases relating to smallpox hospitals. The result is that the case has taken a week to try; and I venture to suggest that the admission of such evidence in chief is wrong in principle, as raising a number of side issues on which it is impossible for the court to adjudicate without injury to absent parties—e.g., how can I rely on the case of the hospital ships as a proved fact in the present case without injustice to them? In Hill's case in the Court of Appeal (42 L. T. Rep. 212) Pollock, B. rejected the evidence as to the facts of the Stockwell and Homerton Hospitals, and Bramwell, L.J. said he was wrong in so doing, and Cotton, L.J. agreed with him. (It is not easy to see how the point arose, as the plaintiffs, who succeeded, had tendered the rejected evidence.) If the assumption in Cotton, L.J.'s judgment were correct in fact, the evidence would be valuable; he says: "They might have shown what in fact was the effect in the neighbourhood of the only other hospitals under the same conditions." But now there are numbers of such hospitals and their conditions are infinitely various, and the extent and value of such differences are exceedingly difficult to estimate. In the House of Lords Lord Selborne appears to agree with Cotton, L.J. His Lordship says: "I am not prepared to say that the learned judge was wrong in rejecting the evidence, especially because of the non-fulfilment of the conditions on which he offered to receive it. Without proof as to the state and management of the other hospitals, so as to establish a substantive similarity, any inferences drawn from a comparison of their operation with that of the Hampstead asylum might have been quite fallacious and deceptive. But, even without regard to this, I am not quite satisfied that the evidence was admissible, whether such conditions were or were not fulfilled. It was not pertinent as to the issue tried as to Hampstead only. No notice had been given in the pleadings or otherwise that it would be offered. It would have involved the jury in a multitude of collateral inquiries calculated to confuse and embarrass them; and it might have been endlessly prolonged by an indefinite multiplication of objects of comparison. To keep such investigations within reasonable limits, and secure promptitude, precision, and satisfaction in the administration of justice, it seems to me that the courts should be very jealous of the admission of such proof." Lord Blackburn thought it unnecessary to decide the point. Lord Watson's opinion is stated at p. 35 of 47 L. T. Rep. His Lordship says: "There appears to me to be an appreciable distinction between evidence having an appreciable relation to the principal question in dispute and evidence relating to collateral facts, which will if established tend to elucidate that question. It is the right of the party tendering it to have evidence of the former kind admitted, irrespective of its amount or weight, these remaining for consideration when the case is closed; but I am not prepared to hold that he has the same absolute right when he tenders evidence of facts collateral to the main issue. In order to entitle him to give such evidence, he must in the first instance satisfy the court that the collateral fact, which he proposes to prove, will, when established, be capable of affording a reasonable presumption or inference as to the matter in dispute; and I am prepared to hold that he is also bound to satisfy the court that the evidence which he is prepared to adduce will be reasonably conclusive, and will not raise a difficult and doubtful controversy of precisely the same kind which the jury have to determine. It appears to me that it might lead to unfortunate results if the court had not the power to reject evidence of the collateral fact which does not satisfy both of the conditions. I have to indicate Lord Watson's opinion would certainly rule out all the history that I have heard in the present case. As Lord Bowen has pointed out in the Fleet case, it is no part of the functions of the court to qualify itself as an expert in science. The court acts on the authority of experts, whose qualifications can be tested by cross-examination, and weighs the evidence so given and tested." The result is that the action fails, and must be dismissed, as is the rule in such cases, with costs as between solicitor and client.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MAYOR, &C., OF NOTTINGHAM.

[CHAN. DIV.]

ACME WOOD FLOORING COMPANY LIMITED v. MARTEN. (a)

IN THE COMMERCIAL COURT.

Fire insurance—Lloyd's policy—"Subject to average"—No average clause attached—Other policies on zones—Applying policies rateably—9 Geo. 4, c. 13, s. 3.

A timber yard, as a whole, was insured by a Lloyd's policy for 11,450*l.* and in three zones by various fire insurance companies for 25,500*l.* On zone B there was only one company's policy for 3000*l.* The value in the three zones was 36,500*l.*—viz., 1940*l.* in zone A, 13,260*l.* in B, and 21,300*l.* in C; and 12,850*l.*—viz., 1900*l.* in zone A, 9400*l.* in B, and 1550*l.* in C—was the value of the timber burnt.

The Lloyd's policy was expressed to be "subject to average," but had no average clause attached.

Held, that the system of marshalling the policies, so as to apply the Lloyd's policy and the company's policy for 3000*l.* rateably to the loss in zone B, and the then unexhausted portion of the Lloyd's rateably with the other policies on zones C and A respectively, could not be introduced by the words "subject to average" in a Lloyd's policy. On this policy the plaintiffs, being insured on only a portion of the goods at risk, must be considered as being their own insurers for the difference, and must bear a rateable share of the loss accordingly.

The underwriters were liable for $\frac{11450}{36500}$ of 12,850*l.* Whether the average clause is attached to a Lloyd's policy or not, if the policy is expressed to be "subject to average," it is according to the usage of Lloyd's the same as if the clause were attached.

ACTION tried before Bruce, J. without a jury.

This was an action brought against an underwriter at Lloyd's on a Lloyd's fire policy, dated the 16th Dec. 1901, by which the plaintiff company was insured from loss or damage by fire on timber and (or) wood goods whilst on any portion of Jarrah Wharf Tidal Basin, Victoria Dock, London, in the sum of 11,450*l.* for twelve months, and subscribed by the defendant for 2000*l.* The policy was "subject to average," but no average clause was attached to the policy.

The plaintiff company's timber yard was also insured by various fire insurance companies, but in these cases the timber yard was divided into zones, which were insured separately.

In the centre of the yard was a steam sawmill, and zone A covered that space up to five yards from the mill; zone B from five to thirty yards; and zone C over thirty yards from the mill.

The North British and Mercantile Insurance Company had a line on zone A of 2000*l.*; on zone B, 3000*l.*; on zone C, 5000*l.*; the Scottish Alliance Insurance Company, on zone C, 3000*l.*; the Union Insurance Society, on zone C, 5500*l.*; the Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Company, on zone C, 12,000*l.*

The value of the timber in all three zones was 36,500*l.*, of which 1940*l.* was in zone A; 13,260*l.* in zone B; and 21,300*l.* in zone C.

The timber, in the daily course of business, was moved from zone to zone.

During the currency of the policy a fire broke out in the timber yard, and in zone A the value of timber burnt was 1900*l.*; in zone B, 9400*l.*; and in zone C, 1550*l.* Thus the total value burnt was 12,850*l.*

The plaintiff company had paid premiums on 41,950*l.*, including the Lloyd's policy.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Loshnis for the plaintiff company.—The plaintiffs, being fully insured and having paid the premiums, are entitled to an indemnity. The Lloyd's policy can be applied in the first instance rateably with the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, for 3000*l.* to make good and pay in full the 9400*l.* lost on zone B. The unexhausted portion can then contribute rateably with the other policies to loss on zone C, and any then unexhausted portion rateably with the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company for 2000*l.* to loss on zone A. Alternatively zone A should be dealt with before zone C. The plaintiff is fully covered, and can marshal the policies. This is a question of construction. If the words "subject to average" referred to some extended clause, it referred to clauses 1 and 2, pp. 218, 219, Bunyon on Fire Insurance (1893 edit.): "1. Whenever a sum insured is declared to be subject to average, if the property covered thereby shall at the breaking out of any fire be collectively of greater value than such sum insured, then the assured shall be considered as being his own insurer for the difference, and shall bear a rateable share of the loss accordingly. 2. But if any of the property included in such average shall, at the breaking out of any fire, be also covered by any other more specific insurance—i.e., by an insurance which at the time of such fire applies to part only of the property actually at risk and protected by this insurance, and to no other property whatsoever—then this policy shall not insure the same except only as regards any excess of value beyond the amount of such more specific insurance or insurances, which said excess is declared to be under the protection of this policy, and subject to average as aforesaid." Clause 2 restricts clause 1. A specific policy must be exhausted first, and then the general policy can be used. There is no uniform well-known meaning of the expression "subject to average" within the meaning of the principle laid down in Leake on Contract, 4th edit., pp. 128, 129, and the cases there cited.

Scrutton, K.C. and Wood Hill for the defendant.—As the policy was "subject to average" the underwriters were liable to pay only such a sum, a proportion of the loss as the sum insured by the policy bears to the value of all the property covered by it. The sum recoverable was therefore $\frac{12,850\text{L.}}{36,500\text{L.}}$ —viz., 4031*l.*—of which the defendant had paid into court his share on the 200*l.* underwritten by him. The plaintiffs were not fully insured. The words "subject to average" brought in the pro rata clause 1, Bunyon on Fire Insurance (sup.), 9 Geo. 4, c. 13, s. 3, was substantially the same as clause 1 (sup.), and known as the average clause. The clauses attached to the companies' policies were the same as clause 1 (sup.) and Lloyd's policies generally have the average clause attached, and even though no slip was attached to the policy under discussion the words "subject to average" have the same meaning. The words have a well-known trade meaning. Clause 2 (sup.) is inapplicable to the present case.

BRUCE, J. read the following judgment:—This is an action brought by the plaintiff company against underwriters at Lloyd's on a Lloyd's fire policy, dated the 16th Dec. 1901, by which the plaintiff company was insured from loss or damage by fire on timber and (or) wood goods whilst on any portion of Jarrah Wharf Tidal Basin, Victoria Dock, London, in the sum of 11,450*l.* for twelve months from the 10th Oct. 1901 to the 10th Oct. 1902. The policy was expressed to be "subject to average." No average clause was annexed to the policy. On the 18th Sept. 1902 a loss by fire of timber covered by the said policy occurred. The value of the timber so lost was 12,850*l.* There was a steam sawmill on the plaintiffs' premises. The plaintiff company, in addition to the policy sued on, had effected policies on timber at the wharf with insurance companies which were in force at the date of the said fire. The insurance companies required their policies to be limited by zones. Zone A comprised timber stacked within five yards of the sawmill. Zone B comprised timber stacked between five yards and thirty yards of the sawmill. Zone C comprised timber stacked over thirty yards of the sawmill. The total value of the timber in all three zones was 36,500*l.*, of which 1940*l.* was in zone A, 13,260*l.* in zone B, 21,300*l.* in zone C. The plaintiff company had insured with the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company 2000*l.* on zone A, 3000*l.* on zone B, 5000*l.* on zone C; with the Scottish Alliance Insurance Company 3000*l.* on zone C; with the Union Insurance Society, 5500*l.* on zone C; with the Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Company 12,000*l.* on zone C. The plaintiffs contend that all their timber was fully covered by their policies, and that they are entitled to a complete indemnity. The question turns upon the meaning of the words in Lloyd's policy "subject to average." According to the evidence given before me these words "subject to average" or the words "subject to the conditions of average" have a clearly defined meaning in a Lloyd's policy. It is expressed in a slip which is frequently attached to a Lloyd's policy, which runs in the following form: "Average clause—Whenever a sum insured is declared to be subject to average, if the property covered thereby shall at the breaking out of any fire be collectively of greater value than such sum insured, then the assured shall be considered as being his own insurer for the difference, and shall bear a rateable share of the loss accordingly." This clause is no new clause, for a clause almost precisely similar is referred to in 9 Geo. 4, c. 13, s. 3. In this clause I think the words "property covered thereby" mean the property covered by the policy which contains the declaration, and that the average clause has no relation to any other policy. Whether the average clause is attached to the policy or not, if the policy is expressed to be "subject to average," it is, according to the usage of Lloyd's, the same as if the clause were attached, and I think that where a person insures with Lloyd's, and obtains from Lloyd's a policy in the form ordinarily granted by Lloyd's, he must be taken to accept the terms expressed in the policy and to agree to the meaning which the words ordinarily bear. The decided cases with regard to the authority of brokers at Lloyd's are, I think, not inconsistent with this view. It may well be that a person dealing with Lloyd's and having no express notice of the customs of Lloyd's regulating the authority of brokers is not bound by such customs. But I think it is different with regard to the terms expressed on the face of the contract which is handed to and accepted by the assured. But it is not necessary for the purpose of this judgment that I should decide this point, because upon the evidence it seems to be clear that the plaintiffs had notice of the usage at Lloyd's, and knew what was meant by the words "subject to average," and must be taken to have entered into the contract with a full knowledge that the average clause attached, and with full knowledge of the meaning of that clause. On the 26th May 1899 the plaintiff company effected a policy with Lloyd's expressed to be "subject to the conditions of average," and to that policy the average clause was attached, and on the 6th Dec. 1900 the plaintiff company effected another policy at Lloyd's "subject to the conditions of average," and to which the average clause was attached. It is not, therefore, I think, open to the plaintiff company to contend that they had no notice of the meaning of the phrase "subject to average" in a Lloyd's fire policy. Some of the insurance companies have in certain classes of insurance adopted the rule that if any of the property declared to be subject to average and included in such average shall at the breaking out of a fire be covered by any other more specific insurance—i.e., by an insurance which at the time of such fire applies to part only of the property actually at risk and protected by this insurance, and to no other property whatsoever—then this policy shall not insure the same except only as regards any excess of value beyond the amount of such more specific insurance or insurances, which said excess is declared to be under the protection of this policy and subject to average as aforesaid. The plaintiff contends that by virtue of this last-mentioned rule he is entitled so to marshal the various policies as to enable him to recover on one policy or the other his whole loss. He contends that the Lloyd's policy and the North British policy for 3000*l.* should be applied rateably to the loss on zone B, which would leave 4000*l.* of the Lloyd's policy unexhausted. This 4000*l.* he would apply to zone C rateably with the company's policies for 25,450*l.* That would leave 3790*l.* unexhausted, and that 3790*l.* he would apply to zone A rateably with the North British policy for 2000*l.* But I am satisfied that no such system of marshalling can be introduced by the words "subject to average" in a Lloyd's policy. I think that the loss under the present policy must be calculated upon the principle laid down by the usual average clause which is applied to a Lloyd's policy, and that a loss on that policy must be calculated without regard to the other policies. The plaintiff company on this policy, being insured on only a portion of the goods at risk, must be considered as being their own insurers for the difference, and must bear a rateable share of the loss accordingly. The plaintiff company was insured by the policy sued on to the extent of 11,450*l.*; the property at risk was 36,500*l.*, and the loss was 12,850*l.*; so that 4031*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* is the amount for which the underwriters are liable. The defendant has brought into court the sum of 70*l.* 8*s.* 3*d.*, being his proportion of the loss in satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claim according to the above calculation. I must therefore give judgment for the defendant, with costs.

County Court—Costs—Remitted Action—Payment into Court under Order XIV. of part of claim as condition of leave to defend—Trial in County Court—Judgment for defendant for balance with costs—Scale of costs applicable—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 65, 107, 113—County Court Rules, Order IX., r. 12; Order LIII., r. 18.

In an action of contract brought in the High Court for 71*l.* an order was made under Order XIV. that, on the defendants paying into court 23*l.* they should have liberty to defend the action, otherwise judgment for that amount and costs, with liberty to the defendants to defend as to the residue. The defendants paid the 23*l.* into court, and the action was remitted to a County Court under sect. 65 of the County Courts Act 1888. After the action was so remitted, and more than five clear days before the day fixed for the hearing, the defendants gave the plaintiffs notice that they were willing to consent to judgment for the 23*l.* in court with costs. At the trial the County Court judge gave judgment for the defendants for the residue of the claim, with costs after payment into court, the plaintiffs to have the money in court and costs up to payment in, which were paid by the defendants. Upon taxation of the defendants' costs:

eld, (1) that the defendants were entitled to costs, and (2) that they were entitled to have their costs taxed under scale C—that is, the scale applicable where the sum recovered exceeds 50*l.*

Dicta in Wright v. Bull (82 L. T. Rep. 568; (1900) 2 Q. B. 124) dissented from.

APPEAL from Wolverhampton County Court.

On the 15th Jan. 1903 the Aston Tube Works Limited (the plaintiffs) brought an action in the Birmingham District Registry of the High Court against the defendants (J. S. Dumbell and J. B. Dumbell), claiming a sum of 71*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* for the price of goods sold and delivered.

On a summons for judgment taken out under Order XIV., the district registrar, on the 31st Jan. 1903, made an order that "on payment into court by the defendants of the sum of 23*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* within seven days from the date hereof the defendants be at liberty to defend the action; otherwise final judgment for the plaintiffs against the defendants for that amount and costs to be taxed, with liberty to defend as to the residue of the plaintiffs' claim," and that the action should be tried in the Wolverhampton County Court.

Within the seven days specified in the order the defendants paid the 23*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* into court, and thereby under the order obtained leave to defend the action. The plaintiffs then, on the 27th Feb. 1903, remitted the action for trial to the Wolverhampton County Court for the whole amount claimed, and the hearing was fixed for the 27th March.

On the 5th March, the action being then in the County Court, the defendants sent a notice to the plaintiffs that they were willing to consent to judgment for the 23*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*, which they had paid into court under the above order, and costs to be taxed.

On the 30th April the case was tried by the County Court judge, when he gave a verdict for the defendants with costs, the plaintiffs to have the sum in court, and he directed judgment to be entered for "the defendants; plaintiffs to have the money in court and costs upon that sum down to date of payment into court; defendants to have costs after payment into court."

The defendants paid the plaintiffs the amount of their costs down to the date of the payment into court on the High Court scale, and those costs were settled.

The defendants delivered their bill of costs in the action from the time of payment into court on scale C—that is, the scale which is applicable to cases in which the sum in dispute exceeds 50*l.*—and the registrar of the County Court taxed the defendants' costs under scale C.

The plaintiffs appealed to the judge, and it was contended on their behalf: (1) that the defendants were not entitled to any costs, inasmuch as the proceedings were in one action in which the plaintiffs had succeeded in obtaining the 23*l.* paid into court, the event in that one action being in their favour, and that the court had made no special order as to costs, and had no power to make such an order; (2) that if there had been any special direction as to costs, then the defendants were only entitled to have them taxed on scale B, because, as the plaintiffs had succeeded as to the sum in court, the effect was to reduce the amount at issue under 50*l.*

The County Court judge, upon reviewing the taxation of the registrar on the 12th June, was of opinion that for the purposes of the application the plaintiffs could not now go behind the terms of his judgment and direction as to costs, and that, inasmuch as he gave special direction that the defendants for whom judgment was given were to have their costs as from the date of the payment of the money into court, the decision in Wright v. Bull (82 L. T. Rep. 568; (1900) 2 Q. B. 124) was distinguishable, although the dicta in that case would have been ground for refusal of any special direction if his attention had been called to that authority at the time when judgment was given.

The judge held therefore that the defendants were entitled to costs; but inasmuch as the plaintiffs had recovered in the action 23*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*, with costs upon that sum down to the date of the payment of the money into court, he held that for purposes of the scale of taxation of the defendants' costs under his direction that sum of 23*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*, in respect of which costs had already been awarded to the plaintiffs, must be excluded from the original amount, and he ordered the defendants costs to be taxed on scale B.

The defendants gave notice of appeal against the order of the judge directing that the costs in the action awarded to the defendants should be taxed under scale B instead of under scale C, and asked that such order might be reversed, on the ground that the order was wrong in law, and that it might be adjudged that the defendants were entitled to have their costs taxed under scale C.

The plaintiffs then gave notice of a cross-appeal that on the hearing of the defendants' appeal the plaintiffs would submit that the order of the County Court judge, made on the 12th June, was wrong in law, and that the defendants were not entitled to any costs in the action, and that the registrar of the County Court had no power to tax such costs, inasmuch as the plaintiffs had recovered 23*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* in the action, and were consequently the successful parties in the action, and that the plaintiffs would ask that it might be adjudged that the defendants were not entitled to any costs, and that the registrar of the County Court had no power to tax upon scale B or C, or at all.

The County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43) provides:

Sect. 65. Where in any action of contract brought in the High Court the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed one hundred pounds . . . it shall be lawful for either party to the action at any time, if the whole or part of the demand of the plaintiff be contested, to apply to a judge of the High Court at chambers, to order such action to be tried in any court in which the action might have been commenced, or in any court convenient thereto; and on the hearing of the application the judge shall, unless there is good cause to the contrary, order such action to be tried accordingly; and thereupon the plaintiff shall lodge the original writ and the order with the registrar of the court mentioned in the order, who shall appoint a day for the trial of the action, notice whereof shall be sent by post or otherwise by the registrar to both parties or their solicitors; and the action and all proceedings therein shall be tried and taken in such court as if the action had been originally commenced therein; and the costs of the parties in respect of proceedings subsequent to the order of the judge of the High Court shall be allowed according to the scale of costs for the time being in use in the County Courts, and the costs of the order and all proceedings previously thereto shall be allowed according to the scale of costs for the time being in use in the Supreme Court.

Sect. 107. It shall be lawful for the defendant in any action or matter within such time as shall be prescribed, to pay into court such sum of money as he shall think a full satisfaction for the demand of the plaintiff, together with the costs incurred by the plaintiff up to the time of such payment; and notice of such payment shall be communicated by the registrar to the plaintiff by post, or by causing the same to be delivered at his usual place of abode or business; and the said sum of money shall be paid to the plaintiff; but if the plaintiff shall elect to proceed, and shall recover no further sum in the action or matter than shall have been so paid into court, he shall pay to the defendant the costs incurred by him in the said action or matter after such payment; and such costs shall be settled by the court, and an order shall thereupon be made by the court for the payment of such costs by the plaintiff.

Sect. 113. All the costs of any action or matter in the court, not herein otherwise provided for, shall be paid by or apportioned between the parties in such manner as the court shall think just, and in default of any special direction shall abide the event of the action or matter, and execution may issue for the recovery of any such costs in like manner as for any debt adjudged in the said court.

Disturnal for the defendants.—The learned judge was right in holding that the defendants were entitled to costs, but was wrong in holding that those costs were to be taxed on the B scale and not on the C scale. The registrar was right in taxing the defendants' costs under the C scale. When an action is remitted to the County Court under sect. 65 of the County Courts Act 1888, the action and all proceedings therein are to be tried in the County Court as if the action had originally been commenced in the County Court. The action when remitted becomes a County Court action. Then sect. 107 of the Act gives power to a defendant to pay money into court, and the rules regulating the payment into court are rules 12 and 13 of Order IX. of the County Court Rules 1903. Where under that section and those rules a defendant pays money into court that payment into court does not convert the action into a new action for the difference between the whole sum claimed in the action and the sum paid into court. That payment into court merely has the effect of raising a new issue as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover such difference; but the action remains an action for the whole sum. In the present case the whole action when remitted became a County Court action, and it remained an action for 71*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, notwithstanding that 23*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* had been paid into court. The costs to be recovered are dealt with in the latter part of sect. 65, and the costs in respect of proceedings subsequent to the order remitting the action are to be allowed according to the scale for the time being in force in the County Court, while the costs before the order remitting the action are to be on the High Court scale. By Order LIII., r. 1, of the County Court Rules 1903 the costs are to be taxed by the registrar of the County Court according to the scales of costs in part 4 of the appendix, and scale C is the scale applicable where the sum recovered exceeds 50*l.*; and by rule 18 of the same order where the defendants' costs are being taxed the word "recovered" in the scale is to be read "claimed." Therefore when the defendant succeeds in an action in which the plaintiff has claimed more than 50*l.* the defendants' costs are to be taxed on the C scale applicable where more than 50*l.* is claimed. In the present case the whole action was remitted, and the defendants have in that action succeeded, and they are entitled to have their costs taxed as upon a claim for 71*l.* in which the plaintiffs have failed—that is, upon scale C, notwithstanding the payment into court. He referred to Bradshaw v. Thackray (106 L. T. 334).

ASTON TUBE WORKS LIMITED v. DUMBELL AND ANOTHER.

[K.B. Div.]

McCardie for the plaintiffs (the respondents).—The defendants were not entitled to any costs at all. The first point is that this action from first to last was one action and one action only, and in that one action the plaintiffs have recovered 23*l.* odd. The plaintiffs were therefore the successful parties in the action, and the registrar had no power to tax the defendants' costs upon any scale. What is remitted to the County Court is the whole action, and where that section (sect. 65) is applied the action cannot be considered as cut into two—one part in the High Court and the other in the County Court; and, it being the whole action which is sent down, the plaintiffs have recovered this sum in that action, per Smith, L.J. in

The next point is that where, as in this case, the plaintiff has recovered a certain part of the entire amount claimed, there is no jurisdiction to give any costs at all. The case of Andrew v. Grove (86 L. T. Rep. 720; (1902) 1 K. B. 625) is the converse of this case. There it was held that the County Court judge had no power to order a successful defendant to pay the costs of the plaintiff. So, where a plaintiff has succeeded, as it is submitted the plaintiffs in this case have succeeded, there is no power to order the successful plaintiff to pay the defendants' costs on any scale. The plaintiffs succeeded in the action in recovering the 23*l.*, although that sum was paid into court, and therefore, according to Wright v. Bull (82 L. T. Rep. 568; (1900) 2 Q. B. 124), the defendants are not entitled to any costs at all. The next point is that the defendants could only get costs by virtue of some order or special direction given under sect. 113 of the Act, but no such order or direction was given. The direction as to costs given by that section to the County Court judge is limited to costs "not herein otherwise provided for," and, as Ridley, J. points out in Wright v. Bull (ubi sup.), that narrows the power of the County Court judge to deal with the costs to such matters as are not dealt with by the general scheme of the Act. He further says: "The section seems to me to have been put in with a view to include such costs as were not dealt with by the general enactment as to costs; but in the absence of any special direction it was provided that costs should abide the event," and he held that the "event" there was the recovery of the sum paid under the order. A special direction cannot be given under that section unless there is indicated the scale or schedule under which the costs are given, and the direction which was given by the judge was not a special direction within sect. 113, as no scale was specified under which the costs should be taxed. There is no scale applicable in such a case as this; the only provision applicable is Order LIII., r. 1, and that merely provides that the costs shall be taxed according to the scales in the appendix. Here there was really no payment into court within the meaning of the rules. The sum that was paid into court by the defendants was paid in by them as a condition of their being allowed to defend, and was not a payment into court within either the rule applicable to payments into court in the High Court or within the rule (Order IX., r. 12) applicable to such payments in the County Court.

Disturnal was not called on to reply.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J. — Two important points are raised in this case, one on the defendants' appeal and the other on the plaintiffs' cross-appeal. The first, which arises on the defendants' appeal, is whether the defendants, who in an action brought against them for 71*l.*, have succeeded as to that sum except as to the 23*l.* paid into court by them, and have got judgment with costs, are entitled to have their costs taxed on scale C—that is, the scale which is applicable to sums which are above 50*l.* That depends upon whether they have succeeded in a claim exceeding 50*l.*, or have only succeeded in a claim between 20*l.* and 50*l.*, in which latter case they would be entitled to costs on scale B only. The registrar taxed on scale C, but on a review of the taxation the judge held that scale B was the proper scale. The defendants now appeal from that order of the judge, and contend that scale C is the proper scale, as the registrar held. I agree entirely with the contention for the plaintiffs that the decisions lay it down that in such a case as the present the proceeding is one action only, and it was said that many consequences follow from that. The application of the principle laid down in White v. Headland's Patent Electric Storage Battery Co. (ubi sup.), goes to show that the action was an action for a sum above 50*l.*, and that the scale applicable is the scale for sums exceeding 50*l.* In that case the plaintiffs brought in the High Court an action to recover 73*l.*; by an order under Order XIV. the plaintiff was to have leave to sign judgment for 53*l.*, and the defendants were to have leave to defend as to the residue, namely 20*l.*, and it was ordered under sect. 65 of the County Courts Act 1888 that the action should be tried in the County Court. The plaintiff signed judgment for the 53*l.* under the order, and at the trial in the County Court he recovered judgment for the 20*l.*, the residue of his claim, with costs. Unquestionably a great deal might have been said in that case that the action in the County Court was only for the 20*l.*, and that only 20*l.* had been recovered; but the Court of Appeal held that the total amount recovered in the action was the 73*l.*, and that therefore the plaintiff was entitled to his costs upon that amount—that is, upon the scale applicable where the amount recovered exceeded 50*l*. Now assuming that in that case the result in the County Court had been the other way—namely, in favour of the defendants—which for the present purpose is the state of things in this case, could it then have been contended that the defendants would have been only entitled to costs under scale B? I think it could not have been so contended. In that case the defendants could not be said to have “recovered” anything in the action, within the actual language of the scale; but it seems to me that they have “recovered” in the action, because if we look at rule 18 of Order LIII. of the County Court Rules 1903 we find that it provides that “where the costs of a defendant are being taxed, the word ‘recovered,’ wherever it occurs in the scale, shall be deemed to be ‘claimed.’” When we add that to the decision in White v. Headland’s Patent Electric Storage Battery Company (ubi sup.) that the action in such cases is one action only, then I think it is clear that the scale applicable here is the scale which would be applicable to the amount originally claimed by the plaintiffs—namely, scale C. And if it were not so, it seems to me that great injustice would result, because if the plaintiffs had succeeded in the whole of their claim they would have been entitled to have their costs taxed under scale C, and it would be a great injustice if the defendants, who have succeeded as to the residue of their claim, should not also have their costs on the scale C. For both parties equally in such cases the action is one in which the scale of costs is determined by the amount which the plaintiff originally claims in the action. It seems to me, therefore, in this case, the point being whether or not the defendants should have their costs taxed on the scale B or the scale C, the scale applicable was the scale C, and that therefore upon that point the defendants’ appeal should succeed. Then there is another point raised on the cross-appeal by the plaintiffs as to whether the defendants are entitled to any costs at all. The defendants are met by the point that, because they have paid into court the sum of 23*l*. under an order made by the High Court under Order XIV., and the plaintiffs have succeeded as to that, the defendants are not entitled to get any costs at all, though as to the rest of their claim they have succeeded all along the line. It was said that the payment into court under Order XIV. was not a payment into court within the meaning of the County Courts Act and Rules, and that the judge had no power to treat it as a payment into court and give the defendants their costs. Where the money is in court and the defendant gives notice to the plaintiff—as the defendants in this case gave notice that they consented to a judgment for the amount paid in and costs—that the plaintiff may take the money out, then, when we remember that the plaintiff may under the rules take the money out of court, that is as good a payment into court under the County Courts Act and Rules as it would be in the High Court if the provisions of the High Court Rules as to payment into court were complied with. Then it is said for the plaintiffs that the action is one action, and that as they have succeeded in that one action to the extent of the money paid into court, the defendants were not entitled to any costs. That contention rests on the dictum of Ridley, J. and, to a certain extent, of Darling, J. in Wright v. Bull (ubi sup.), in which case the plaintiffs had brought an action in the High Court for 20*l*. 2*s*., and the defendant had paid 8*l*. 14*s*. into court under an order made under Order XIV., and the case was remitted under sect. 65 to a County Court, where judgment was given for the defendant, and no order was made as to costs. The Divisional Court held that the plaintiffs having succeeded in the action in recovering the 8*l*. 14*s*., the defendant was not entitled to costs, though he had got judgment in the County Court. Ridley, J. said (1900) 2 Q. B., at p. 127: “Has the County Court judge the same power over the costs that a judge of the High Court would have? Can he say that the costs down to the recovery of the 8*l*. 14*s*. must be paid by the defendant, but the rest of the costs must be borne by the plaintiffs? I do not think he has such power, although I should be much inclined to say that he ought to exercise such a discretion if he possessed it. But the discretion of the judge is, by sect. 113 of the County Courts Act 1888, limited to costs ‘not herein otherwise provided for,’ and that, I think, narrows the power of the County Court judge to deal with the costs to such matters as are not dealt with by the general scheme of the Act. The section seems to me to have been put in with a view to include such costs as were not dealt with by the general enactment as to costs, but in the absence of any special direction it was provided that costs should abide the event.” I cannot agree with that. I cannot think that the general provision in sect. 113 that in the absence of any special direction, costs should abide the event, could have been intended to affect the power of the County Court judge to award costs. My own view is that the words “not herein otherwise provided for” do not mean that, and do not narrow the power of the County Court judge so as to prevent him from dealing with costs which are to follow the event if there is no special direction. I think the words “otherwise provided for” mean otherwise provided for by the County Court rules as to costs. The dicta of Ridley, J. in the case I have referred to were not necessary to the decision, as in that case no order as to costs was made. Then when we come to look at sects. 113 and 65 together, I should be sorry to decide that the discretion of the County Court judge was limited under sect. 113 in any such case as the present in the way suggested. Sect. 65 provides that after an order is made under that section remitting the action to a County Court, “the action and all proceedings therein shall be tried and taken in such court as if the action had originally been commenced therein,” and so forth. Counsel for the plaintiffs frankly admitted that if this action had been commenced in the County Court instead of in the High Court, the County Court judge would have had a discretion under sect. 113 to say what costs should be given. In my opinion the fact that this was an action which, when transferred to the County Court, was to be conducted in the same way and with the same consequences as if it had been originally commenced in the County Court, shows that sect. 113 applies, and that there was a discretion in the judge as to the costs; and in my judgment it is not a sufficient answer for the plaintiffs to say that the action is one action and that in that action they have recovered something, and that therefore the costs must follow that result. I therefore think the plaintiffs' appeal fails, and that the defendants' appeal should be allowed, and that the defendants' costs should be taxed on scale C. I wish to add that I decide this case on the supposition that the County Court judge did not exercise his discretion as to whether defendants' costs should be allowed under scale B or scale C, and that he thought he was bound to allow them under scale B.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The order made by the County Court judge as to the defendants' costs was not an order made by him in exercise of a judicial discretion as to these two scales. That order was made on a wrong view taken by him that scale B, and not scale C, was the scale applicable to the circumstances of the case before him. The order he made was not properly an exercise of a discretion as to whether he should give costs under scale B or scale C, in which case we should not interfere with the exercise of his discretion. That was not so, but his order was founded, not upon an exercise of his discretion, but upon a wrong view of the principle applicable to the case. It was argued for the plaintiffs that in a scheme devised by the Legislature for the purpose of securing a cheap and speedy mode of trial, there were no means provided whereby a defendant who had succeeded in the whole matter in dispute in the County Court could get his costs, if a sum of money had been paid into court by him under Order XIV., as in this case. If that were the case then it would follow that the defendant would have to pay the plaintiff's costs on scale C if the plaintiff succeeded in the County Court; but that if the plaintiff recovered nothing in the County Court through the defendant paying into court under Order XIV. all that he owed the plaintiff, the defendant would not be entitled to any costs at all. That would be a strange result, and if it were the case I should, speaking for myself, never be a party to sending a case for trial in the County Court under such circumstances. I do not myself like the argument ab inconvenienti; but I think it may fairly be used when the argument contended for here leads to such an unjust result, a result, as it seems to me, which the Legislature never intended. With regard to the dicta of Ridley, J. and Darling, J. in Wright v. Bull (ubi sup.), I merely say that I do not agree with them. They were not necessary for the decision in that case, and we are not bound by them. If the same arguments had been put before the court in that case as have been put before us, likely they would not have used some of the expressions which they did use. I agree with what my Lord has said about those dicta and the other points argued.

Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—Exceptions—Marginal clause.

The plaintiffs were indorsees of bills of lading under which a cargo of maize, barley, linseed, oats, and wheat was shipped on the defendants' steamship. By the bills of lading it was provided that "the . . . owners . . . shall not be responsible for loss, damage, or injury arising from sweating . . . or consequences arising therefrom . . . or heat. That the . . . owners . . . shall not be responsible for any loss or injury to the said goods occurring from any of the causes above mentioned . . . whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned . . . or occasioned by any act or omission, negligence, default . . . of stevedores . . . or other persons in the service of the shipowners . . ." On the margin of the bills of lading under which the maize was shipped was stamped: "In no case is the steamship to be held liable for heating or any other damage occurring to the within mentioned goods." Part of the maize became heated on the voyage, and the other cargo was damaged through improper stowage.

In an action by the plaintiffs to recover damages: Held, that the words "above mentioned" did not refer to the matters in the clause above or the marginal clause, and that the word "heat" referred to heat arising from some extraneous cause, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment.

Held further, that if the owners desired to relieve themselves from liability for the negligence of their own servants there should have been express words.

Price v. Union Lighterage Company (89 L. T. Rep. 731; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 398; (1904) 1 K. B. 412) followed.

ACTION for damage to cargo by indorsees of bills of lading.

The plaintiffs were Robert Procter, Sons, and Co. Limited, and the defendants the owners of the steamship Pearlmoor.

The cargo consisted of maize, barley, linseed, oats, and wheat shipped on board the defendants' steamship Pearlmoor, at Buenos Ayres, in May and June 1902. The maize and barley and linseed were all shipped in bags, the oats partly in bags and partly in bulk, and the wheat was all in bulk.

On arrival of the vessel at Hull it was found that some of the wheat had been damaged by coal dust, some of the oats were mixed with the barley, and some of the linseed was mixed with the wheat, and it was also found that the bulk of the maize was in a heated condition, partly owing, it was contended by the plaintiffs, to its having been in contact with the sides of the ship.

The plaintiffs alleged that the damage was due to insufficient dunnage, to the bags having been cut by the stevedores so as to give more room for stowage, through the bulkhead between the bunkers and one of the holds not being proof against coal dust, through insufficient ventilation, and generally owing to bad stowage. They also alleged that the vessel was unseaworthy, but this point was not proceeded with.

The plaintiffs claimed 551*l.* 14*s.* for the damage to the maize, and 21*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.* for the damage to the remainder of the cargo—571*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.* in all.

The defendants denied that the cargo was badly stowed, or that their vessel was unseaworthy, and alleged that the damage to the maize was due to inherent vice. They also alleged that, if the damage was caused by improper stowage, that was due to the negligence of the stevedores, and such negligence was covered by the exceptions in the bills of lading.

The material clauses in the bills of lading were as follows:

1. The Act of God, the King's enemies, &c.
2. That the master, owners, or agents of the vessel or its connections shall not be responsible for loss, damage, or injury arising from sweating . . . bursting of packages, or consequences arising therefrom . . . decay, hook marks, or injury from hooks . . . explosion, heat, fire at sea or on shore, at any time or in any place.
3. That the master, owners, or agents of the vessel or its connections shall not be responsible for any loss or injury to the said goods occurring from any of the causes above mentioned, or for any loss or injury arising from the perils or accidents of the seas . . . whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom be occasioned by or from any act or omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, stevedores, or other persons in the service of the shipowners . . .

On the margin of the bills of lading under which the maize was shipped there was in addition stamped the following clause:

In no case is the steamship to be held liable for heating, or any other damage accruing to the within-mentioned goods, nor for insufficient strength of bagging.

The defendants in the further alternative, while denying liability, paid into court the sum of 30*l.*

Evidence was called by the plaintiffs and defendants in support of their respective cases, and

BARNES, J. in dealing with the facts of the case said:—It is necessary in this case to dispose first of the questions of fact, because there is a question of the construction of the bills of lading under which these goods are carried to be disposed of afterwards. The plaintiffs appear to be the consignees under certain bills of lading—a copy of one of which has been put in—for some maize, barley, linseed, oats, and wheat shipped on the Pearlmoor at Buenos Ayres, for Hull, in May 1902. It is said that the grain arrived at Hull damaged to a certain extent. The question of importance in the case is in connection with the maize, because the claim made relating to the maize amounts to 551*l.* 14*s.*, whereas the other matters are quite trifling. The plaintiffs' contention with regard to the maize may be put in this form: That for some reason or other a large number of the bags were cut in order to stow more cargo into the hold; that the crevices were filled up with loose maize; and that the loose maize got into the spaces at the ends of the cargo, against the fore and after bulkheads, and also into the wings of the ship; and that, in that condition of things, the ventilation was not such as it should have been in the course of the voyage, and the damage was thus occasioned. With regard to the voyage, there seems to have been some bad weather, when the ventilators were closed, but the captain says he had often had such bad weather before, and that there was nothing out of the usual in the weather that was experienced. He had previously said that very bad weather was experienced on the 7th June and for several days afterwards, and the ventilators had to be closed for two or three days sometimes. There was undoubtedly closing of the ventilators for a certain time. The next matter is that the shipment was made under bills of lading which described the cargo as in good order and condition; but that does not mean anything more than that there was nothing specially noticeable about it which would require to be marked on the mate's receipts. [His Lordship then dealt with the evidence as to the number of bags that were cut.] The conclusion to which I have come upon the whole is that while no doubt there is always a certain quantity of loose grain, there was in this case an unusual quantity; and I think that must have been due to the cutting of the bags at shipment, for some reason or other—it does not matter what. It seems to me there was an undue proportion of loose grain, for the reasons I have given, and that that grain was in the places where the ventilation should be—namely, in the wings and the ends where the bulkheads should be separated from the cargo, and that there was therefore less free ventilation than there should have been. Now, I think it is not made out that the whole of this damage by heating is due to the cause which I have been considering, but I think some of it was. I think the ship's ventilation became defective to a certain extent owing to this excessive quantity of loose grain which was about for the reasons I have given; and I have asked the Elder Brethren what is their view. They think that as there was more loose grain than usual it might aggravate the heating. That is, I believe, all one can say about this case. I do not attribute the whole of this heating to this cause. The probability is that a portion of this heating was due to the state of the cargo itself, and to its being confined in the hold of the ship. It appears to me that the proper and only conclusion I can come to is to put down half of this heating to that cause. If the damage by heating amounts to 400*l.*, I think 200*l.* of that is due to this choking up of the ventilation. The next matter to discuss is what has been called the iron damage. It does not seem to me to be quite the right term. It means the damage to the bags which have been against the iron work of the ship, and, in consequence of the accumulation of water, have been thereby damaged. The bags were described as being so wet that they burst when moved, and the grain poured out and was damaged. Now, the quantity that is said to have met with damage in this respect is 920 bags, in all, equivalent to 344 quarters, and it is said that the damage amounted to 81*l.* Was that due to bad stowage, or was it not? I understand the contention of the defendants was that it was due to the working of the ship in bad weather if any bags got out of place—that everything was right at the start, and that any cargo which got against the side of the ship got there in the course of the voyage. Here again there is a question of fact to decide. The broad contention of the plaintiffs is that some of the cargo battens were not in their places when the ship arrived, so that some of the cargo got against the sides and frames and stringers. On the other hand, the case for the defendants is that the battens were all in their places when the ship started. I think myself that the evidence for the plaintiffs is better than that for the defendants on this point. My opinion is that the places where this grain had got against the ironwork of the ship were not adequately protected, in the way they should have been, when the ship started. I accept, broadly speaking, the view presented on this part of the case by the plaintiffs, and I find that the damage was due to improper stowage. So that matter will depend, as also the point I have already decided, upon what effect is to be given to the bills of lading. With regard to the other small items, wheat and coal dust got mixed, and it seems to me that could not have happened without there being some defect in the bulkhead. So also with regard to the mixing of wheat and linseed. It was a temporary bulkhead, and seems to have been in such a condition that the grain got through the interstices. Lastly, there was an item for the mixing of barley and oats in No. 5 hold. I cannot see how that happened unless the sail cloths were not properly fixed. Those are my findings on this matter, and the next question is what is the law.

Pickford, K.C. and Bateson for the plaintiffs.—Negligence is at the root of all the damage, and the exceptions in the second and third clauses, even if they cover damage, are of no avail. As Walton, J. says, in Price v. Union Lighterage Company (88 L. T. Rep. 428, at p. 430; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 398, at p. 400; (1903) 1 K. B. 750, at p. 754): "If the carrier desires to relieve himself from the duty of using by himself and his servants reasonable skill and care in the carriage of goods, he must do so in plain language and explicitly, and not by general words." With regard to the marginal clause the words "in no case" do not explicitly cover negligence. In Taubman v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company (26 L. T. Rep. 704; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 336) there was a provision that the shipowner would not be answerable for loss of luggage "under any circumstances whatever." That, however, was a special contract between a shipowner and a passenger by sea, not part of a bill of lading contract. The case was commented on by the Court of Appeal in Price v. Union Lighterage Company (89 L. T. Rep. 731; (1904) 1 K. B. 412). It is submitted the second group of words "causes above mentioned" in clause 3 only refer to the first group in the same section. They cannot be said to refer to the exceptions in clause 2. This is clear because the defendants have put in the words "whether occasioned by negligence" in the one class of perils, and left it out in the other. The damage to the maize was caused by heating, which was caused by fermentation. It is not therefore within clause 2 as "sweating" or as "heat"; for the words before and after the word "heat" show that heat means outside action.

Laing, K.C. and Adair Roche, for the defendants, contra.—The damage by heating is within clause 2, and comes under the heading of "sweating." Heating causes moisture, and the result of such moisture is what is termed "sweating." It also comes within the marginal clause. This is a rubber stamp clause specially used in the case of maize cargoes, and the words "any other damage" are expressly intended to cover any damage like the present. If there had only been room the marginal clause would have been stamped at the end of clause 3, and it must be read as if it were there. The words "In no case is the steamship to be held liable for heating," &c., by themselves cover negligence. See Ashenden v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, 42 L. T. Rep. 586; 5 Ex. Div. 190.

Mitchell v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, 33 L. T. Rep. 161; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 256.

The perils mentioned in clause 2 cover negligence, for the second group of words, "causes above mentioned," in clause 3 refer to clause 2.

Pickford, K.C. in reply.

BARNES, J.—Having disposed of the questions of fact, I now have to apply the law. That brings me to consider the terms of these somewhat extraordinary bills of lading. They are all in the same form, but the marginal clauses are stamped only on the bills of lading relating to the maize. They contain very long clauses of exceptions, and if it had not been for the courtesy of counsel in providing me with a type-written copy I do not know how I should have been able to get on without the assistance of a magnifying glass to read these exceptions, which are contained in several paragraphs of very small print. I cannot understand why at the present day shipowners do not take the opposite course to that which these bills of lading take—of excepting a mass of detailed perils, causes, and things—and state what they are willing to be responsible for. However, the exceptions seem to grow and grow, based upon the old form of bill of lading. The first point that is taken is a general point, and that is that what I may term the negligence clause—the third clause of exceptions—does not apply to those exceptions which have been relied upon by the defendants. The third clause begins thus: "That the master, owners, or agents of the vessel or its connections shall not be responsible for any loss or injury to the said goods, occurring from any of the causes above mentioned." I suppose "the causes above mentioned" must there mean the causes referred to in the first and second paragraphs of the exceptions and stipulations, because those are the only causes that so far have been above-mentioned. But then there comes a long string of words, which commences thus: "or for any loss or injury arising from the perils or accidents of the seas," &c. This ends with the words "whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned, or the loss or injury arising therefrom be occasioned by or from any act or omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, stevedores, or other persons in the service of the shipowners, whether on board the said ship or any other ship belonging to or chartered by them, or otherwise howsoever, for whose acts they would otherwise be liable." Now, it is quite clear that the words "above mentioned," which I have just read, cannot have precisely the same meaning as the words "above mentioned" at the beginning of paragraph 3; because the first part only refers to the first and second sets of exceptions, and if it only refers to the first and second sets of exceptions, to use the words "above mentioned" where they occur again in precisely the same way would then only refer to the first and second sets of exceptions. No one has contended that it means that. The contention for the plaintiffs is that where you find the words "above mentioned" a second time they refer to what is just above—namely, in the third paragraph, beginning with the words "or for any loss or injury arising from the perils." The contention for the defendants is that they must include those perils, causes, or things, and also the causes or things mentioned in Nos. 1 and 2. I have considered this matter with as much care as I can, and the view that I take is that when the words "above mentioned" are used a second time, having regard to their collocation, they only refer to the specific causes and things which are set out in paragraph 3. It is extremely doubtful whether one is really right or wrong about that particular view, but that is a construction which I hold, and it seems to me that that is the proper one to adopt. If that is right it makes an end of this case; but assuming that is not the view to take, I have still to consider the effect of the words in paragraph 2, on which the defendants rely. What are those words? He relies first on the word "heat." I think that the contention of the plaintiffs is correct, that that word, having regard to its collocation, which is between the words "explosion" and "fire at sea or on shore" does not refer to the heating of the cargo from its own spontaneous combustion or generation of heat, through the action of moisture coming against it, or its own moisture causing it to develop heat, but that the word "heat" refers to some extraneous source, such as heat coming from the engine-room. So much for that point. The next word relied upon was the word "decay." The argument upon that was very faintly pressed, and I do not think myself that any of the loss with which I have had to concern myself in dealing with the facts can be attributed to the ordinary meaning which is attached to the word "decay." Then comes the word "sweating"—"loss, damage, or injury arising from sweating." Now, in this case I have already found that the damage was due to the causes which I specified in my judgment upon the facts, and it seems to me that those causes do not include the idea of sweating. I think the correct view of that word is that expressed by Mr. Pickford—viz., of moisture dropping on to the bags from condensation, which arises if there is moisture which evaporates and then condenses in the hold. The damage, in my opinion, was not caused by that class of injury. There is the further point taken on the marginal clause, which is as follows: "In no case is the steamship to be held liable for heating or any other damage accruing to the within mentioned goods nor for insufficient strength of bagging." Now, there are several cases referred to in connection with this point, the last of which is Price v. Union Lighterage Company (ubi sup.). I only propose to refer to one paragraph in the judgment there, which summarises what I wish to say upon this matter. That is as follows: Walton, J. in the course of his judgment, said: "I understand the meaning of this to be that an exemption in general words, not expressly relating to negligence, even though the words are wide enough to include loss by the negligence or default of the carrier's servants, must be construed as limiting the liability of the carrier as insurer, and not as relieving him from the duty of exercising reasonable skill and care. If the carrier desires to relieve himself from the duty of using by himself and his servants reasonable skill and care in the carriage of goods, he must do so in plain language and explicitly, and not by general words." Those are general words in this case, not expressly referring to negligence, and, it seems to me, do not include negligence on the part of the shipowner or those for whom he is responsible. But, of course, in this case the view which I take about that clause is fortified by the fact that this marginal clause only occurs in a bill of lading which does deal with negligence in certain specific cases; and negligence being thus dealt with in certain specific cases leads more than ever to the conclusion that—general words being used somewhere else—if in such a marginal clause as this the negligence of the shipowner or his servants is to be excluded, the language should expressly refer to that exclusion. There is a further point to be dealt with—that what has been discussed in the course of this case and called the iron damage is, as the defendants contended, sweating damage. If the first point that I dealt with, as to the construction of the words in clause 3 so far as they affect clause 2, is right, then any difficulty as to the construction of the word "sweating" is got rid of. But even if the view I take is not correct, it appears to me, having regard to the facts, that it is not shown by the defendants that the damage I have dealt with is, strictly speaking, damage done by sweating. There are only some other small matters to refer to—namely, the damage to the wheat and linseed and the barley and oats by mixing. It was not contended that those small items could be really brought within any of the terms of the exceptions in the bill of lading, and therefore the defence as to them fails. The result, in my opinion, is that the 30*l.* which has been paid into court in this case is not sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim, assuming, of course, that the damage which I have found, but which will have to be definitely ascertained by the registrar and merchants, exceeds that amount, which it almost certainly must do. My judgment must be for the plaintiffs, for an amount to be ascertained by the registrar and merchants in accordance with my judgment.

[ADM.]

THE PEARLMOOR.

[ADM.]

Collision—Manchester Ship Canal—Fog—Application of Sea Rules—Duty to stop and reverse on hearing whistle of approaching vessel—Art. 16—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 16 and 30—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 418 (1).

Semble, the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea do not apply to the Manchester Ship Canal. Even assuming that they do apply, a vessel coming down the canal in a fog is not necessarily to blame under art. 16 of the regulations if she does not stop her engines on hearing the whistle of an approaching vessel forward of her beam; for the approaching vessel must be in the canal, and it may be assumed that she is being navigated on her right side, and her position is therefore, under the circumstances, sufficiently ascertained.

ACTION for damage by collision.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship South Coast, and the defendants the owners of the steamship Hare.

The collision occurred about 1.28 p.m. on the 6th Dec. 1903 in the Manchester Ship Canal near the Weaver Sluices. The weather was foggy, and there was no wind, the tide was slack, and both vessels were sounding their whistles.

The South Coast was a steamship of 421 tons gross register, and at the time was proceeding down the canal on a voyage from Manchester to Plymouth with a general cargo on board and manned by a crew of twelve hands all told.

The Hare was a steamship of 804 tons gross register, and at the time was proceeding up the canal on a voyage from Dublin to Manchester with a general cargo and passengers, and manned by a crew of twenty-four hands all told.

The facts of the case will be found sufficiently set out in the judgment.

The case is reported on the question of the application of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea to waters such as the Manchester Ship Canal, and on the application of art. 16 of the regulations to such waters.

By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea it is provided:

These rules shall be followed by all vessels upon the high seas and in all waters connected therewith, navigable by sea-going vessels.

Art. 16. Every vessel shall, in a fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rain storms, go at a moderate speed having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions. A steamvessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

Art. 30. Nothing in these rules shall interfere with the operation of a special rule, duly made by local authority, relative to the navigation of any harbour, river, or inland waters.

By sect. 418 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60):

Her Majesty may on the joint recommendation of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade, by Order in Council, make regulations for the preventing of collisions at sea, and may thereby regulate the lights to be carried and exhibited, the fog signals to be carried and used, and the steering and sailing rules to be observed by ships, and those regulations (in this Act referred to as the collision regulations) shall have effect as if enacted in this Act.

At the trial of the action the master of the plaintiffs' vessel admitted that he had heard the whistle of the Hare before she came into view, but did not stop his engines.

It was contended by the defendants that on this account the plaintiffs' vessel must be found to blame as art. 16 of the Collision Regulations had not been complied with.

Aspinall, K.C. and Noad for the plaintiffs.—The Sea Rules do not apply to waters such as the Manchester Ship Canal. Sect. 418 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 applies only to collisions at sea. There is no by-law for the Manchester Ship Canal which requires a vessel to stop on hearing the whistle of another vessel forward of the beam. The code deals with the duties of ships under all circumstances and is exhaustive, and it is submitted that any such regulation was expressly omitted. In The Carlotta (80 L. T. Rep. 664; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; (1899) P. 228) there were no express regulations, and there is no case which goes so far as to say that the regulations apply to such a locus as the Manchester Ship Canal. It is true that art. 30 provides that nothing in the Sea Rules shall interfere with the operation of a special rule made by a local authority. Assuming, however, that the Sea Rules applied, art. 16 has no application to the present case and the circumstances were special, and it would not have been a safe thing for the South Coast to have stopped. It is necessary that a vessel should keep her heading in the narrow waters of a canal, and there is no danger in her so doing, as a vessel must be coming in a fixed direction. It is not like the open sea, where one vessel may be crossing the course of the other. But, even assuming the rule does apply, in this case the position of the Hare had been duly ascertained.

Laing, K.C. and Bateson, for the defendants, contra.—The Sea Rules apply to the high seas and "all waters connected therewith navigable by sea-going vessels. If there is no local rule which ought reasonably and properly to prevent the application of the Sea Rules then the Sea Rules apply. For instance, in the case of a vessel in dock, she would be bound to carry the regulation lights when under way. The Manchester Ship Canal is a water connected with the high seas within the meaning of art. 30 of the regulations. The fact of a gate being shut at times during certain states of the tide does not prevent its being so, and it is submitted that although the Canal is shut off from the sea it is connected with it none the less. In this particular case the gate of the locks was open, so that in fact the canal at the time was actually connected with the high seas. In The Carlotta (ubi sup.) there was no rule as to navigation. There is as much a duty to stop in a canal on hearing a whistle forward of the beam as elsewhere. It is the duty of a vessel to stop and ascertain the true bearing of an approaching vessel in every case:

[ADM.]

The by-laws for the Manchester Ship Canal, even if they did provide for a case such as the present, could not be enforced as they had not received the consent of the Board of Trade as required by sect. 198 of the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885.

Aspinall, K.C. in reply.

BARNES, J.—This is a case of a collision which took place between the steamships South Coast and Hare, a little before two o'clock in the afternoon of the 6th Dec. in last year, in the Manchester Ship Canal, near the Weaver Sluices. The weather at the time was foggy, and the tide had nearly ceased to operate at all—it was slack—such tide, I mean, as seems to be allowed to run in during the time that the lock gates are open at Eastham. The South Coast is a screw steamer of 421 tons gross register, and was proceeding down the Ship Canal on a voyage from Manchester to Plymouth with general cargo. The Hare is a screw steamer of 804 tons gross register, and was proceeding up the Ship Canal, on a voyage from Dublin to Manchester with general cargo and passengers. These vessels were sounding their whistles for fog, and they met in collision at the place I have mentioned, the collision taking place practically stem on, the stem of the Hare striking the star-board bow of the South Coast about two feet from the stem. The question is which of these vessels was to blame for this collision. I do not intend to go through the cases presented on each side, as there is a certain looseness in the evidence and certain inconsistencies have been pointed out in the preliminary act and pleadings of the plaintiffs and their evidence, and certain criticisms have been made on the defendants' evidence. The result, however, is that one of the broad points to determine in the case is whether the collision happened, to use an ordinary expression, in the water of the plaintiffs or in the water of the defendants, each side maintaining that it took place on their own side of the canal, and, therefore, that the other ship was in the wrong. Other points in the case are as to the navigation of these vessels with regard to stopping, helm action, and speed. With the assistance of the Elder Brethren I have come to a conclusion of fact in this case which enables me to decide it, but there are some points which have been disclosed in the course of the arguments that involve matters of some little difficulty; and if I felt it necessary to decide the case only upon some of these more difficult matters I should have thought it desirable, probably, to express what I have to say after more consideration. But the points that have been pressed, and which involve certain difficulties, are not, to my mind, essential features of the case, and I can without, I hope, tying my hand too tightly by the expression of any views about these more difficult matters, come to a conclusion about this case. Dealing first with one of the points presented on the part of the defendants against the plaintiffs, it is this: it is said that the plaintiffs' vessel did not stop her engines on hearing the whistle of the defendants' ship. The plaintiffs' master said: "I heard a whistle once before she came up before I saw her." Upon his evidence it would seem that he only stopped his engines when he saw what he described as a loom, and then thought it was a ship. The point made by the defendants is that the plaintiffs' vessel must be to blame because her engines were not stopped on hearing the whistle of the defendants' ship, before even she was seen. It is said that that makes the plaintiffs' vessel responsible because of art. 16 of the Sea Regulations. The answer made to that point is that that regulation does not apply, and that none of the Sea Regulations do apply to the Manchester Ship Canal. I am not at all satisfied that it is necessary for me to express a positive opinion about that point, but my present impression is that the Sea Regulations do not apply to the Manchester Ship Canal. These regulations are made in pursuance of sect. 418 of the Merchant Shipping Act, under which Her Majesty—that Act was passed in the reign of the late Queen, namely in 1894—may on the joint recommendation of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade, by Order in Council, make regulations for the prevention of collisions at sea. Now, the plaintiffs say that the regulations only apply for the purpose of preventing collisions at sea, and that this was not a collision which took place at sea. The defendants, however, say that it did take place at sea within the meaning of the section, and that the words "at sea" have been interpreted by those who draw the regulations as including something which included the present case, because the preliminary is as follows: "These rules shall be followed by all vessels upon the high seas and in all waters connected therewith, navigable by sea-going vessels." I do not myself read that preliminary article as intended to extend the word "sea" beyond its proper meaning. The preliminary rule says "high seas and in all waters connected therewith," and my view has already been expressed in the case of The Carlotta (ubi sup.). Of course, if the sea rules do not apply, there is an end of that point, and my view is that they do not apply to the Ship Canal. I cannot myself conceive how they could strictly be said to apply to a piece of navigable channel artificially constructed, terminating at Eastham in locks which only at times admit the sea, and which has locks at different places all the way up, from place to place, and where it is necessary to do what the pilot of the Rondane said. He said they were in every lock together down to Latchford. I should have thought it was tolerably clear that the upper part cannot be said to be connected with the sea, at any rate, and I do not see very well how the term could be applied to the lower part, even if it is, for a portion of the time, allowed to have an inflow of sea water, when the gates are open. Certainly it would be, I think, extremely inconvenient if the Sea Regulations were so held to apply. It would have this very curious result, that vessels navigating in the canal near a part of the sea, to which they cannot get, and vessels navigating in the sea, might be hearing whistles forward of their beam, and for which they would have to act, though by no possibility could they get at each other. But Mr. Aspinall took a further point—namely, that even if the sea rules apply, then there is art. 30 of the regulations, which provides "that nothing in these rules shall interfere with the operation of a special rule, duly made by local authority, relative to the navigation of any harbour, river, or inland waters." He said there is a scheme in this case of rules made by the local authority which regulates the navigation of the Manchester Ship Canal, and he referred me to the published regulations of the Manchester Ship Canal—to arts. 6, 7, 15, and 16, and to the schedule of signals which are contained in those regulations. Then he said that those rules, or some of them, show what vessels have to do when they are meeting each other, and what they have to do to avoid danger of collision. But there seems some difficulty in treating those regulations as really made within the meaning of art. 30—as really duly made by the local authority—because Mr. Laing pointed out that under sect. 198 of the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885 the only power to make by-laws or regulations applicable to such a matter as I am considering is power to make regulations “for regulating the conduct of the owners, masters, and crews of vessels propelled by steam with respect to the rate of speed at which they may proceed within the canal, docks, or works, or any part or parts thereof, respectively, and for requiring such vessels to stop or slow their engines at such times and places as the company may require, and to keep the advertised times of sailing, and for regulating the taking on board, landing, or putting out of passengers”—which does not in terms cover all the matters that have to be considered with regard to signals, lights, and so forth on board ships; and, further, that in the latter part of the section there is a provision that such “by-laws, except so far as they relate solely to the company or their officers or servants, shall be subject to the provisions with respect to by-laws of the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, except sect. 85 of that Act, but no such by-laws shall have any force or effect unless and until the same be confirmed by the Board of Trade.” Sect. 85 of the Act of 1847, which is there referred to, provides that no by-laws shall come into operation until allowed in the manner prescribed and approved by one of the judges. Now, for one of the judges is substituted the Board of Trade, but I understand that the particular regulations which have been relied upon by Mr. Aspinall have not been confirmed by the Board of Trade. That is the statement made to me, as far as I understand it. So that the point which Mr. Aspinall took would not seem to be satisfactorily established. But the result of that would be that although the regulations may not, perhaps, be strictly termed enforceable, as being duly made, as I understand it, at present, yet still they show what the practice of navigation is; and so far as the actual seamanship and navigation of those two vessels is concerned both parties have argued the case before me as if it was their own duty to keep to their own side and to act with reasonable caution and stop and reverse and pass port side to port side. There is one other point I might mention, which seems to me important. That is, that even if art. 16 applies, yet the rule applies only where the position of the vessel which makes the fog signal is not ascertained, and I think in this case that even if that rule is treated as applicable, the position in the particular circumstances of the case was such that when the whistle of the other vessel was heard that vessel was in a position which was ascertained. It is perfectly obvious that she must be in the canal—they need not trouble themselves about vessels in the river—and therefore her ordinary position in the canal must be ascertained if both vessels keep to their right side. Her distance, too, must be reasonably ascertained, because the Rondane was proceeding ahead of the plaintiffs' vessel and between her and the Hare. So both I and the Elder Brethren think that if art. 16 applies the circumstances were such that it was reasonable to say that the position of the Hare was sufficiently ascertained to comply with the rule. I also think it is worth while pointing out that the rules must be worked with a certain amount of reason. Mr. Aspinall relied upon the second part of art. 16, “so far as the circumstances of the case admit.” It would be very awkward if every time a whistle was heard and there were a number of vessels going down and others were coming up, meeting each other, it was obligatory upon any vessel in a lock to stop. It would seriously hamper vessels astern; and although there is a rule in the schedule of signals providing a special signal to be made if a vessel is obliged to stop when another vessel is following her, the effect of stopping for every whistle heard would be to stop all the traffic, and there would be, it seems to me, a general standstill, which is not desirable. For these reasons, which, as I have said, I give without any lengthy consideration, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs' vessel cannot be held to blame simply because she did not stop her engines upon hearing the whistle of the Hare. [His Lordship then dealt with the facts, and found the Hare alone to blame for the collision.]

HUNTER v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Revenue—Income tax—Deductions—Life insurance—Payment of annual premium—Income Tax Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 54.

The appellant insured his life with a registered insurance company. By agreement between himself and the company he only paid half the annual premium on the policy, the other half being advanced by the company, and the amount of such advances, with interest, being made a first charge upon the policy. He also made himself personally liable to repay these advances. The company gave him a receipt for the whole amount of the premium in each year.

Held, that, in making his return of profits and gains liable to income tax, he was only entitled to deduct, under sect. 54 of the Income Tax Act 1853, that half of the nominal premium which was actually paid by him to the company.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed, Lord James of Hereford dissenting.

HUNTER v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

[H. OF L.]

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.), reported 88 L. T. Rep. 184; (1903) 1 K. B. 514, who had reversed a decision of Phillimore, J., reported 87 L. T. Rep. 180; (1902) 2 K. B. 255.

The question raised was whether upon the true construction of the Income Tax Acts the appellant was entitled to deduct from his assessment or to obtain relief in respect of 66*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, the full annual premium paid upon a policy of insurance upon his life, or only in respect of the sum of 33*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, the difference between the two sums being by arrangement between the appellant and the London Life Association Limited, with whom the insurance was effected, lent by the association to him upon the security of the policy and applied in part payment of the annual premium payable in respect of the assurance.

The policy was dated the 30th June 1896, and was for 1500*l.* It recited that the sum of 66*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, including an advance of 33*l.* under the first clause thereof (being the premium for such assurance until the 30th June 1897), had been paid to the association, and inter alia provided that a portion—viz., 33*l.*—of the renewal premium should, if the assured should so desire, be advanced by the association and be a first charge on the policy.

By clause 2 it was provided that after the premium should have been paid for seven years or commuted the renewal premium should be subject to any reduction which might be declared by the directors.

On the 30th June 1896 the appellant received from the association a receipt in the following terms:

Receipt No. 1625. The London Life Association Limited, 81, King William-street, London, E.C. Received this 30th day of June 1896 the sum of 66*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* (including 33*l.* advanced by the association), being the first premium on an assurance of 1500*l.* on the life of Mr. Robert Lewin Hunter, for which a policy will be issued in due course. C. D. HIGHAM, Actuary and Secretary. 66*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* premium (including advance as above). Countersigned, E. C. E. Sharpe.

By agreement dated the 19th July 1897 the appellant, in consideration of 33*l.* then advanced to him by way of loan, and of the same amount advanced to him by way of loan on the 30th June 1896, and of five further sums of the same amount to be advanced to him by way of loan by the association under the terms of the policy, charged the policy and all moneys and benefits thereby assured as security for repayment to the association of the principal sums advanced and to be advanced, together with interest as mentioned in the agreement; and he further agreed to pay to the association the principal sums and interest, and also, as long as the principal sums or any part thereof remained owing, to pay interest thereon at the rate therein mentioned.

On the 19th July 1897 he paid to the association the sum of 33*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* in cash, and the association lent him the sum of 33*l.*, that amount making up the sum of 66*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, the full amount of the renewal premium.

A receipt was given in the words and figures following:

Receipt No. 1475. The London Life Association Limited, 81, King William-street, London, E.C. Policy

No. 30540. Due 30th June 1897. Received this 19th day of July 1897 the sum of 66*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, being the amount of one year's premium, due as above, for the assurance of 1500*l.* by this policy on the life of Mr. R. L. Hunter. 66*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* amount paid. C. D. HIGHAM, Actuary and Secretary. For one of the directors of the association. Countersigned, E. C. E. Sharpe.

On the 8th July 1898 the appellant made a similar payment, and the association made a similar loan, which was applied in the same way. A receipt was given similar to that given on the 19th July 1897.

The association did not in any of the years 1896, 1897, and 1898 make any actual cash payment to the appellant, but in each of such years debited him with the sum of 33*l.* in the loan register, and in the renewal premium register he was credited with the full amount of the premium. The appellant in each of the years 1897, 1898, and 1899 paid interest upon the total amount of the loans made by the association then standing to his debit in the loan ledger. In each of the years 1896-7, 1897-8, and 1898-9 the firm of which he was a member were assessed to income tax under sched. D in respect of the profits of their business, the assessment being based on the assumption that the appellant was entitled to relief to the amount of 33*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* only in respect of the premium for the policy, and in each year the special commissioners refused on appeal to grant relief in respect of the whole of the premium of 66*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*

In the year 1900 the appellant presented a petition of right, claiming payment of the sum of 3*l.* 6*s.*, being the income tax paid in respect of the sum of 33*l.* in the three years above mentioned.

Phillimore, J. held that the appellant was entitled to deduct from the tax the whole 66*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*; but his decision was reversed by the the Court of Appeal.

Danckwerts, K.C. and Acland, K.C. appeared for the appellant.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir E. Carson, K.C.), and Rowlatt for the respondent.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: It appears to me that this judgment ought to be affirmed. The whole point is that the exemption, or deduction, or whatever it is to be called, is to be allowed to the assured if the premium has been "paid by him," and the sole reason which I give for my judgment is that it has not been paid by him. I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I quite agree.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. No doubt the argument based on the charge on the policy appears to have some weight, because it appears as between the appellant and the insurance company that the premium has been paid. But that is not the question. The question is whether the appellant has paid the premium so as to obtain the benefit of the exemption. Looking at the whole transaction, it appears to me that it was a scheme of some ingenuity whereby the insurance company invited people to insure their lives in their office on the footing of half the annual premiums for seven years not having to be found in cash; and the very merit of the scheme, as pointed out in some of the documents, in the invitations, or prospectus, or whatever it is called, is that the insured will not have to pay in cash the whole of the premiums. In these circumstances I think that the entry in the ledger is a perfectly accurate entry, that 33*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* is paid and 33*l.* remained "on credit." It may be that the insured was liable to be sued for that 33*l.*, but he was willing to run that risk, no doubt, for the sake of obtaining the very favourable terms which were offered to him by the insurance company, who were not likely to spoil their business by taking such a step.

H. OF L.]

BRIGG v. THORNTON.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD.—My Lords: I have entertained considerable doubt in this case, and I express the opinion which I now do express before your Lordships with very great hesitation as to whether I am right or not; but, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that this payment does in fact exist and therefore that the appellant is entitled to succeed. I am aware of the statement that this transaction, as regards the 33*l.*, was described as "on credit." That, of course, is substantially in favour of the opinion which your Lordships have expressed. But I am disposed to look rather at the real substance of the transaction as it is found in the charge on the policy. It is admitted that the parties have acted in perfect good faith in this arrangement which has taken place; whether it is an ingenious one or not, it is certainly an honest transaction, and in it, as between the two parties, this sum is treated as an advance upon loan, and it is admitted that upon that document between them an action could have been brought, so that at any time, if the company chose to take that course, although it may be one which they would not have taken in fact, they could have sued upon it. It appears to me that there is nothing in the transaction which can be condemned, either in the nature of the transaction itself, or as being legally in fault. If one party chose to say to the other, "I will lend you money with one hand and receive it with the other," it seems to me to be a transaction of loan with a charge of interest upon that loan, and it was treated by the parties in good faith as a loan; and, that being so, it would be a "payment" in the same way, as has been mentioned at the Bar, as if the money had been borrowed from a third person, or as if there had been two different departments in the same office in which the transaction had taken place. For these reasons, with very great diffidence, I differ from my noble and learned friends who have expressed their opinions, for looking at the case as a whole, and it is full of difficulties, though it is a short one, it appears to me that the appellant is entitled to succeed.

LORD ROBERTSON.—My Lords: I agree with the motion which has been proposed, upon the very simple and sufficient ground stated by the Lord Chancellor. The whole argument of the appellant has been that as in a question between the assured and the insurance company he must be held to have paid the larger sum. But in point of fact in a question of the extent by which his income was diminished during the year by the payment, there can be no doubt that it was only by 33*l.* and not by 66*l.*

LORD LINDLEY.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I think the judgment of Mathew, L.J. absolutely unanswerable. I say this bearing in mind that under the old common law plea of payment you could prove the plea by a settlement of account on a balance payment, but that is not such a payment as is contemplated by the Income Tax Acts at all.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Dec. 3 and 4, 1903.

(Before WILLIAMS, ROMER, and STIRLING, L.JJ.)

BRIGG v. THORNTON. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE COUNTY PALATINE OF LANCASTER.

Lessor and lessee—Covenant not to let adjoining property for purpose of a certain business—Breach of covenant—Remedies of lessee.

By an agreement in writing, dated the 30th Oct. 1901, T. agreed to grant to the plaintiff a lease of a shop in an arcade for twenty-one years, such lease to contain a covenant by the lessee "not to carry on upon the premises any other trade or business than that of a dealer in pictures (oil and water-colours), prints, engravings, photographs, etchings, and articles of vertu, artistic and heraldic stationer, frame-maker and dealer in photographic frames, artists' colours, and the accessories to the said trade or business": and also a covenant by the lessor "not to let any other portion of the said arcade for the trade or business hereinbefore mentioned to be carried on by the tenant."

By an agreement in writing, dated the 25th Sept. 1902, T. agreed to let to G. a stall in the arcade on a yearly tenancy, and it was agreed that the tenant should "not carry on any business other than that of a librarian, newsagent, bookseller, or stationer."

The plaintiff alleged that G. was selling articles which came within the covenant in the deed of the 30th Oct. 1901, and brought an action against T. and G. claiming an injunction restraining T. from letting or allowing to remain let and G. from using the premises comprised in his agreement for any of the purposes of the trade or business described in the tenant's covenant in the agreement of the 30th Oct. 1901.

Held, the evidence showed that there had been a substantial breach of the agreement with the plaintiff; that the covenant being against letting and not against using, and the plaintiff having in that action treated the letting to G. as an existing fact, he had no remedy against G.; but as against T. he was entitled to a declaration that the letting to G. was a breach of the covenant not to let, and an inquiry as to the damages sustained by the breach, with liberty to apply for an injunction in case of any attempt at any further letting contrary to the covenant.

The principle of Kemp v. Bird (37 L. T. Rep. 53; 5 Ch. Div. 974) applied.

ON the 30th Oct. 1901 an agreement in writing but not under seal, was entered into between the defendants Robert Thornton and James Thornton, who were builders (therein called the "landlords," which expression was to include their heirs and assigns), of the one part and the plaintiff, Charles A. Brigg, a fine art dealer (therein called the "tenant," which expression was to include his executors, administrators, and permitted assigns), of the other part by which the landlords agreed, as soon as certain shops therein referred to were built, to grant, and the tenant agreed to take, a lease of the shop then about to be erected by the landlords in the arcade on the north side of Lord-street, Liverpool, as shown on the plan thereunto annexed and therein numbered 6 and 7, for a term of twenty-one years from the date when the shop should be fit and ready for occupation by the tenant for the purpose of his business, at a rent of 150l. a year. And it was agreed that the lease should contain a covenant by the tenant (inter alia) "not to carry on upon the premises any other trade or business than that of a dealer in pictures (oil and water colours), prints, engravings, photographs, etchings, and articles of vertu, artistic and heraldic stationer, frame maker and dealer in photographic frames, artists' colours, and the accessories to the said trade or business," and, further, that the lease should contain various covenants on the part of the landlord, including a covenant "not to let any other portion of the said arcade for the trade or business hereinbefore mentioned to be carried on by the tenant."

The shop having been completed, the plaintiff took possession in Oct. 1901, and was still in possession, but no lease had been actually granted pursuant to the agreement.

By an agreement in writing, not under seal, dated the 25th Sept. 1902, made between the defendants Robert and James Thornton (therein-after called "the landlords") of the one part and C. J. Grant, "bookseller and stationer" (therein-after called "the tenant") of the other part, the landlords agreed to let to the tenant, and he agreed to become tenant of, a stall occupying the whole of the front portion of the shop in the arcade known as Nos. 8 and 9, the tenancy to commence on the 1st Oct. 1902, for a year certain, and to continue until determined by either party on three months' notice in writing. And it was agreed that "the tenant shall not make any alteration in or addition to the said stall, nor carry on any business other than that of a librarian, news-agent, bookseller, or stationer, without the previous consent in writing of the landlords."

Grant entered into possession of the stall under this agreement and carried on business there under the name of Charles Grant and Son, and sold articles such as wedding cards and ball programmes, coming within the description of "artistic stationery," picture post cards, photographs, Christmas and New Year cards, "best camel hair brushes," Indian ink, lithographs coloured by hand, and other articles of that natura. It was alleged that other persons to whom the defendant Thornton had let other portions of the shop Nos. 8 and 9 had sold photographic frames and articles of artistic stationery.

The plaintiff alleged that the acts of the defendants Thornton and of their tenant Grant were a breach of the agreement of Oct. 1901 and had caused him considerable damage, and he brought this action against Messrs. Thornton and Charles J. Grant and Son claiming an injunction restraining the defendants Thornton from letting, or allowing to remain let, and Charles J. Grant and Son from using or causing or allowing to be used, the premises numbered 8 and 9 in the arcade, or any part thereof, or any other portion of the arcade, for the purposes, or any of the purposes, of the trade or business described in the tenant's covenant in the agreement of the 30th Oct. 1901, and damages.

By their statement of defence the defendants Thornton alleged that the stall was not let to Grant for any business other than that of a librarian, newsagent, bookseller, or stationer; and that if Grant intended to carry on any other business they had no knowledge of such intention; that the other portions of Nos. 8 and 9 in the arcade were not let for the purpose of carrying on any of the trades or businesses of which the plaintiff complained as being carried on there, and they had no knowledge of any intention to carry on any of such businesses, and they denied that they were in fact carried on.

The defendants Charles J. Grant and Son by their defence denied that they were carrying on at their stall any of the businesses comprised in the covenant in the agreement of the 30th Oct. 1901, and contended that the sale of the articles sold by them as above mentioned constituted a part of the business of a librarian, newsagent, bookseller, or stationer, and was not either an essential or important part of the businesses mentioned in the covenant. In the alternative they contended that, if the sale of such articles was an essential and important part of the businesses mentioned in the covenant, they were not in fact carrying on such businesses.

The action was heard on viva voce evidence, a part of which referred to the question whether Grant or his firm had, at the date of the agreement of the 25th Sept. 1902, notice of the agreement of the 30th Oct. 1901, and of the restrictive covenant therein contained. Upon that point the Vice-Chancellor thought that the fact that a restriction was inserted in Grant's agreement was enough to support a finding that he or his firm knew that the premises in the arcade were subject to a restriction as to the kind of business which might be carried on there. The Vice-Chancellor came to the conclusion that all the defendants had acted in contravention of the covenant in the agreement of the 30th Oct. 1901, and he granted an injunction restraining the defendants Thornton, during the continuance of the plaintiff's tenancy under the agreement of the 30th Oct. 1901, or of any lease to be granted thereunder, from letting any portion of the arcade, other than the portion thereof agreed to be let to the plaintiff, for a trade or business comprising all or any of the trades or businesses mentioned in the tenant's covenant in that agreement. He also granted a similar injunction against the defendants

[CT. OF APP.]

Charles J. Grant and Son, but he suspended the operation of this injunction pending an appeal by them from that judgment. And he granted an inquiry as to what damages had, until that injunction should come into operation, been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the breach, non-performance, or non-observance by the defendants, or any of them, of the above-mentioned covenant on the part of the landlords in the agreement of the 30th Oct. 1901, and an order for payment by all the defendants to the plaintiff of what should be certified to be due in respect of the said damages, the plaintiff's costs to be taxed and paid by the several defendants.

All the defendants appealed.

Neville, K.C. and F. M. Preston for the appellants.—The tenants, the defendants Grant, have not broken the covenant not to let the premises for this particular trade or business, and the plaintiff cannot sue them on a covenant entered into by their lessor. He must look to his lessor for damages. He might have insisted on a provision that none of the property should be used for this purpose, but did not do so:

[STIRLING, L.J. referred to De Matlos v. Moxhay (2 Ph. 774); but it is not admitted that they had any notice of the covenant. The business for which the premises were let to the Grants is distinct from that of the plaintiff, though as to some articles they overlap. They also referred to

P. O. Lawrence, K.C. and R. B. Lawrence for the plaintiff.—The business carried on by the defendants Grant is that of fancy and heraldic stationers, and the landlords have committed a breach of the covenant. Stuart v. Diplock (ubi sup.) is distinguishable, and in Ashby v. Wilson (ubi sup.) the businesses overlapped. There is here a restrictive covenant which touches or concerns the land, and the only defence to an action on that covenant is that the defendant is a purchaser for value without notice having the legal estate; and the onus of establishing that defence is on the person who sets it up. That appears from the observations of Jessel, M.R. in London and South-Western Railway v. Gomm (46 L. T. Rep. 449, 452; 20 Ch. Div. 562, 583) with reference to Tulk v. Moxhay (ubi sup.):

Neville, K.C. in reply.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—This action is in substance brought in consequence of an alleged breach of a clause in an agreement for a lease for twenty-one years at a rent of 150*l.* a year. The clause in the agreement which it is alleged is broken is a covenant on the part of the lessor "not to let any other portion of the said arcade for the trade or business hereinbefore mentioned to be carried on by the tenant." That clause, it will be observed, is a clause against letting; it is not a clause against using. In order to see whether there has been a breach of it, one must ascertain the meaning of the words "for the trade or business hereinbefore mentioned to be carried on by the tenant." The business hereinbefore mentioned is referred to in an antecedent clause providing that the tenant should covenant "not to carry on upon the premises any other trade or business than that of a dealer in pictures (oil and water-colours), prints, engravings, photographs, etchings, and articles of vertu, artistic and heraldic stationer, frame-maker and dealer in photographic frames, artists' colours, and the accessories to the said trade or business." I agree with the learned Vice-Chancellor here that, if one looks at the evidence and considers substantially what business it is which is mentioned in the earlier clause, the evidence shows that there has been a substantial breach of the covenant "not to let any other portion of the arcade for the trade or business hereinbefore mentioned." In order, however, to arrive at this conclusion, one is bound also to look at the letting from year to year to the defendant Grant; but it will be observed that that letting from year to year is a letting which is determinable by the lessor upon three months' notice. The words of that letting are: "The tenant shall not make any alteration in or addition to the said stall, nor carry on any business other than that of a librarian, news-agent, bookseller, or stationer, without the previous consent in writing of the landlords." If one looks at the description of the business in the plaintiff's agreement and asks oneself the question whether the letting to Grant of the premises for the purpose of carrying on the business of a stationer would be a breach of the agreement not to let the other part of the arcade for the purpose of carrying on the business mentioned in the plaintiff's agreement, it seems

CT. OF APP.]

BEIGG v. THORNTON.

[CT. OF APP.]

that if there is no qualification of the word "stationer," or limitation of what may be done under that business, it would be a substantial breach of the agreement. When one has once arrived at that conclusion it seems to me that one has got over the principal difficulty which exists in this case; but assuming that the letting by the Thorntons to Grant is a breach of the Thorntons' agreement with the plaintiff, it still is necessary to deal with what are the remedies of the plaintiff, and, moreover, against whom he has got those remedies. I think that if information had come to the plaintiff while this letting to Grant was threatened or in negotiation, the plaintiff could probably have gone to the court and applied for an injunction not only to restrain the Thorntons from letting to Grant, but to restrain Grant from taking these premises in breach of this covenant; and after the letting to Grant by the Thorntons had become an accomplished fact, in my judgment the plaintiff could have gone to the court and could have asked for a declaration that that letting was a bad letting, and that declaration would have bound both the Thorntons and Grant. But that is not what happened in this case. The plaintiff has not got any such declaration, nor has he got any such injunction as I have suggested. He has been content to leave the letting to Grant an existing fact, and not to impeach it. Such an injunction as he has obtained applies merely to the future dealings with the property, and not to that dealing which consisted of the letting to Grant. It seems to me that under those circumstances the remedy of the plaintiff against Grant is gone altogether. He cannot get, in my judgment, either damages or an injunction against Grant in respect merely of the user by Grant of these premises. What he can get is a remedy for the breach of the covenant as to letting; and, inasmuch as he does not now impeach the letting, it seems to me that his remedy is merely a remedy against the Thorntons, and is merely in damages. No doubt, if there was reason to suppose that there was likely hereafter to be a further letting in the same way in which the Thorntons have let to Grant, there might be an injunction with regard to the future dealing with the property, and indeed the Vice-Chancellor has granted such an injunction; but the primary remedy here in respect of this particular transaction is, in my judgment, that the plaintiff should have damages against the Thorntons for the breach of the covenant not to let; and it seems to me, the letting standing, that no damages in respect of that can be recovered by the plaintiff against Grant. So much for the damages. With a slight modification of wording the direction as to damages can stand. It cannot quite stand, because it will be seen that there is a reference in that direction to an injunction, and, in my judgment, there is no need for an injunction here at all. There is nothing in the facts of this case to lead one to suppose that there will be a repetition of a letting of this sort. In all probability the form which the letting took was a mere slip, and if the parties had been well advised in the transaction the letting might very well have been in such words as would have limited the stationer's business to be carried on by Grant in such a way that it would not, even if there had been an express letting, constitute a breach of the covenant not to let any part of the arcade for the business mentioned in the agreement. Under those circumstances probably no injunction will be necessary. There only need be liberty to apply in case (which is very improbable) any attempt at any such further letting should be made; and we can make a declaration simply that the letting to Grant was a breach of the clause in the agreement by the Thorntons with the plaintiff not to let for the business before-mentioned in that agreement, and then grant an inquiry as to what damages have been sustained by the breach. I only wish to add that the damages will be really larger or smaller according as the Thorntons choose to mitigate them. For all that I can see, they are in a position as between themselves and Grant in which they can do so.

ROMER, L.J.—The parties here certainly raise, to my mind, a very puzzling question; but the conclusion I have come to is that, at any rate, the Thorntons must be held to have committed a breach of their agreement with the plaintiff. The trade or business referred to in the agreement with the plaintiff appears to be one of what I may call an aggregate kind—that is to say, it consists of several heads, which are detailed in the agreement, and amongst those heads I find "artistic and heraldic stationer" and "dealer in photographs." The conclusion that I have come to is that those references to the heads of the trade or business are all references to substantial portions of the trade or business regarded as a whole. One of those portions is that which is referred to in the words "artistic and heraldic stationer," and I cannot come to the conclusion that that was simply a mere accessory to another business—the business of a dealer in pictures—oil and water-colours. To my mind, it was an essential part of the business regarded as a whole, or, at any rate, a substantial portion. When the Thorntons entered into their agreement with Grant they expressly authorised him to carry on the business of a stationer generally. On the evidence it is reasonably clear that a stationer's business comprises more than the business which may be described under the head of "artistic and heraldic stationer"; but I gather that stationers would carry on a business which would include to a practical extent the business, if regarded as a separate business, of artistic and heraldic stationer; and, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the letting by the Thorntons to Grant was a letting to enable Grant to carry on a substantial portion of the trade or business referred to in the agreement with the plaintiff. That being so, it follows that there was a breach of the agreement by the landlords, and there is no doubt that some damages have resulted from that letting. The plaintiff therefore is entitled, I think, to a declaration that the letting to Grant was a breach of the contract with him, and to an inquiry as to damages. For the reasons given by my Lord it is clearly not a case where there was any necessity for an injunction with regard to future letting, but that, I think, shows the extent of the plaintiff's rights. I cannot see that he has established any right to make Grant liable in this action. The agreement by the Thorntons with the plaintiff was only not to let any of the other portions of the arcade for any trade or business referred to in that agreement. Nothing is said as to binding the property in the arcade generally with respect to user. On the face of it, the agreement is restricted to not letting. I suppose that, as was pointed out in Kemp v. Bird (ubi sup.), a somewhat similar case, such a covenant as that would not prevent the landlords themselves from carrying on in the arcade a business of any kind that they chose, or prevent them from selling the arcade and the purchaser from carrying on a similar business. It is clear from Kemp v. Bird that the court ought not, on the ground of presumed intention, to extend a covenant such as this beyond what on the face of it is the purpose of it. As was said by James, L.J. in that case: "Persons who are men of business, as they were here, are able to get protection and advice, and they must make their covenants express, so as to state what they really mean, and they cannot get a court of law or of equity to supply something which they have not stipulated for in order to get a benefit which is supposed to have been intended." That being so, finding here simply a covenant to restrain letting, what are the plaintiff's remedies if letting is purported to be made, or is made? If it is threatened, and it is an improper letting, he can apply for an injunction. It is possible, though we need not go into detail in considering it, that, even after a letting has been effected, if the tenant has notice express or implied (though probably he always would have implied notice), it may be that the plaintiff would be entitled to have the letting declared invalid as against him. That may be so, I need not consider it now; but beyond that his rights do not extend. I find nothing which enables him to say: "There is a letting; I do not apply to set aside that letting; I do not apply to prevent it. It is effective, and it is there, and I am not coming to set it aside; but, assuming that letting is a good letting and stands, I now ask the court to hold that the tenant cannot use the property under his tenancy except subject to a particular limitation." I can find nothing in the agreement with the plaintiff which enables the court to give effect to that, and in that respect I think we are bound by the principle of the decision in Kemp v. Bird (ubi sup.). The plaintiff here does not seek any relief in the way of preventing the letting or the repetition of the letting as against him. On the contrary, he comes here and asks for damages against the Thorntons on the footing that there has been a letting, and no doubt he will seek to establish substantial damages on the very ground that the letting has allowed Grant to carry on the business he is carrying on, and which he cannot be stopped doing—at least, that will be so decided by this appeal. It appears therefore that the plaintiff here has no remedy against Grant. He cannot attack him as being bound by any restrictive covenants affecting the user of the premises during his tenancy; and, of course, he not being a person who has contracted with the plaintiff, Grant cannot be sued for breach of covenant. Under those circumstances there can be no damages, it appears to me, as against Grant, and the action against him ought to have been dismissed with costs.

[CT. OF APP.]

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the Vice-Chancellor as to the construction which he has put upon the clause in the agreement which has been entered into between the Thorntons and the plaintiff, and for the reasons which he has given and which my brothers have given. To those I cannot usefully add anything; but I should like to say one word upon the case as regards Messrs. Grant. As regards them the case is based upon the stipulation in the agreement with the plaintiff that the Thorntons would not let any other portion of the arcade for the purpose of the trade or business mentioned to be carried on by the plaintiff. We are really asked to read that as if it were a stipulation that the Thorntons would not let or use any other portion of the arcade for such a purpose. In my opinion that is not the fair construction of the covenant. I say so for the same reasons as were given by Fry, J. in Kemp v. Bird (ubi sup.) with regard to the covenant in that case—namely, that the covenant as it stands is perfectly intelligible and reasonable. In the second place, the construction contended for by the plaintiff creates a much wider obligation than is imported by the strict words of the covenant. The lessors might, upon my reading of the covenant, either themselves carry on the same business as the plaintiff upon another part of the arcade, or they might have sold part of the arcade for that purpose. That being so, and the covenant being, as it stands, intelligible and reasonable, it does not appear to me that there is any reason for reading it as extending to include not merely the letting, but the user, of the other portions of the arcade. I may point out that if, as I think, that is the true construction of the agreement in this case, the assigns of Messrs. Thornton are bound, and those include a lessee, still the same objection arises, because the only obligation upon such an assign is not to let a portion of the premises, and he is not prohibited from using them. It seems to me, therefore, that the relief which the Vice-Chancellor has granted is not exactly that to which the plaintiff is entitled. It may be that the plaintiff in this case has failed to protect himself to the extent which he desired, but that does not appear to me a sufficient reason for altering what is the plain construction, in my judgment, of the covenant.

Company—Winding-up—Proof of debt—Amendment—Solicitor—Lien—Omission to value security—"Inadvertence"—Companies Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), sched. 1, clause 8.

The solicitor of a company in liquidation had a claim against it for costs, and claimed a lien for them on certain documents in his possession. He sent in a proof for the costs in the winding-up, stating he held no security for the debt, and voted at a meeting of the creditors in respect of the whole debt.

He afterwards acted for the liquidator in completing the sale of the company's property, and on completion received the purchase money and handed over the title deeds to the purchaser, without any express bargain with the liquidator that he should retain the benefit of the lien. He then claimed to retain the debt out of the purchase money, and applied for liberty to amend the proof by stating the security and the estimated value of it, or, in the alternative, to withdraw the proof and rely on the security for payment.

It appeared that the proof was made out by a clerk who was unaware of the existence of the lien, and that the solicitor, being told by the clerk that the proof was in order, signed and swore it, the statement in it that he held no security for the debt having escaped his attention.

Held, that under the circumstances leave ought not to be given to amend or withdraw the proof, as, even if "inadvertence" was proved, in the interval between the carrying in of the proof and the application for leave to amend the position of all parties, and of the liquidator in particular, had been altered.

Decision of Buckley, J. reversed.

The statement by Williams, I.J. in Ex parte Clarke (67 L. T. Rep. 232, 233) as to what constitutes "inadvertence" adhered to.

On the 5th Aug. 1902 an order was made for the compulsory winding-up of a company called the Safety Explosives Limited. At that date a large sum was due from the company to their solicitors, Messrs. Cox and Lafone. Cox and Lafone then had in their possession the title deeds of the freehold and leasehold properties of the company, some letters patent and certain documents conferring patent rights on the company, and a policy of insurance which had been assigned to the company, and on these documents they had a lien in respect of the costs due to them from the company.

A proof for the debt claimed by Cox and Lafone, showing the sum of 809*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.* was due to them, was sworn by G. Cox, one of the partners, and the proof stated the firm were unsecured creditors. Afterwards one of their clerks, as their proxy, voted at a meeting of creditors on the footing that they were unsecured creditors for the whole amount.

In Dec. 1902 the official liquidator sold by tender the whole of the company's property, consisting of freeholds, leaseholds, patent rights, machinery, plant, stock-in-trade, and the policy of insurance, for 3600*l.*, and Cox and Lafone acted as the liquidator's solicitors in the matter. The sale was completed on the 4th Feb. 1903, and Cox and Lafone handed over to the purchaser the title deeds and other documents on which they had a lien, and the purchase money was handed to them. They claimed to retain out of this sum the above-mentioned sum of 809*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.*, and 15*l.* 0*s.* 4*d.*, the costs due to them by the liquidator in the winding-up, and sent him a cheque for the balance. There was no express bargain between Cox and Lafone and the liquidator that they should retain the benefit of their lien though they handed over the deeds, nor did they inform him that they claimed the same right to payment as if they had retained possession of the deeds.

The liquidator contended that they had waived their lien, and had had no right to make the deduc-tion from the purchase money; and on the 21st May 1903 Cox and Lafone took out a summons under clause 8 of the first schedule to the Companies Winding-up Act 1890 asking for leave, at their own expense, to amend their proof by inserting therein the particulars of their security and the value at which they estimated it; or, in the alternative, to withdraw their proof and rely on their security for payment of their debt due to them by the company. In support of this summons G. Cox made an affidavit in which he said that when a form of proof of the debt was sent to him by the liquidator he handed it to one of his clerks named Moore, with instructions to do what was necessary, but did not inform him that the firm had the title deeds and other documents of the company in their possession; that Moore afterwards placed before him the form of proof filled in and also a general form of proxy; that he inquired of Moore whether the proof and proxy were in order, and that, on being assured by him that they were, he swore the proof and signed the proxy and gave them to Moore. He continued:

In so doing I had the most perfect confidence that the documents had been correctly and carefully prepared in every detail. No question of security for the said debt was mentioned to me by Moore, and it entirely escaped my attention when I signed and swore the said proof that as prepared it purported to state that my firm held no security for the debt due to my firm by the company. Neither I nor my partner ever had the slightest intention of surrendering or abandoning the lien to which my firm was entitled on the company's deeds and documents in my firm's possession. We were not aware until some months afterwards that the said proof had been sworn in such terms as to make it appear that we did not hold the said security, and, as appears from the correspondence hereinafter referred to, my firm continued to act in all respects on the footing and assumption that it still held the said lien and security.

One of the letters in the correspondence there referred to was from the liquidator to Cox and Lafone, dated the 2nd Jan. 1903, in which he stated that the insurance company had given him notice that a bonus was due on the policy of insurance, and requested Cox and Lafone to let him have certain of the papers that he might post them on to the insurance company. In reply to this letter Cox and Lafone wrote on the 5th Jan.: "We have now looked up the documents mentioned in your letter of the 2nd inst. Having regard to the fact that we look to our lien on those and the other documents as security for our debt, we suggest that the better plan will be for us to register the two assignments with" the insurance company.

Moore made an affidavit stating that at the time when he prepared the proof he was quite unaware that his principals had the title deeds and other documents of the company in their possession and were entitled to a lien on them, and he assumed that the debt was unsecured; and he confirmed the account given by G. Cox of what took place between them. G. Cox made a further affidavit in which he said that at the commencement of the liquidation a loss to creditors was not anticipated, and the official receiver stated at the meetings, and it was expected, that the company's assets would be more than sufficient for payment of the creditors in full. However, when the assets were realised, it appeared that they were insufficient.

Buckley J. held inadvertence had been proved, and made the order asked by the summons.

Clause 8 of sched. 1 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act 1890 provides:

For the purpose of voting, a secured creditor shall, unless he surrenders his security, state in his proof the particulars of his security, the date when it was given, and the value at which he assesses it, and shall be entitled to vote only in respect of the balance (if any) due to him, after deducting the value of his security. If he votes in respect of his whole debt he shall be deemed to have surrendered his security, unless the court on application is satisfied that the omission to value the security has arisen from inadvertence.

The liquidator appealed.

Herbert Reed, K.C. and E. O. Simpson for the appellant.—The order of Buckley J. was wrong. The solicitors have parted with the documents, and have therefore lost their lien. The appellants have not proved "inadvertence" with regard to the proof. Negligence is not inadvertence. The order asked for, if made, would, under the circumstances, be illusory, and the court will therefore not make it:

Re Henry Lister and Co. Limited, 67 L. T. Rep. 180; (1892) 2 Ch. 417, 420.

The position of the parties has been altered, and therefore no order should be made:

Re Newton, (1896) 2 Q. B. 403, 406.

Gore-Browne, K.C. and Muir Mackenzie for the solicitors.—The meaning of "inadvertence" was explained by Williams, J. in Ex parte Clarke (67 L. T. Rep. 232; affirmed on appeal, p. 465). There he said (p. 233): "In my opinion the meaning of the rule is that the creditor who has voted and has omitted to value his security ought always to be allowed to withdraw his proof and to be relieved from being deemed to have surrendered his security unless he has elected really to abandon his security; that is, unless he has omitted to do that which he did omit, deliberately and on purpose. If it has been done accidentally, he ought, on such terms as the court may think fit to impose, to be relieved from the loss of his security." There was inadvertence here, and therefore there was no surrender of the security:

Re Piers, 78 L. T. Rep. 314; (1898) 1 Q. B. 627.

If the amendment of the proof is allowed, it will only allow the lien to be set up, and will not affect any question which the liquidator can raise with reference to it. It is not sufficient for the liquidator to show that he acted in a manner consistent with the proof; he must show that he altered his position in reliance on there being no lien. [WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Re Hawkes, 78 L. T. Rep. 336; (1898) 2 Ch. 1, 16.]

WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment this appeal ought to be allowed, and an order ought not to be made allowing these gentlemen to amend or withdraw their proof. I must not be understood to say that they could not withdraw their proof for the purpose of correcting an inaccurate statement in it. I do not suppose the liquidator would have any objection at all to their doing so with that object. But in my judgment they ought not now to be allowed to withdraw their proof for the purpose of relying on their lien. It is admitted that they wish to amend their proof for the very purpose of justifying their retention of the 809*l.* by virtue of their lien; and it is also an admitted part of the case that there was not any express bargain made between the liquidator and the appellants that they should retain the benefit of their lien. Now, what have we to do in a case like this? We have first to apply clause 8 of the first schedule to the Companies (Winding-up) Act 1890. [His Lordship then read that clause, and continued:] I do not desire in the slightest degree to depart from what I said in Ex parte Clarke; Re Burr (ubi sup.) as to what constitutes "inadvertence." I mentioned there, amongst things which could not constitute "inadvertence," a case where the creditor, feeling the dangers and disadvantages of valuing his security, elects not to amend. That is not this case; but I have been left by the affidavit of Mr. Cox in a most uncertain frame of mind as to what were the circumstances under which he failed to mention his security in his proof. [His Lordship then referred to the affidavit stated above, and continued:] I can only say that it is quite consistent with the statement that he was unaware that the proof purported to state that his firm had no security for the debt, and that he remembered at that moment the fact that his firm had security. Now, if he remembered that his firm had security, he might well have been quite unaware of the statement in the proof that he had none, and yet have been of opinion that it was not worth while to trouble about the security as the estate was likely to yield 20*s.* in the pound; and that, if necessary, there would be time enough afterwards to amend the proof and state the security and its value. There is nothing in the affidavit which excludes that state of mind on the part of Mr. Cox. Now, if that was his state of mind, it would not be true to say that he omitted to state the security in the proof by "inadvertence" within the meaning of clause 8. Now, Buckley J. arrived at the conclusion that this proof omitted to state the security, and of course to value it, by inadvertence; but the attention of Buckley J. does not seem to have been called to the fact that the statement in the affidavit is open to the comment that I have made upon it. Besides, the later affidavit of Mr. Cox, although he does not mention the state of the assets as the reason for omitting to value his security, does show conclusively that this frame of mind continued down to the time of his swearing that proof; that is to say, he continued to take the view that 20*s.* in the pound would be obtained. I do not think that Mr. Cox, by that affidavit, satisfies the onus that was clearly on him of showing that the statement as to the security was omitted by inadvertence. I will now deal with the case upon the assumption that the proper view to take of Mr. Cox's affidavit is that it was omitted by inadvertence. But if it is, what is the state of things? A debt is due to solicitors from their client, the company, and they are relying upon a lien which has arisen during the time they were retained by the company, not by the liquidator. In the course of this liquidation it became necessary to realise the assets of the company, and Cox and Lafone were acting for the liquidator in the matter of this realisation of the assets. They put in a proof which negatived their having any lien for their debt, and they allowed their client to invite tenders for the sale of the assets, including portions of the property of which the firm hold the title deeds. They allowed their client to do that without in the slightest degree warning him that, when he came to realise that part of the property of which the firm held the title deeds, there would be a difficulty in carrying out the entirety of the contract unless 20s. in the pound was paid to them in respect of their bill of costs. I can only say that such conduct by the solicitors was perfectly consistent with the proof that had been put in on behalf of the firm—a proof which was, of course, within the knowledge of the liquidator. After these tenders had been sent out a letter is written by the liquidator on the 2nd Jan. to Cox and Lafone, which runs thus: [His Lordship read that letter and the answer of the 5th Jan., and continued:] Now, in that letter of the 5th Jan. there is an allegation by Cox and Lafone of their lien, although the actual exercise of it is limited to that policy of insurance. As a matter of fact that policy was included in the property which was ultimately sold, although not apparently in terms. The letter did not in any way refer either to the proof or to the lien, so as to make it appear that the latter would in any way interfere with the carrying out of the contract. It is suggested that it is impossible that the liquidator in that state of things, after the receipt of that letter, could have acted upon the assumption that the proof as put in was in accordance with the facts and in accordance with the position taken up by Cox and Lafone. I do not agree. I can well conceive the liquidator receiving that letter without in the slightest degree realising that such a lien was claimed by these gentlemen as would interfere with the carrying out of the contract for the sale. It seems to me that these solicitors were actuated all the way through by a confident feeling that 20s. in the pound would be paid, and under those circumstances they did not call the attention of the liquidator to the fact that they were insisting upon this lien which would stand in the way of the completion of the sale. Now, the sale took place and the deeds were handed over by the solicitors to the purchasers. The obvious duty of the solicitors, if they meant to rely upon this lien, was, before they handed over the deeds, to call the attention of the liquidator to the lien, and ask him whether he had any objection to their retaining the benefit of their lien notwithstanding that the deeds were handed over to the purchaser. But nothing of that sort took place. In that state of things the sale went through, and the deeds were handed to the purchaser. The solicitors now come to us asking for leave to amend or withdraw their proof. I think that leave ought not to be given, because the solicitors' object in amending the proof is to set up a state of things which is inconsistent with their own proof that was on the file at the time of the carrying through of this sale, and is inconsistent also with their own action at the time of the sale. Counsel for the solicitors did not deny the proposition that the amendment of a proof ought not to be allowed if the position of the parties has been altered after that proof has been put upon the file, and while it remains there, if the liquidator has altered his position on the basis of that proof; but a distinction was drawn, and it was said it was not sufficient to show that the solicitors or the liquidator, as the case may be, has acted in a manner which is consistent with the proof as it then stood, but it must be shown that he so acted because that proof was on the file. I do not agree with that. It seems to me if one man allows a state of things to continue, and another acts in a way which can be supported if that state of things exists, but could not be supported unless that state of things did exist, that you ought not to allow the person who acts in that way to be prejudiced by altering a state of things which existed at the time when he so acted. It seems to me it would be wrong to throw upon the liquidator the obligation of showing that he relied upon the proof. Whether the proof was or was not actually present to his mind, he was dealing with the property on the basis that these solicitors had no lien. I think it is plain the liquidator did deal with the property upon the basis that there was no lien at all upon it. I think the whole conduct of the solicitors, apart from the letter of the 5th Jan., was such as to induce him to suppose that there was no lien which the solicitors could enforce which could stand in the way of the completion of the sale and purchase; and I think that under those circumstances we ought not to allow the solicitors now to amend the proof. Therefore, in my opinion, this appeal should be allowed: first, on the ground that Mr. Cox has not satisfied the onus which was upon him of showing this proof was sworn by inadvertence. I have no doubt it was sworn by inadvertence, so far as Mr. Cox was aware that it stated there was no security; but I am not satisfied that Mr. Cox had not present to his mind that his firm had that security. Secondly, I am of opinion that amendment ought not to be allowed in a case where the liquidator has acted in a way which was consistent with the facts mentioned in the proof, but which would be inconsistent with the suggestion that a lien existed which is now sought to be made. I think, under the circumstances, leave to amend ought not to be given, and that the appeal should be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point to be considered is whether the court is satisfied that the omission to state and value the security claimed by the solicitors took place by inadvertence. Now, for the reasons which have been given by my learned brother, the evidence appears to me, as it does to him, to be very unsatisfactory; but I am not prepared to say that inadvertence has not been made out, though I agree with my Lord's criticisms of the affidavit. I prefer to rest my decision on the ground that the granting of leave to amend or to withdraw a proof is not a matter of right, but is subject to the control of the court, and ought not to be given in a case where, in the interval between the date when the proof is carried in and the application for leave to amend it, the position of all parties, and of the liquidator in particular, has been altered. Now, what took place here was this. The creditors in the present case are solicitors, and they had been solicitors to the company which is being wound-up, and had due to them costs to the amount of over 800l. in respect of their services, which were provable in the winding-up. They had in their office certain deeds and documents belonging to the company, and the liquidator appointed in the winding-up appointed them his solicitors, and amongst other things upon which they were called upon to advise the liquidator was the sale of the property of the company. The property consisted of a patent; freeholds and leaseholds on which were plant and machinery, fixed and movable; and, lastly, stock-in-trade. Now, that being the state of things, the solicitors had a lien on the documents belonging to the company for the debt due to them by the company. I cannot help thinking there has been some misapprehension by the parties as to the nature of the solicitors' right. It seems to have been imagined that the lien on the documents gave the solicitors a charge or security on the property to which the documents related; but I need not say that is an entire misapprehension. The solicitors' lien simply entitled them to retain those documents in their hands until they received payment of what was due to them as solicitors. Now, that being so, the solicitors advised the liquidator with reference to this sale, and it seems to me it was their duty to tell the liquidator plainly what rights they had in respect of these documents. They ought to have told him, "You have to sell this property, but you must remember we cannot complete this sale without payment of our costs, and we will not part with the deeds unless and until we are paid all that is due to us from the company." Then the liquidator would have been in a position to consider what he should do, and it would have been a most important thing for him to consider how he should sell the property. The patents, for example, which, as I understand, were in the possession of the solicitors, would undoubtedly affect the title to some of the assets of the company. The title of the leaseholds, again, would be affected by the lease. As regards the fixed plant, the machinery and stock-in-trade, that would be entirely unaffected. Now, that question has arisen, not only on the sale of estates, but in the winding-up of companies; and usually either an arrangement is made as between the solicitor and the trustee or liquidator by which the deeds are parted with, or, if the parties are unable to come to arrangements between themselves, the matter must be brought before the court. In some cases it might be that the sale could go on practically without the title deeds being produced at all, and the liquidator would simply obtain an order authorising him to put the property up for sale with conditions such as would dispense with the necessity of handing over to the purchaser the deeds to which the purchaser would otherwise be entitled. That is all. It sometimes happens a sale is allowed to go on on condition that a certain amount of the purchase money shall be set aside to meet the claims of the solicitor, but that is a matter of arrangement between the parties themselves, or an arrangement made under the direction of the court. It is admitted that no arrangement of any kind has been made in the present case. The whole of the company's property was put up for sale, both that to which the title deeds related and that to which they did not. The sale took place and was completed, and the solicitors handed over the deeds to the purchaser without any condition, and, having done that, they seek to retain the amount for which they had a lien out of the purchase money; and they ask the court to assist them in making good their claim, and allow them to withdraw or amend their proof. I think under the circumstances they should not be allowed to do so, and the appeal will be allowed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I omitted to say that I agree with Mr. Reed's argument that an order giving leave to amend or withdraw the proof would, under the circumstances, be illusory.

BAILY v. BRITISH EQUITABLE ASSURANCE COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Company—Alteration of regulations—Assurance company constituted by deed of settlement—Policy participating in profits—Registration under Companies Acts—Power of company to alter rights of policy-holder—Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 50, 209—Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 62), s. 1.

An insurance company was constituted in 1854 by a deed of settlement providing that the profits were to be divided in manner directed by the by-laws, and that any provisions of the deed and any by-law might be altered by a by-law.

In 1854 by-laws were made which provided that profits arising from the participating branch should be divided among the policy-holders in that department.

In 1886 the plaintiff effected a policy on his own life in the participating branch, relying on the statement in a prospectus of the company that the entire profits in the mutual department were divided among the policy-holders without any deduction for a reserve fund; and he paid a higher premium in consequence under a table given in the prospectus which was to assure a sum payable at death, "with profits in addition."

The policy contained a covenant by the company to pay the sum assured "and all such other sums (if any) as the company by their directors may have ordered to be added to such amount by way of bonus or otherwise, according to their practice for the time being."

Profits were not otherwise expressly mentioned.

The company was afterwards registered under sect. 209 of the Companies Act 1862, and it was now proposed under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act 1890 to substitute a memorandum and articles of association for the deed of settlement, by which the directors would be empowered to appropriate 5 per cent. of all the profits (including those arising from the mutual department) to form a reserve fund.

Held, that there was a contract between the plaintiff and the company which the company could not alter either by a by-law, special resolution, or articles of association; that the word "practice" in the policy could not have so wide a meaning as to justify an alteration of the rights of, or the diversion of any part of the profits from, the participating policy-holders.

Decision of Kekewich J. affirmed.

The rights of a shareholder in respect of his shares.

(a) Reported by W. C. BIAS Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

except so far as they may be protected by the memorandum of association, are by statute made liable to alteration by special resolution, but the case of a contract between an outsider and the company is entirely different, and even a shareholder must be regarded as an outsider in so far as he contracts with the company otherwise than in respect of his shares.

Punt v. Symons and Co. Limited (89 L. T. Rep. 525, 528; (1903) 2 Ch. 506, 514) not followed on that point.

Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa (82 L. T. Rep. 210; (1900) 1 Ch. 656) distinguished.

THIS action was brought by a participating policy-holder in the defendant company, on behalf of himself and all other the participating policy-holders, claiming a declaration that the company was not entitled to pay, apply, or dispose of any profits arising from the mutual and participating branch of its business, either in the formation of a reserve fund, or to shareholders, or otherwise than by distributing the same amongst the holders of participating policies, or in accordance with the company's by-laws of 1854; and an injunction to restrain the company from paying or applying any such profits contrary to such declaration.

The defendant company was constituted under the Joint Stock Companies Registration Act 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 119) by a deed of settlement dated the 15th July 1854 for the purpose of carrying on the business of a life and fire assurance company and of an annuity endowment reversionary interest and loan association, and was afterwards duly registered under the provisions of sect. 209 of the Companies Act 1862 as an unlimited company.

By clause 9 the profits were to be ascertained and divided in a manner to be directed by a by-law or by-laws. By clause 24 power was given to the company by extraordinary general meeting to make by-laws. Clause 56 provided that any provisions of the deed of settlement and any bye-law might be altered, repealed, or suspended by a by-law or by-laws, but not otherwise.

The company made by-laws from time to time, and those passed in 1854 contained the following provisions:

(2) That in the beginning of January and July in each year a calculation shall be made of interest upon the amount paid up in respect of each share in the company at the rate of 7½ per cent. per annum up to the next preceding 31st day of December and the 30th day of June respectively, and such interest shall at some time in the months of January and July, to be fixed by the directors for that purpose, be payable to the holders of the shares out of the profits of the company only at the company's chief offices for the time being, but every shareholder shall be entitled to receive interest only from the time of the actual payment of the amount so paid up, notwithstanding the payment by any shareholder of interest for the time any call was in arrear. (3) That in the month of January in the year 1858 and in every subsequent third year a general valuation and calculation shall be made of the whole assets and liabilities of the company, and, after carrying forward such portions (if any) of the expenses of establishing the company as the directors shall consider equitable, the net profits of the company's business shall be ascertained by the actuary under the direction of the board of directors. (4) That in the month of January in the respective years last aforesaid a calculation shall be made by the actuary of the profits that have arisen in the departments of business in which the assured are to be entitled to participate in profits, and in such calculation a fair proportion of the interest hereinbefore directed to be paid and of the other expenses of the company shall be charged upon such last-mentioned departments, and the profits so ascertained to have arisen from the said last-mentioned departments of business shall be set apart and divided amongst the policy-holders in such departments by the actuary under the superintendence of the directors, and the remainder of the profits of the company shall be divided amongst the shareholders according to the amount of shares held by each, and be paid to them along with the next half-yearly dividend.

By the by-laws of 1893, a quinquennial valuation and ascertainment of profits and a like quinquennial division of profits between policy-holders were substituted for the triennial valuation ascertainment and division of profits prescribed by the by-laws of 1854. From 1862 until after the date of the plaintiff's policies the company issued prospectuses inviting the public to become policy-holders in the company upon the terms therein stated. These prospectuses contained (inter alia) the following statements:

The British Equitable Assurance Company affords the public advantages unattainable elsewhere.

Mutual Life Insurance Department.—In ordinary mutual societies the public sustain the following disadvantages, which are here avoided: (1) Each assurer in such societies is personally liable for the entire engagements of the society; (2) the policy-holder in such societies loses a large portion of his profits to form a reserve fund, which is in fact so much property taken from his family and put into the pockets of foreign parties; (3) The frequent alterations of the constitution of such societies involve considerable risk to the policy-holders. In the British Equitable Assurance Company these defects are avoided. (1) Complete security is given to every policy-holder absolutely without responsibility; (2) the current expenses of working the company are assessed rateably on the premiums received in the mutual life assurance department and the general premiums and the entire profits made by the company in the mutual department, after deducting the expenses, are divided among the policy-holders without any deduction for a reserve fund. The policy-holders are thus placed in as good a position the moment they enter the company as if they had been ten years in most other societies. The profits are divided every three years.

In Jan. 1886 the plaintiff, having seen a prospectus of the company and relying on these statements, applied for and obtained two participating policies on his own life for 400*l.* and 350*l.* respectively, dated 30th Jan. 1886, and he had since paid all the premiums necessary for keeping the policies on foot. By these two policies the company covenanted with the plaintiff, after the expiration of one calendar month after satisfactory proof of his death, to pay to his executors or administrators the respective sums of 400*l.* and 350*l.*, "and all such other sums (if any) as the said company by their directors may have ordered to be added to such amount by way of bonus or otherwise, according to their practice for the time being." These policies were in the common form then used by the company in like cases.

The statements above mentioned were printed on the back of the form of proposal which the plaintiff signed and formed the basis of his application. The proposal was to insure under table A, which gave the "annual" premiums to assure a sum of money at death, with profits in addition; and at the foot was, "The entire profits divided triennially."

On the 4th July 1903 the company was registered as a limited company under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1900, with a memorandum and articles of association in the place of the deed of settlement. The memorandum and articles had been approved by special resolutions of the company, and a petition for the approval of the court under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 62) was pending.

The plaintiff alleged that the effect of the proposed articles would be to alter the existing system of profit sharing by the plaintiff and other participating policy-holders, and to deprive them to some extent of the rights theretofore enjoyed by them; that the purport of the proposed articles was that 5 per cent. of the profits of the company's business, including the profits arising from the departments of business in which the assured were entitled to participate in profits, would be set aside to form a reserve fund, until such fund amounted to 37,500*l.*; that a fixed annual dividend of 2*s.* 6*d.* per share should be paid to the shareholders out of the profits of the company, and there should be carried to the credit of the shareholders' profit account a bonus equal to 5 per cent. of the divisible profits of the life assurance branch of the company's business; and that subject thereto, unless and until otherwise determined by the company in general meeting, the divisible profits of the whole of the company's business should be carried to the credit of the life assurance branch, and to such fund thereof as the directors should determine; that this scheme, if carried into effect, would deprive the participating policy-holders of 10 per cent. until the proposed reserve fund so to be formed amounted to 37,500*l.*, and after that of 5 per cent. of the profits which under the former scheme would have been paid to them, and would enable the directors to divert the whole or any part of the profits to some other fund; and that the proposed scheme was contrary to the terms upon which the plaintiff and other participating shareholders effected their assurances with the company, and to the statements contained in the prospectus, and was a breach of the contract contained in and forming the basis of the policies.

By the statement of defence the company alleged that the plaintiff had knowledge or notice of the constitution and of the rules and regulations of the company, which included power from time to time to make alterations and amendments thereof by means of by-laws; and that the proposed alteration in the method of distributing the profits was a fair, honest, and businesslike modification thereof, carried out in a manner permitted by the constitution of the company, and that the policy-holders would be very largely benefited by it.

Kekewich, J. expressed an opinion that the company were acting in good faith, but he held that the representation in the prospectus must be regarded as part of the contract with the policy-holders, and in his Lordship's opinion there was a contract with the participating policy-holders that there should be no reserve fund, but that the whole of the profits arising from the mutual department, less certain deductions for working expenses, should be divisible among the policy-holders, and he made a declaration that the company ought to continue to distribute the entire profits accordingly.

The company appealed.

It was agreed between the parties that the question upon which the decision of the court was desired was whether, having regard to the contractual relations between the company and the participating policy-holders, the company was at liberty to alter the provisions of by-law 4 of the by-laws of 1854 in such a manner as to alter the rights of those policy-holders to profits under the by-law.

Warrington, K.C. and Whinney for the appellant company.—The contract is to be found in the policy, and that contract is to pay the amount assured and such other sums as the directors may have ordered to be added "according to their practice for the time being." The words "for the time being" show that it was contemplated that this practice might differ from time to time, and therefore the proposed alteration will not be a breach of contract. Under the deed of settlement there was power to alter the by-laws from time to time. The contract contained in the policy is not affected by the statements in the prospectus. There is nothing which binds the company not to create a reserve fund. The policy, which is the contract between the parties, is not silent on the subject; therefore the prospectus cannot be treated as a collateral agreement. Erskine v. Adeane (29 L. T. Rep. 234; L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 756) was a different case. There a lease was executed on the faith of a separate agreement. The company can only contract in a particular way—that is, under seal—and the policy is the only document under seal. If the appellant is right, the policies could be varied by informal transactions entered into before they were granted. The deed of settlement authorises the directors to grant policies—not to make special agreements with various policy-holders:

Pipe v. City and Suburban Permanent Building Society, 68 L. T. Rep. 846; (1893) 2 Ch. 311;

Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, 82 L. T. Rep. 210; (1900) 1 Ch. 656;

Punt v. Symons and Co. Limited, 89 L. T. Rep. 525; (1903) 2 Ch. 506.

It does not follow that the formation of a reserve fund will decrease the profits; it may well be that they will be increased by the increase of the number of policies.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C. and Gatey for the plaintiff.—The company may have a power to make some alterations in the provisions of the deed of settlement, but they have no power to create a reserve fund by taking some of the profits from the participating policy-holders. They now propose to do what in the prospectus they pointed out is the vice of other companies. The respondent made his proposal for a policy under table A of the company's tables, and has paid a higher premium to secure those benefits. Neither of the cases cited apply here, as in this case the policy was applied for on the faith of the prospectus. If no profit was earned, the directors, of course, would not order any sum to be added, nor probably would they if, according to actuarial calculations, there would be no profit. The word "practice" cannot be construed so widely as to permit the company to do what is proposed. If there are any profits in this branch the participating policy-holders are entitled to have them. The court will not allow the company to break the contract they have made. In the cases referred to, the companies had been incorporated under the Companies Acts, and there was power to alter the articles of association under sect. 50 of the Act of 1862. But in this case there is a deed of settlement, and there is no statutory right to alter the rights of the participating shareholders in the way proposed :

Kearns v. Leaf, 1 H. & M. 681.

Warrington in reply.—This company was registered under sect. 209 of the Companies Act 1862, and under sect. 196 the deed of settlement is to be deemed to contain the conditions and regulations of the company in the same manner and with the same incidents as if they were contained in a memorandum and articles of association; and sect. 50 gives any company within the Act power to alter the articles by a special resolution. The company therefore has power by special resolution to alter any provisions in the deed of settlement and any by-law, and the plaintiff is seeking to prevent the company from exercising its statutory power :

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 10.—COZENS-HARDY, L.J. read the judgment of the court as follows :—This is an appeal from the judgment of Kekewich, J., who has in effect held that the profits attributable to the participating policy branch of the company's business, after certain undisputed deductions, ought to continue to be paid to the holders of participating policies, and ought not to be applied to the creation of a reserve fund or for any other purpose. The defendant company was originally constituted under a deed of settlement in 1854. By clause 9 the profits were to be ascertained and divided in manner directed by a by-law or by-laws. And by clause 56 any provisions of the deed of settlement and any by-law might be altered, repealed, or suspended by a by-law. By-laws were duly passed by the company in 1854. [His Lordship read the by-laws 2, 3, and 4 of 1854, above stated, and continued :] These by-laws, so far as material for the present purpose, were in force in 1886, when the plaintiff effected two policies in the mutual or participating branch of the defendant company. It is admitted that the plaintiff relied upon the statements contained in a prospectus issued by the company, in which the special advantages of the mutual or participating policies are set forth in emphatic language—e.g., Whereas in ordinary mutual societies the policy-holder loses a large portion of his profits to form a reserve fund, the entire profits in the defendants' mutual department are divided among the policy-holders, without any deduction for a reserve fund. The proposal, which was not before Kekewich, J., but which has been admitted in evidence before us, shows that it was for a sum "payable at death under table A." This language is intelligible by reference to the prospectus, which prints table A with the following words at its head : "Annual premiums to assure a sum of money at death with profits in addition," and the following words at its foot : "The entire profits divided triennially." The premium payable in respect of a participating policy is, of course, higher than in respect of a non-participating policy. One of the questions in the proposal, applicable only to policies in the mutual department, was as follows : "XI.—Are any profits which may be declared to be appropriated by way of addition to the policy, or reduction from the future premiums, or making the policy payable during lifetime?" To which the plaintiff answered : "By way of addition." This proposal was accepted by the company. The actual policy as issued contained a covenant by the company to pay the full sum assured, "and all such other sums (if any) as the said company by their directors may have ordered to be added to such amount by way of bonus or otherwise, according to their practice for the time being." The indorsed conditions mention the deed of settlement and the by-laws and the documents addressed to the company, which would include the proposal; but the words I have read are the only words in the policy itself expressly mentioning profits. It has been agreed that the only question upon which our judgment is desired is this—whether, having regard to the contractual relations between the company and the participating policy-holders, the company are at liberty to alter the provisions of by-law 4 of 1854 in such a manner as to alter the rights of those policy-holders to profits. This being so, it is not necessary to consider whether, apart from such agreement or admission, there would be any real difficulty in so far connecting the plaintiff's policy with the by-laws and with the prospectus as to identify it with the participating policy described in the prospectus. It must be assumed, therefore, that by-law No. 4 was originally applicable to this policy. Now, under this by-law it is for the directors, with the assistance of the actuary, to ascertain what (if any) are the profits of the participating branch, but the amount so ascertained "shall be set apart and divided amongst the policy-holders" in that department. The directors have no power under the by-law to apply any portion of those ascertained profits to the formation of a reserve fund or to the relief of the shareholders. It is, however, contended that as the company was registered under sect. 209 of the Companies Act 1862, it thereby acquired power by special resolution to alter all or any of the provisions of the deed of settlement, not being in the nature of a memorandum of association, and all or any of the by-laws, and that the plaintiff is seeking to restrain the company from altering by-law No. 4 in exercise of this statutory power. And it is said that, apart from the statute, the deed of settlement itself contained a power to alter the by-law, of which power the plaintiff had notice. I cannot assent to this argument. As between the members of a company and the company, no doubt this proposition is to some extent true. The rights of a shareholder in respect of his shares, except so far as they may be protected by the memorandum of association, are by statute made liable to be altered by special resolution : (see Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, ubi sup.). But the case of a contract between an outsider and the company is entirely different, and even a shareholder must be regarded as an outsider in so far as he contracts with the company otherwise than in respect of his shares. It would be dangerous to hold that in a contract of loan or a contract of service or a contract of insurance validly entered into by a company there is any greater power of variation of the rights and liabilities of the parties than would exist if, instead of the company, the contracting party had been an individual. A company cannot, by altering its articles, justify a breach of contract. But it is further contended that by the terms of the policy the company are only bound to pay such profits as the directors, "according to their practice for the time being," may order to be added, and that the directors may regulate their practice by reference to a special resolution creating a reserve fund. This argument really involves the proposition that it is competent to the directors to change a participating policy into a non-participating policy. The word "practice" cannot have such a wide meaning. It cannot justify an alteration of rights or the diversion of any part of the profits from the participating policy-holders. In the present case there was a contract for value between the plaintiff and the company relating to the future profits of a particular branch of the company's business, and the company ought not to be allowed, by special resolution or otherwise, to break that contract. The appeal must be dismissed.

Re CHAPMAN; PERKINS v. CHAPMAN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Will—Forfeiture clause—"Shall thenceforth cease and determine"—Alienation or bankruptcy—Marriage within certain degree of kindred, or without consent of trustees—Marriage between date of will and death of testator.

A testator declared that certain benefits given by the will to his sons and daughters should "thenceforth cease and determine" on alienation or bankruptcy, or if they married within a certain degree of kindred, and as to his daughters without the written consent of his trustees.

Between the date of the will and the death of the testator a daughter married within that degree.

Held (Cozens-Hardy, L.J. dissenting), that there was sufficient in the context of the will to show that the testator intended the provision as to forfeiture to apply only to marriages which took place after his death.

Decision of Kekewich, J. reversed.

Per Williams and Stirling, L.JJ.: The decision in Metcalfe v. Metcalfe (65 L. T. Rep. 426; (1891) 3 Ch. 1), in which it was held that a forfeiture clause took effect in the case of bankruptcy or alienation between the date of the will and the testator's death, applies only to the particular acts of forfeiture there considered.

(a) Reported by W. C. Biss, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

EDWARD CHAPMAN by his will, dated the 24th March 1881, after making certain specific and pecuniary bequests, devised and bequeathed all his real and residuary personal estate to trustees upon trust to sell and convert the same, and to invest the net residue of the proceeds thereof, and to stand possessed of the said investments upon trust to apply the income thereof as therein directed until the date fixed by him for distribution. And he directed that at the date of distribution the investments and accumulations of income of his trust estate should be divided into as many equal shares as the number of his sons and daughters present and future (other than one daughter, whom he mentioned), who either died before the date of distribution leaving a child or children living at the date of distribution, or were living at the date of distribution, one such share to be allotted in respect of each such son and daughter, the share to be allotted in respect of each son and daughter dying before the date of distribution leaving a child or children living at that date to be in trust for such child or children as therein mentioned, and the share to be allotted in respect of each son living at the date of distribution to be in trust for such son absolutely, and the share to be allotted in respect of each daughter living at that date to be upon trust as to the income for the daughter for life without power of anticipation, and after her death to be upon trust for her children and remoter issue, and her brothers and sisters and their issue (other than the daughter before excluded), as she should appoint, and in default of appointment upon trust for her children or child as therein mentioned, with a gift over on the failure of the vesting of any share. And he declared—

That if any son or daughter of mine shall do or suffer any act whether by way of alienation, charge, or otherwise and including any act under any statutes of bankruptcy or for the relief of insolvent debtors for the time being by reason or means whereof any part or share of him or her in any income or capital of my said estate to or of which he or she shall not have already become entitled in possession or be for the time being actually entitled to the receipt shall or but for this present clause would become wholly or in part vested in or payable to any other person or persons, or if he or she shall contract any marriage forbidden by me as hereinafter expressed, then and in any such case his or her share, right, title, and interest of, in, and to my said trust estate and the income thereof shall thenceforth cease and determine, and my said trust estate shall thenceforth go and be held in such manner as the same would have been held if he or she had died before me without leaving any child or children living at my death. And I declare that the marriages forbidden by me are in the case of son or daughter marriage with a person of any degree of kindred unless more remote than third cousin and also in the case of a daughter marriage contracted without the previous written consent of the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will, or if more than two of a majority of them.

On the 9th Nov. 1886 the appellant, one of the testator's daughters, married her first cousin.

The testator died on the 23rd Dec. 1902 without altering his will.

A summons was taken out by the daughter against the trustees of the will to have it declared whether or not she had by her marriage forfeited her share and interest in the testator's trust estate.

[CT. OF APP.]

Re CHAPMAN; PERKINS v. CHAPMAN.

[CT. OF APP.]

The summons was heard by Kekewich J., who held that the case was within Metcalf v. Metcalf (65 L. T. Rep. 426; (1891) 3 Ch. 1), and the plaintiff, having married within the prohibited degree, had forfeited her share and interest in the testator's estate, and also that of her children.

The plaintiff appealed.

Upjohn, K.C. and E. Clayton for the appellant.—The whole will shows that the testator only intended this forfeiture to take place in the event of a marriage within the prohibited degree taking place after his death. In Metcalf v. Metcalf (65 L. T. Rep. 426; (1891) 3 Ch. 1) it was held that a forfeiture took place in the event of bankruptcy between the date of the will and the death of the testator, unless it had been annulled at the date of his death. The court there gave what Bowen L.J. called a non-natural meaning to this clause in order to give effect to what they considered the intention of the testator. But that rule ought not to be extended to a case like this. The clause should be interpreted differently here, where it refers to marriage, which is such a different thing to bankruptcy. The same words have been interpreted differently with regard to different subject-matters:

Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 663, 667.

Here the husband might have died or the marriage might have been dissolved between the date of the will and the testator's death. The appellant could not be aware of this provision until after the death of the testator, and if the testator had intended that the clause should apply to this marriage he could have said so expressly in his will.

Levett, K.C. and Iselin for the respondents.—A will speaks from the death of the testator as to property only, and not as to other things:

Wills Act 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 24;

Bullock v. Bennett, 7 DeG. M. & G. 283, 285.

The will shows the testator intended that if any daughter at any time married within the prohibited degree, a forfeiture should take place. A testator using the word "shall" means from the date of the will, not after his death. If a child had become bankrupt after the date of the will, and the bankruptcy had not been annulled at the date of the testator's death, that child's interest under the will would have been forfeited:

Trappes v. Meredith, 26 L. T. Rep. 5; L. Rep. 7 Ch. App. 248;

Ancona v. Waddell, 40 L. T. Rep. 31; 10 Ch. Div. 157;

Metcalf v. Metcalf (ubi sup.).

The provision as to forfeiture both on bankruptcy and on a prohibited marriage is contained in one clause, and should be construed in the same manner as regards both of them.

W. A. Russell for the widow.

Upjohn, K.C. in reply.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question which we have to determine in this case is really from what date this will speaks quā the forfeiture clause. It was decided in Bullock v. Bennett (ubi sup.) that sect. 24 of the Wills Act 1837 has no application except so far as a will is speaking as to property; and everyone would agree, therefore, that in this case no argument can be founded upon that section, and we are left in the same position as we should have been in before the Wills Act. Now, I go a step further than the decision in Bullock v. Bennett. There was an old rule before the Wills Act as to the time from which a will should speak with regard to personalty—namely, that it should speak from the death—I say again, as was decided in Bullock v. Bennett with regard to sect. 24 of the Wills Act 1837, that rule only applied to the property. Therefore we have to look at the will and see from what date it speaks. I rather feel that the true proposition is that where you have got the date of a will, either on the will or, possibly ascertained by evidence, when a testator uses words of futurity, prima facie those words should be read as speaking from the date of his making his will and not from the date of his death. It may be a strong presumption; but if there is a presumption one way or the other, I think that that is the more likely presumption. But I do not think that matters. We are entitled, and bound, to take this will and look at it and construe its clauses and see from what date the testator intended the words of futurity in this particular clause of this particular will to speak, and it seems to me that we have ample here to show that this testator intended that these acts of forfeiture to which he refers should be acts of forfeiture occurring after his death. I need not go through all the clauses again. We have heard very cogent arguments about them; but, speaking shortly, the two instances of user of words (there are a great many more than two) in this particular clause indicating that the testator intended that the acts of forfeiture should be acts of forfeiture after his death which struck me most as I heard them read were the words, "then and in any such case his or her share, right, title, and interest of, in, and to my said trust estate and the income thereof shall thenceforth cease and determine"; and the other words are the words relating to the consent of the trustees. Here we have one forfeiture clause, and I think that there is amply sufficient here to show that the testator meant that the acts of forfeiture should be acts taking place after his death. Now, if that is so, there is an end of the case, because, when one arrives at that construction, the necessary result has been determined. But I want to say a word or two about the cases. We have had our attention called to Re Metcalf; Metcalf v. Metcalf. That is a case decided in the Court of Appeal by Lindley, Bowen, and Fry, L.J.J. Lindley, L.J. begins his judgment by saying: "The first question on the appeal is whether the language of this forfeiture clause has any application to a bankruptcy which took place before the death of the testator. If we only look at the words of the clause, there would seem to be a difficulty in construing it so as to include a bankruptcy commencing before the testator's death—that is, before the will came into operation." In my judgment, what Lindley, L.J. means there is, that if you take in that case the words of the will, the words are such as to lead you to the conclusion that the testator intended the acts of forfeiture to be acts occurring after his death, and you find in the will in that case various things pointing to this intention of the testator, some of them resembling very much things which we find in this will. Take, for example, the provision that "my said trustees or trustee" (that means the trustees or trustee of that will) "shall upon such act or default, or upon such operation of law as aforesaid, pay or apply." Having come to that conclusion, then the court proceeded to ask themselves whether the decision in Trappes v. Meredith (ubi sup.) applied—a decision which I understand to be one relating exclusively to the particular act of forfeiture constituted by alienation or by an act of bankruptcy; and they held that, notwithstanding the date from which the will was intended to speak, they were bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Trappes v. Meredith, overruling James, V.C., to hold that, at whatever time that particular act of forfeiture took place, whether antecedently to the date from which the forfeiture clause was to speak or subsequently to it, it was an act of forfeiture which would have deprived the legatee of the benefit of the estate. I do not think that that decision ought to be applied to anything else but that particular act of forfeiture. I think myself that if that particular court had had to deal with this case, they would, as far as I can judge from their judgments, have arrived at the same conclusion that I have arrived at. The result, in my opinion, is—first, that this will refers to marriages which occur after the death of the testator, as being the marriages upon which the forfeiture is to take place; and, secondly, I think that there is nothing in Re Metcalfe; Metcalfe v. Metcalfe (ubi sup.) which applies to such a case as this. I think the decision in that case applies only to the particular act of forfeiture with which the court had to deal there. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, but I confess that I have felt very great difficulty in dealing with the case. In this case the testator, having conferred benefits on his children, sons and daughters, has introduced a forfeiture clause, upon which the whole question turns, and the acts which are to occasion forfeiture are of two classes. Now, if there were no authority bearing on the question, I should have said that the language of the gift over with reference to the share, right, title, and interest "thenceforth," which means from the occurrence of any such event as mentioned in the prior part of the clause, "shall thenceforth cease and determine and my said trust estate shall thenceforth go and be held in such manner as the same would have been held," would be strong to show that the testator was referring to the occurrence of such event after his death; but it appears to me that, as regards acts of alienation, including bankruptcy, it is not open to me to come to that conclusion. In Re Metcalfe; Metcalfe v. Metcalfe (ubi sup.), there was equally strong language which seemed to point to and deal with acts of forfeiture occurring after the testator's death; yet it was the view of the Court of Appeal—it may be a view taken reluctantly—that the forfeiture clause applied to acts done in the lifetime of the testator. Therefore it appears to me that, with reference to that portion of the forfeiture clause, I am not at liberty to say that the events there contemplated were merely events occurring after the death of the testator. What is the ground of the decision in that case and in the cases which preceded it? It appears to me that the ground of decision is that a somewhat unnatural construction must be put on the language of the will "in order to give effect," as Lindley, L.J. put it, "in such cases to the obvious intention of the testator, which is to secure the personal enjoyment by the legatee of the property left by the will." I have now to turn to the other class of cases in which the testator prescribes that a forfeiture shall take place, that is "in case any son or daughter" shall contract any marriage "forbidden by me as hereinafter expressed" in the will. What are the events—the marriages which are forbidden? The testator says, "And I declare that the marriages forbidden by me are in the case of son or daughter marriage with a person of any degree of kindred unless more remote than third cousin, and also in the case of a daughter marriage contracted without the previous written consent of the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will, or if more than two a majority of them." It is said that we ought to follow the decisions with reference to the bankruptcy cases; and that it is as obvious on the face of the will that the intention of the testator was that a child contracting a forbidden marriage should be deprived of the benefits which were otherwise intended for that child, as that it was his intention that the child should enjoy personally the property given by the will. I think not. The testator provides not merely for the contracting of marriage within a certain degree, but also, in the case of a daughter, a marriage contracted without the previous written consent of the trustees. It is said that it would be an extraordinary result in this case that a son or daughter who, in the lifetime of the testator, contracted a marriage within the prescribed degree of kindred should not forfeit the benefit under his will; while a child who, after the death of the testator, did so would forfeit. That is a forcible observation, but it seems to me another observation which may be made, which has no less force, is this, that a daughter who, in the lifetime of the testator, contracted a marriage without his consent would, upon the terms of this will, not forfeit any benefit, while a daughter who contracted such a marriage after his death, without the written sanction of the trustees, would forfeit. Looking at this peculiarity in the clause, I see no sufficient reason why, in construing the will, so far as it relates to forfeiture in the event of marriage, we should not follow the language of the will as expressed; and therefore I think that the daughter who did marry in the lifetime of the testator within the forbidden degree is entitled to share.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—Although I have the misfortune to differ from my Lord, and from Stirling, L.J., as to the way this appeal should be decided, I entirely agree as to the principles which ought to be applied. Prima facie a will speaks from the date of its execution, except as to the property comprised in it; but there may be sufficient context in a particular case to show that this rule is not applicable. It is a matter of construction whether a particular clause is intended to speak and operate from the death, and not from the date of the execution of the will. My doubt is simply whether there is on this particular will sufficient context to justify such a conclusion. The clause has been read before, and I will not read it again; I will only say this that it is one forfeiture clause, and it strikes me that it would be a strange result if it were held that as to part it is retrospective, and as to part it is not. We are asked to read the clause as though it were "If any son or daughter becomes bankrupt after the date of this my will, or marries a first cousin after the date of my death, then there shall be a forfeiture." I cannot accept that view. Being bound, as we are, to hold that a bankruptcy or alienation after the date of the will would bring the forfeiture clause into operation, it seems to me that we ought to arrive at the same result in the case of a marriage after the date of the will and before the testator's death. If, therefore, it rested with me, I should be disposed to say that the view of Kekewich J. was correct.

WERNER MOTORS LIMITED v. A. W. GAMAGE LIMITED.

WERNER MOTORS LIMITED v. A. W. GAMAGE LIMITED. (a)

Design—Registration—Infringement—Patent and registered design for same invention—Second registered design similar to previous design—Marking goods—Registration of design not known to infringer—Injunction—Damages—Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 47, 51, 58, 59, 60, 61.

The plaintiffs registered a design for improvements in motor cycles between the time when they applied for and the time when they obtained letters patent for a similar invention. Subsequently they registered a new design, which in fact was similar to the originally registered design, and sold machines marked with the second registration number only. The fact of the registration was unknown to the defendants prior to the issue of the writ in an action against them for infringement, but they sold some machines after the writ was issued, and on an application for an interim injunction they offered to keep an account.

Held, that a patent and a registered design for the same invention might co-exist, the rights conferred did not clash, and the registration was valid; that the first registration was not forfeited; and that want of knowledge was not a reason why an injunction should not be granted, but that it protected the defendants from payment of damages in respect of sales effected by them before writ.

THE plaintiff company were the registered proprietors of a design, No. 383,283, for motor bicycles, being goods comprised in class 1.

In Aug. 1902 they brought this action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from applying for the purpose of sale to motor cycles the plaintiffs' registered design, or any fraudulent or obvious imitation thereof.

It appeared that on the 18th Nov. 1901 the plaintiffs' original design had been registered in this country in the name of Michel Werner and Eugene Werner.

On the 8th Nov. 1901 one A. F. Spooner, as agent for Michel and Eugene Werner, applied for and eventually obtained letters patent for improvements in frames for motor cycles alleged to be identical with their design.

In Nov. 1902, after this action was brought, the plaintiffs registered a new design, which was very similar to their original design. It was alleged that since that date they had sold motor bicycles marked with the new registration number only.

The defendants by their defence denied infringement; alleged want of novelty in plaintiffs' design; said they had not applied the plaintiffs' design to any cycles "knowing that the same had been so applied without the consent of the registered proprietor"; and contended that, by registering the design as well as taking out the patent, the plaintiffs had committed a fraud on the Crown, and that the registration was invalid.

The action was tried with witnesses. The result of the evidence is sufficiently stated in the judgment.

A. J. Walter and Kerly for the plaintiffs.

T. Terrell, K.C. and J. C. Graham for the defendants.—This action is for infringement of a registered design. The defendants did not know that the design had been registered. Knowledge need not be proved in the case of a patent, but under the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act 1883, ss. 58, 59, such evidence is indispensable where the action is for infringement of a design. The court will not grant an injunction where there was no knowledge of the registration of the design before the writ was issued. Anything that has happened since the issue of the writ is immaterial.

Jan v. Grossman, 12 Rep. Pat. Cas. 537.

The registration itself was bad. The Statute of Monopolies reserves to the Crown only the right to grant a monopoly to the first and true inventor. Here the plaintiffs had a patent for the same invention as their registered design before they registered the latter. They were proprietors of both under the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act 1883, ss. 47, 60, 61. The fact that both grants were made to the same person makes no difference, for he might assign them to two different people, and two people cannot have monopolies of the same thing. After the plaintiffs registered their new design they ought to have put both numbers on the cycles they sold. They also referred to:

Le May v. Welch, 51 L. T. Rep. 867; 28 Ch. Div. 24;

Hecla Foundry Company v. Walker, Hunter, and Co., 61 L. T. Rep. 738; 14 App. Cas. 550.

A. J. Walter in reply.—The defendants knew of our registration when they were served with the writ, even if they did not know before. At the hearing of the motion they agreed to keep an account, which implies an intention to go on selling these machines. There is no question of prior grant; design is a question of copyright, and the Statute of Monopolies has nothing to do with it. The Act does not say that you cannot have a patent and a registered design for the same article.

CHAN. DIV.]

WEENER MOTORS LIMITED v. A. W. GAMAGE LIMITED.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Dec. 21.—BYRNE, J. read the following judgment.—The plaintiffs are the registered proprietors of a design for motor bicycles, being goods comprised in class 1. They sue for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling motor cycles to which such design, or any obvious imitation thereof, has been applied, and for damages. The defendants deny infringement, and raise other defences, grounded on want of novelty; denial of knowledge of application of the design without the consent of the registered proprietors; and fraud on the Crown, a previous application for a patent for improvements in frames for bicycles, which frames are identical with the design, having been made ten days before the registration of the design, and letters patent subsequently granted dating back to the date of application. I am satisfied that the design registered was new and original. It represents the frame of a motor bicycle, having the strengthening tube placed a good deal lower than usual, joining two tubes, called on the lettered reproduction of the registered design used at the trial (a) and (b), by means of junction pieces, the front join being a good way down tube (a). There is also a continuation of of tubes (a) and (b) downwards so as to leave an open space between, filled and joined only by the motor, by means of two bolts; the front tube (a) being bifurcated and passing outside the motor case, the back one with stays, not bifurcated, the bearings of the pedal crank axle being shown situate at the commencement of the lower back stay, at a place before it bifurcates. A comparison of this drawing with the drawing of Chapelle's frame relied on shows that the latter differs essentially. It represents the strengthening tube in the usual position, and it represents a crank axle in front of, not behind, the engine. In the representation of a motor cycle in the picture of Baine's machine in the Autocar—a very badly blurred impression, not, I think, much relied on—there is no cross stay shown as in the plaintiffs' design. It was, in fact, admitted that the design of this machine is quite different from the registered design, but it was said that it showed a similar fastening of motor to rods. I cannot say that I am persuaded that even this is the case. On the other hand, I am clearly of opinion that the design of the machines sold by the defendants as shown in their drawing is, with the exception of small and immaterial details, identical with the registered design. In fact the two drawings are different drawings of the same machine. Next, as to the point raised that the defendants had no knowledge that the design was registered, I come to the conclusion, though not without a natural doubt, inspired by a knowledge of the keenness with which advertisements are examined by those whose duty it is to see and and look at the literature connected with the trade, that I must accept the evidence given on behalf of the defendants, with the result that the fact of registration was unknown to those persons connected with the defendant company, whose duty it was to watch and know about what was doing in the trade in motor cycles prior to the issue of the writ in the action. It is not the fault of the plaintiffs that the defendants did not know, but, treating the case upon the footing that notice of registration has not been brought home to the defendant company, what is the result? Only that the plaintiffs are not entitled to damages in respect of sales effected before writ. The relevant sections of the Act are sects. 58 and 59. The defendants have not themselves applied the design, and their acts, so far as penalty or damages are concerned, appear to be protected up to the date of the service of the writ. This, however, will not protect them against an injunction unless they can bring themselves within the exception from the general rule mentioned in Proctor v. Bayley (61 L. T. Rep. 752; 42 Ch. Div. 390). That was a case having reference to infringement of a patent, and Cotton, L.J. says: "Where a patent is infringed, the patentee has a prima facie case for an injunction, for it is to be presumed that an infringer intends to go on infringing, and that the patentee has a right to an injunction to prevent his doing so. Again, if there has not been any infringement, but an intention to infringe has been shown, an injunction will be granted." He then goes on to deal with the facts of the particular case and comes to the conclusion that the plaintiff was not justified in believing that the defendants intended to continue the infringement, and consequently an injunction was refused. The facts of that case were very special. There was a single and isolated act of user nearly five years before action, and the use of the machines had then been abandoned, because the defendants had found them unserviceable. The defendants, in their pleadings admitted the validity of the patent, and expressly pleaded that they never threatened or intended, and did not threaten or intend, to use any apparatus infringing the plaintiff's patent. The facts in the present case differ entirely. The defendants put in an affidavit on the interlocutory application for an injunction, strongly opposing an injunction on the ground of delay in bringing the action and offering to keep an account. So far from saying they did not mean to repeat the acts, they in effect claimed the right to repeat them if they kept an account, so that justice might be done at the trial should they prove to be wrong in selling more. They have defended attacking the validity of the design, and they have since action offered to sell though stipulating that they could give no indemnity. Four machines have also been sold since the writ, and I have no doubt at all but that the defendants were threatening and intending, at and after the date of the service of the writ, to sell machines to which the registered design had been applied. If on service of the writ they had written and said that they had been in ignorance of the registration and that they did not mean to sell any more machines, or if on the motion they had offered an undertaking not to sell more, the matter would have stood on an entirely different footing. The plaintiffs had every right to suppose when they issued the writ that the defendants must know of the registered design, and want of knowledge was not raised on the motion as a defence. In Aug. 1902, as I have said, the writ was issued, and in Nov. 1902 the plaintiffs registered a new design which in fact was similar to the originally registered design, except as to a matter of 2in. in some detail, as it was put by one of the witnesses. I am not sure that I yet appreciate the argument put forward. A man sues in respect of infringement of his design, and he, subsequently to action, registers another, and if I understand the point it is suggested that subsequent sale by him of things according to the new design without having both registration numbers upon them has occasioned a forfeiture of his right to relief. I cannot follow the reasoning I could understand the second registration being invalid because it was in truth a second registration of the original design, but this is not the argument. Sect. 51 has reference to delivery on sale, and I have no sort of evidence that before delivery on sale any article was not caused to be duly marked. The remaining point in the case is whether or not there has been a fraud upon the Crown, because, having registered a design under statute, the Crown has been induced to grant a patent for a machine the grant dating back to a period before the registration of design. There appear to me to be several answers to this. In the first place the grant from the Crown was not made until after the statutory title was created, although when made it dated back to an earlier date prior to publication; in the second place it is not a question between grant and subsequent grant from the Crown; and in the third place there is nothing inconsistent between a grant for a patent and a coincident right and existence of a statutory right to design. The object of and privilege conferred by letters patent are wholly different from the object of and privileges conferred by statute to a design by registration. They may be co-existent and the rights conferred do not clash. The patent rights may be infringed notwithstanding design, and design may be infringed though patent rights may not be touched. A design may be copied exactly without a patent for the subject being infringed, and a patent may be easily infringed without touching rights to a design. The two rights are separate and distinct in title as well as in substance, and though, no doubt, any attempt to bolster up an invalid patent, or to get the advantage of an equivalent to patent rights by the utilisation of the right to register a design, would be jealously watched, the rights may and do fairly co-exist. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction in the terms of their claim, with costs.

ST. JAMES' AND PALL MALL ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY LIMITED v. THE KING. (a)

Statutory powers—"Damage sustained by reason or in consequence of the exercise of such powers"

—Compensation—Negligence—Burden of proof

—Telegraph Act 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 112), ss. 6, 7—Telegraph Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 110), s. 2.

Where a public body was empowered by statute to carry out certain works and it was provided in the same statute that compensation should be paid to any person sustaining damages by reason or in consequence of the exercise of such powers, it was held that if the public body relied on the negligence of its agents or contractors as relieving it from all liability under the statute, it must discharge the onus of proving such negligence.

(a) Reported by H. C. GARRIA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

PETITION OF RIGHT.

The Postmaster-General is empowered under the Telegraph Acts 1863 and 1868 to place and maintain telegraph wires under any street or public road, and for that purpose he may open or break up any necessary streets.

In Jan. 1902 the Postmaster-General arranged to have certain cables laid down in King-street, St. James', in connection with the Post Office telephone system.

On the 3rd Jan. 1902 the workmen of the contractors, Messrs. Reid Brothers, were engaged in breaking up the footway and making a trench when one of the workmen drove a pick into a 2in. iron water pipe laid under the footpath. The trench immediately filled with water, and the culvert belonging to the suppliant company, which had also been exposed in digging the trench, was flooded. This culvert contained a bare copper conductor, and a serious short circuit resulted. The dynamo magnets at the two stations of the company were discharged, and the supply stopped from 2.45 p.m. to 3.15 p.m. Besides this, the particular section of the main had to be replaced.

The suppliant company by a letter dated the 21st Jan. 1902 claimed compensation for this.

The letter was addressed by the company's general manager and secretary to the Superintending Engineer, Post Office Telegraphs, and was, so far as is now material, couched in the following terms:

On the 3rd inst. at one o'clock in the afternoon your contractors, Messrs. Reid Bros., broke a 2in. cast iron water pipe in the footway of King-street, near the St. James' Theatre, by their carelessness. . . . There can be no excuse for the breakage of such a pipe in the footway . . . and I am advised that my company has a right to full compensation at the hands of your department.

After some intervening correspondence an answer was written on the 31st Jan. 1902 in the following terms:

In further reference to your letter of the 21st Jan. I have to inform you that your complaint has been inquired into, and I find that the damage complained of was done by the department's contractors. . . .

Only one other letter need be referred to. This was a letter dated the 5th May 1902 written by the general manager and secretary of the suppliant company in which the following passage occurs:

. . . I would point out that this occurrence took place at the commencement of January, and must request a prompt settlement of this claim for damages caused by reckless carelessness on the part of Messrs. Reid. Their operations in the London streets have been of a nature to fully justify the strongest protest on the part of ourselves and other parties possessing valuable property underneath the streets.

As the suppliant company was unable to obtain satisfaction of its claim for compensation, a formal notice requiring the amount of its claim to be assessed by a jury in accordance with sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and as provided by sect. 7 of the Telegraph Act 1863, was served upon the Postmaster-General. Accordingly the Postmaster-General issued a warrant to the High Bailiff of Westminster, dated the 24th July 1902, requiring him to summon a common jury to assess the amount of the damage sustained by the company. Such warrant was issued under protest by the Postmaster-General, who entirely denied that he was liable.

An inquisition was subsequently held on the 13th Aug. 1902, and the damages assessed at 145l. 19s. 6d.

As the Postmaster-General still denied that he was liable, and refused to pay such sum, this petition of right seeking to recover this sum from the Crown was delivered on the 16th March 1903.

The petition was duly indorsed "Let right be done," and the matter now came before the court for hearing.

By the Telegraph Act 1863:

Sect. 6. Subject to the restrictions and provisions hereinafter contained the company may execute works as follows: (1) They may place and maintain a telegraph under any street or public road, and may alter or remove the same; (3) they may, for the purposes aforesaid, open or break up any street or public road, and alter the position thereunder of any pipe (not being a main) for the supply of water or gas . . .

Sect. 7. In the exercise of the powers given by the last foregoing section the company shall do as little damage as may be, and shall make full compensation to all bodies and persons interested for all damage sustained by them by reason or in consequence of the exercise of such powers, the amount and application of such compensation to be determined in manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 . . .

By the Telegraph Act 1868:

Sect. 2. The Telegraph Act 1863 shall be incorporated with this Act, except so far as the same, or any part thereof, may be expressly varied, altered, or be inconsistent with this Act; and the term "the company" in the Telegraph Act 1863 shall, in addition to the meaning assigned to it in that Act, mean the Postmaster-General.

Cripps, K.C. and R. J. Parker (Llewelyn Davies with them) for the suppliant company.—On the facts we are clearly entitled to succeed. The only defence pleaded by the respondent is "that the matters complained of in the petition of right do not constitute damage within the meaning of sect. 7 of the Telegraph Act 1863." Now, this section, after saying that as little damage as possible is to be done in the exercise of the powers in sect. 6, provides that "full compensation to all bodies and persons interested for all damage sustained by them by reason or in consequence of the exercise of such powers" shall be made. The only possible defence, therefore, appears to be that the damage was not inflicted in the exercise of the powers, but through negligence. Negligence, however, has not been specially pleaded, and it is doubtful whether the defence could be rightly raised without such a plea. Apart from any such objection, we submit that, where work is being done in exercise of statutory powers it is immaterial whether there be negligence or not. For negligence to be a good defence, there must have been such negligence that what was done was outside or in excess of the statutory powers:

President and Councillors and Ratepayers of Colac v. Summerfield, 68 L. T. Rep. 769; (1893) A. C. 187, 191;

Hornby v. Liverpool United Gaslight Company, (1883) 47 J. P. 231;

Uttley v. Todmorden Local Board, 31 L. T. Rep. 445.

Clavell Salter, K.C. and J. H. Harris for the Crown.—The onus of proof that the damage was effected in exercise of statutory powers granted to the Postmaster-General lies with the plaintiff. This is clearly shown by Brierley Hill Local Board v. Pearsall, 51 L. T. Rep. 577; 9 App. Cas. 595.

In that case Lord Fitzgerald says, at p. 603; "In establishing his case plaintiff had to sustain four propositions." The second of these propositions is: "That such damages had been occasioned by reason of the exercise by the local authority of the powers of the Act." The suppliant company suggests that we have to prove that there was such negligence that the acts complained of must have been acts in excess of the statutory powers, the above-mentioned case shows this is not so; on the contrary, it is for the suppliant company to show that the acts of which it complains were done in exercise of such powers. In our view, therefore, it is questionable whether the suppliant company has shown any claim in law against the Postmaster-General. Even if we were wrong as to this, the reference to negligence contained in the suppliant company's letters amount to admission by it that the damage was inflicted through the negligence of the Post Office contractors; if this be so, the claim for compensation must be bad in law. Compensation is given by a statute, to provide a remedy where, apart from the statute, none would exist. Where there has been negligence, an action for tort can be brought at common law, and therefore no right to compensation exists. This is clear from the cases. The company has mistaken its remedy, and this action must fail. They then referred to the following cases in support of their argument, which is not here set forth in detail, as the point was not dealt with in the judgment:

Broadbent v. Imperial Gas Light Company, 26 L. J. 276, Ch.;

Re Penny and South-Eastern Railway Company, 26 L. J. 225, Q. B.;

New River Company v. Johnson, 29 L. J. 93, M. C.

Lawrence v. Great Northern Railway Company, 20 L. J. 293, Q. B.;

Clothier v. Webster, 6 L. T. Rep. 461; 31 L. J. 316, C. P.;

Clowes v. Staffordshire Potteries Waterworks Company, 27 L. T. Rep. 298, 521; L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 125;

Biscoe v. Great Eastern Railway Company, L. Rep. 16 Eq. 636;

Hall v. Mayor of Batley, 37 L. T. Rep. 710.

R. J. Parker in reply.—These allegations of negligence in the correspondence are not admissions; they are mere allegations in aggravation of damages which the suppliant company now disavows. Are we to be tied down to these statements when the respondent will not on his side allege negligence? Then it is said that it is for us to prove that the damage was effected in the exercise of the statutory powers. This, in effect, is asking us to prove that there was no negligence. The burden of proving a negative cannot be laid on the suppliant company, it is for the respondent to prove negligence if he relies on it. Here it has never been pleaded.

FARWELL, J.—This is a petition of right in which the St. James and Pall Mall Electric Light Company are the suppliants, and they allege that the Postmaster-General in the course of laying down certain telegraph wires has caused damage for which they claim compensation. The question turns on the construction of the 6th and 7th clauses of the Telegraph Act of 1863, which, by the amending Act of 1868, extend to the Postmaster-General. The material section in sect. 7. [His Lordship then read the section referred to.] In pursuance of the powers contained in the 6th section the Postmaster-General proceeded to break up King-street, St. James'. Now, the first matter to which I always address myself when I try a case is to ascertain the facts, and make a finding for my own guidance. I must confess that the parties have put me in a very considerable difficulty in the present case. I do not consider it is any part of the function of the court to deliver pronouncements on law at large, but to adjudicate on facts proved or admitted. Now, the only facts are those I can obtain from the pleadings, correspondence, and proceedings before the high bailiff and jury. These I have to deal with as best I can in order to ascertain the facts. I rather protest that it is not part of the duty of the court to pick out the facts in this sort of way; they ought to be proved or found. On the facts, however, as I find them, I get this. I have the letter of the 31st Jan. from the Post Office authorities in which there is the following statement: "I have to inform you that your complaint has been inquired into, and I find that the damage complained of was done by the department's contractors." This is an admission made on behalf of the Postmaster-General which is accepted by the suppliants. The correspondence is also referred to by the Postmaster-General's counsel as containing allegations that the damage was caused by the negligence of the contractors' workmen, but these allegations are not admitted and accepted by him; and therefore I cannot regard those statements that are disavowed now by the suppliants, and are not adopted by the Postmaster-General, as facts for any sort of purpose before the court. The only fact that I have got on such materials as the parties have thought fit to place before me, is this statement contained in this letter of the 31st Jan., that the damage complained of was done by the department's contractors. Now, it was done by their contractors in the course of opening up King-street. Mr. Clavell Salter, to whom I am extremely indebted for most interesting argument, referred me to the case of Brierley Hill Local Board v. Pearsall (51 L. T. Rep. 577; 9 App. Cas. 595), in which Lord Fitzgerald, dealing with a case of this sort, says, at p. 603 (he is referring to the Public Health Act which, for the purposes of this action, is practically the same as the section in the Telegraph Act): "Looking at the case as wholly governed by sect. 308 of the Public Health Act, it seems to me to be clear that it was open to the respondent (the plaintiff) to pursue the course of having the fact of damage and the amount of compensation settled in the first instance by arbitration." That has been done in the present case. The jury have found the damage and assessed the amount of compensation. Then Lord Fitzgerald proceeds: "In establishing his case under that section, the plaintiff had to sustain four propositions—viz., first, that he had sustained damage; secondly, that such damage had been occasioned by reason of the exercise by the local authority of the powers of the Act; thirdly, that such damage arose in relation to some matter as to which he was not himself in default; and fourthly, the amount of compensation to which he was properly entitled. Any dispute as to the propositions 1 and 4 is to be settled by arbitration. The fact of damage comes first in the section, and is the foundation of all the rest." Propositions 1 and 4 have been dealt with by the jury in the present case. The second—namely, that such damage has been occasioned by reason of the exercise of the powers of the Act—appears to me to be involved in the petition of right, the letter that I have read and the proceedings also before the arbitrator. Now, the point that has been argued before me is that the damage was really occasioned by the negligent exercise of the powers of the Act. It is not said that there was anything ultra vires; neither side suggest this, but the suggestion of the Postmaster-General is that the contractors' workmen in carrying out the powers of the Act acted negligently, and I have heard a very interesting argument and many cases cited to establish the proposition that for a negligent exercise of statutory powers a common law right of action subsists, and that when a common law right of action subsists the provision for compensation does not apply. In the view that I take, it is unnecessary for me to express any opinion as to how far that proposition can be driven. I think the question before me turns on the onus of proof. In cases of this class it is obvious that the onus of proof practically goes to the root of the matter. When the local authority or the Postmaster-General, as the case may be, breaks up a street, the persons who are likely to be injured cannot or certainly do not keep a watchman on the watch to see whether anything is going to happen so that they may have evidence available as to how or by reason of whose negligence injury has been caused. The fact of damage is the only thing which is within their knowledge, and of this the onus of proof lies on them. The negative, no negligence, is not for them to prove. The burden of proving a negative is never on the plaintiff. If the fact of negligence is set up and relied upon by the defendant, or the respondent as the case may be, the onus is on him to prove that negligence affirmatively. This is, to my mind, most material because it is obvious that the respondent might very well escape liability altogether, if he could say to the person claiming compensation, "You have got to prove the fact that there was no negligence," and to the same person bringing a common law action, "You have got to prove the fact that there was negligence." The result, it seems to me, would be most unsatisfactory; but as I take the view, that when it is intended to set up negligence to that which is otherwise a prima facie case for compensation, the onus of proving that negligence or at least of alleging it (so that it may be used as an admission in subsequent proceedings) lies on the respondent, no practical difficulty arises in the present case. I am not concerned with the numerous cases which have been cited, for negligence has never been put in issue by the respondent in such a way that I need consider it. The result, therefore, is that the suppliants succeed, and the respondent must pay the amount of compensation found by the high bailiff and jury, together with the costs of this action including the costs of the high bailiff's inquisition.

EAST LONDON RAILWAY COMPANY v. CONSERVATORS OF THE RIVER THAMES. (a)

Evidence—Expert's reports—Facts not within living memory—Admissibility.

Where an engineer's reports are within the common knowledge of engineers and accepted by them as accurate, they constitute evidence which the court will accept as to facts not within living memory.

THE plaintiffs were the leasees and owners of the Thames Tunnel, which was built under a private Act of 1824, the short title of which is the Thames Tunnel Act 1824.

By the East London Railway Act 1865 this tunnel, which had originally been built for passenger traffic, was adapted for use as a railway to form a connecting link between various railways on the Surrey and Middlesex sides of the river respectively.

This tunnel is built entirely of brick, and has a covering of soil of which the minimum depth is rather over 13ft.

In 1880 the defendants, the Conservators of the River Thames, had proposed to dredge the river bed adjacent to and over the tunnel to a considerable depth; but that scheme was abandoned upon the representations of the East London Railway Company, as that company alleged that the removal of soil from above the tunnel would seriously endanger it.

Prior to Dec. 1903, however, numerous traders represented to the conservators the desirability of a deep channel up to London Bridge, which would enable merchant ships of large tonnage to enter that part of the river at all states of the tide.

In consequence the conservators entered into a contract in Dec. 1902 for the dredging of the upper pool so as to make a channel of the width of 210ft. and of the depth of 35ft. below Trinity high-water mark. The contractors were, however, only to dredge to within 50 yards of the tunnel.

Dredging was commenced on the 23rd Dec. 1902, and by June 1903 it had been effected from 50 yards above the tunnel up to London Bridge.

The dredging below the tunnel from Millwall Dock was then proceeded with, and at the date of the hearing of this action had been carried out to within 170 yards of the tunnel.

In May 1903 the defendants forwarded certain plans to the East London Railway Joint Committee, and at the same time gave notice to them as required by the Thames Conservancy Act 1894 s. 88, that they proposed to dredge the bed of the river over the tunnel as shown in the plans, that is, so as to make a channel of 210ft. broad, of a depth of 36ft. below Trinity high-water mark.

In spite of objections made by the committee the defendants notified the plaintiffs' solicitors on the 8th Dec. 1903 of their intention to proceed with the dredging operations proposed after the expiration of a week from the 9th Dec. 1903.

The writ in this action was therefore issued on the 11th Dec. 1903.

The plaintiffs now claimed "an injunction to restrain the defendants, their officers, contractors, agents, or workmen from deepening or dredging or working in the bed of the river Thames at any place within 150 yards above or below the Thames Tunnel . . . or in any manner so as to injure, endanger, or affect the said tunnel, or the roof, sides, or protections thereof, or the railway running through the same or covered thereby."

The defendants put in issue the allegations of the plaintiffs that damage would be caused by the removal of a few feet of soil, as proposed by them.

It appeared from the expert evidence called by the plaintiffs that there would be grave risk in removing any part of the soil from over the tunnel, if the soil was in fact of a loose and semi-fluid nature.

The evidence as to the nature of the soil rested almost entirely on the reports of the original constructor of the tunnel, Sir Isambard Brunel. It was impossible to verify the facts there stated, for the prickings of the soil which had been made in connection with the present action only went to show the nature of the actual surface of the bed of the river over the tunnel, and it was not possible to make further investigations without endangering the tunnel. The reports of Sir I. Brunel, which, it appeared, were commonly accepted by engineers as a correct record, stated that in making the tunnel, the material met with was for the most part, of a loose and semi-fluid nature. It further stated that there had been several irruptions of black water in the tunnel works, and the holes so caused in the river bed had had to be filled in with bags of clay. The question as to whether the reports were admissible was raised by the defendants, and this is the only point in the case which it is necessary to report.

Butcher, K.C. and G. R. Northcote for the defendants.

Upjohn, K.C. in reply.

FARWELL, J.—This is a quia timet action, and I have had evidence given by experts to prove the existence of danger. Now in quia timet actions it is impossible to expect a witness to commit himself to a statement that it is absolutely certain that danger will ensue; nor is that necessary. All that is required is that there be a strong case of probability that the apprehended mischief will arise. I have had called before me two very eminent experts to prove the likelihood of danger by the proposed dredging who are absolutely unbiassed and impartial in the matter; but whose opinion is based on statements made by the original constructor of the tunnel. It is not immaterial, therefore, to consider one or two matters of history with respect to Sir Isambard Brunel's construction of the tunnel and his memoranda and records of what took place. It has been submitted that these records are not proper evidence; but I am of opinion that I am entitled to regard them in the same way that I regard any other fact of history which did not take place within living memory, if it is established by authentic records. Inasmuch as all the engineers whom I have seen agree that these records are accessible to engineers and are accepted by them as absolutely accurate, it appears to me that the court would be very shortsighted to decline to take advantage of whatever benefit may be obtained from the knowledge of the historical facts so authenticated. ESCOTT v. MAYOR, &C., OF NEWPORT. (a)

Trespass—Statutory right to erect post "in, over, or under any street"—Erection of electric post—Taking of land—Lands Clauses Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18)—Newport Corporation Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. xlii.).

By sect. 51 of the Newport Corporation Act 1900, with which the Lands Clauses Act 1845 was incorporated, the corporation might, for the purpose of working their tramways, construct and erect "on, in, over, or under any street or road" poles and posts.

For the purpose of working their tramways the corporation erected an iron pillar, about 10in. in diameter, upon the plaintiff's land, which by dedication, subject to a user by the plaintiff, formed part of the street, such pillar being sunk about 6ft. in the ground.

Held, that this was not a "taking of land" within the Lands Clauses Act, but was an exercise of the statutory powers of the defendants under their private Act.

APPEAL from His Honour Judge Owen, sitting at the Newport County Court.

The action was brought to recover damages for an alleged trespass by the defendants upon the plaintiff's property by the erection on it of an iron pillar for the purpose of carrying an overhead electric cable, and for a mandatory injunction to remove the pillar.

The facts of the case were not in dispute, and were as follows:—

By a lease dated the 6th Nov. 1885 a plot of ground upon part of which this pillar had been erected was leased to the plaintiff's predecessor in title for the term of ninety-nine years from the 25th March 1883, and by an indenture dated the 18th April 1899 the premises were assigned to and are now vested in the plaintiff.

The lease was of a plot of ground adjoining and abutting upon the Chepstow-road, upon which the lessee covenanted to build and did build a house and shop now known as No. 103, Chepstow-road.

There is a plan upon the lease of the plot of ground demised with a number referring to an estate map, and upon that estate map the frontage building line of the house to be built is shown, between which line and the boundary of the plot abutting on the Chepstow-road there is a space of 10ft. in width which was originally intended as a forecourt to the house.

The plot of ground demised was at the date of the lease divided from the Chepstow-road by a hedge, which was included in the lease. When the lessee, one Page, built the house he pulled down this hedge, and with the leave of the ground landlord, instead of using the piece of ground in front of the house as a forecourt, he paved the whole of it from the house up to the roadway in the Chepstow-road, and he put down a line of kerbing immediately adjoining the road. This paving and kerbing were wholly upon the plot of ground leased to him. Other houses on each side of Page's house were from time to time built forming a continuous row of houses with their frontages built up to the line shown on the estate map, and such houses all had pavement in front forming a continuous line of pavement.

Page carried on in the shop which he so built the business of a furniture dealer, and he was in the habit of putting furniture for sale upon the pavement in front of his shop.

The plaintiff since he bought the premises has carried on there a similar business, and he has also put furniture for sale upon the pavement in front of his shop.

Such user of the pavement by Page and the plaintiff has been without interruption and without any objection to it, either by the defendants or any other authority.

Subject to this user of the pavement a right by the public to use this pavement as a footpath has been acquired.

In 1890 the defendants remodelled the Chepstow-road and straightened the footpaths on each side of it, and put in new kerbing and channelling in the same place as the kerbing put in by Page was. The defendants have also from time to time at the public expense repaired the pavement in front of the plaintiff's shop. The Chepstow-road is now a street of almost continuous lines of houses on each side with paved footpaths in front of them leading from the Newport Bridge over the river Usk towards Chepstow. The plaintiff's house is situated about a mile to the eastward from the bridge.

In exercise of the power given them by the Newport Corporation Acts of 1893 and 1897 the defendants constructed a tramway in the Chepstow-road, passing in front of the plaintiff's premises. It was used for tramcars for the conveyance of passengers, and the tramcars were drawn by horses.

In 1900 the defendants being desirous of applying electrical power as the motive power of their tramcars, they were empowered by the Newport Corporation Act 1900 to use mechanical power on their tramways.

The system adopted by the defendants was a system by which electrical power is supplied to the tramcars from a continuous wire cable running along the tramways and suspended above them at a height of about 25ft. This cable is supported by wires across the roadway at fixed distances, and these wires are fastened to hollow iron pillars on each side of the roadway.

One of these pillars had without the plaintiff's consent been fixed in the pavement immediately in front of his shop, and it had been fixed in a place which is wholly within the boundaries of the plot of ground demised by the lease under which the plaintiff held. This iron pillar was 31ft. in height and about 10in. in diameter at the base, and about 6ft. of its height was sunk in the ground.

The placing this pillar in the place where it was fixed was the trespass of which the plaintiff complained in the action.

The learned County Court judge having stated the facts, delivered judgment as follows:

The defendants' defences to the action are—(1) That the pillar complained of was erected by them under and pursuant to the authority given to them by the Newport Corporation Act 1900, s. 51; and (2) that the pillar having been erected on the 8th Aug. 1902 the claim is barred by the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893, s. 1. In the Corporation Act 1900, the Lands Clauses Acts are incorporated, and it is provided that the several words and expressions to which by the Public Health Acts meanings are assigned, shall in that Act have the same respective meanings, and it is provided by sect. 51, sub-sect. 1, that for the purpose of working any of the corporation tramways by mechanical power the corporation may, subject to the provisions of that Act, "construct, lay down, erect, maintain, renew, and repair, on, in, over, and under any street or road in which any corporation tramways are for the time being laid," certain works and appliances, including "poles, posts," and the defendants are further empowered to "make such alterations in any existing tramways of the corporation, and execute all such works on and in connection therewith as may be necessary or expedient for adapting the same to be worked by mechanical power." By sect. 4 of the Public Health Act 1875 the word "street" is to include "any highway (not being a turnpike road) and any public bridge (not being a county bridge) and any road, main footway, square, court, alley, or passage, whether a thoroughfare or not." It is admitted that the roadway of the Chepstow-road, and the footpaths on each side of it, are together a street within this definition. The defendants contended that by sect. 149 of the Public Health Act 1875 the Chepstow-road, including the pavement in front of plaintiff's house and the place where the pillar has been fixed, became vested in them, and that they are therefore empowered by sect. 51 of their Act of 1900 to erect the pillar in question in the place where they have erected it without obtaining the consent thereto of the plaintiff, and without making him any compensation therefor. I think that this which is the defendant's first defence to the action is disposed of by authority. It has been decided by a series of cases beginning with Coverdale v. Charlton (40 L. T. Rep. 88; 4 Q. B. Div. 104), decided by the Court of Appeal in 1878, to Baird v. Corporation of Tunbridge Wells, decided by the Court of Appeal (71 L. T. Rep. 211; (1894) 2 Q. B. 867), and affirmed by the House of Lords (1896), A. C. 434, that by sect. 149 of the Public Health Act 1875 the local authority become the owners of so much of the soil of a street as is necessary for the ordinary user of the street as a street, and not of anything more. In the Tunbridge Wells case the streets were vested in the corporation in the same way and under the same section of the Public Health Act 1875 as in the present case and as they were empowered by a special Act to erect lavatories in any street it was held that the sub-soil in the street did not belong to them, and that they had not any right to excavate the soil and erect lavatories below the surface of a street. The present Lord Chancellor, speaking of the section in question, said that it vested in the corporation "The street quod street and indeed so much of the actual soil of the street as might be necessary for the purpose of maintaining it and using it as a street," and the late Lord Herschell said: "It seems to me that the vesting of the street vests in the urban authority such property and such property only as is necessary for the control, protection, and maintenance of the street as a highway for public use." In the present case, I think, the placing of an iron pillar is not necessary for the purposes so mentioned. But then it is said that the defendants are empowered to do this by sect. 51 of their Act of 1900. Upon this point the observations of Smith, L.J. in the Tunbridge Wells case, in the Court of Appeal, are, I think, conclusive. His Lordship says: "Now, where a statute enacts that a corporation may erect a building in a street over which they have only a right of way as one of the public, What does that mean? Does it mean that they may only utilise what the landowner had already dedicated to the public, or does it mean that they may take from the landowner what he has not dedicated to the public and which remains his own? It seems to me that the true answer is, that it only entitles the corporation to use what the owner has dedicated to the public, and it does not entitle the corporation to take the landowner's land for nothing. And I should point out that if the corporation desire to erect buildings upon another man's land they can do so by paying for it, for the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts are incorporated in the Act of 1900, and the Act can be brought into play." I think, therefore, that the defendants' first defence fails. The only other defence is, that as this pillar was erected on the 8th Aug. 1902, and the action was not begun until the 30th March 1903, the plaintiff is precluded from bringing the action by the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893. Sect. 1 of that Act provides that an action brought for any act done in the execution of any Act of Parliament "shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of or in case of a continuance of injury or damage within six months next after the ceasing thereof." The erection of the pillar is, I think, a continuing injury or damage to the plaintiff, and this defence, I think, also fails. The plaintiff has therefore succeeded. I think, however, that I ought not to grant a mandatory injunction for the removal of the pillar, and what I propose to do is, at the plaintiff's option, either to assess the damage which he has suffered by the defendant's wrongful act or to do what was done by the Court of Appeal in the Tunbridge Wells case—that is, to make a declaration that the defendants are not entitled to the soil in which they have erected the pillar and that its erection was a trespass upon the plaintiff's property. The defendants must pay the costs of the action upon scale C. If the defendants wish to keep this pillar upon the plaintiff's land they can do so by paying for a right to do so as provided by the Lands Clauses Acts.

By the Newport Corporation Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. xlii.), s. 51:

(1) For the purpose of working any of the corporation tramways by mechanical power or of providing access to or forming connection with any generating or other stations, or any engines, machines, apparatus, the corporation may, subject to the provisions of this Act, construct, lay down, erect, maintain, renew, and repair on, in, over, or under any street or road in which any corporation tramways are for the time being laid, cables, conductors, electric mains, wires, poles, posts, brackets, plates, tubes, channels, grooves, engines, apparatus, machinery, works, and appliances, and may make and maintain opening and ways on, in, over, or under any such street or road, and may attach to any house or building and maintain brackets, electric conductors, wires, and apparatus, and the corporation may also make such alterations in any existing tramways of the corporation, and execute all such works on and in connection therewith as may be necessary or expedient for adapting the same to be worked by mechanical power, and may for those purposes or any of them, subject to the restrictions and provisions contained in part 2 of the Tramways Act 1870, open and break up any street or road in which the tramways so to be worked by mechanical power or any of them may be situate, and any sewers, drains, water, or gas pipes, tubes, wires, telephonic and telegraphic apparatus therein or thereunder. (3) No such works shall be attached to any house or building without in each case the consent of the occupier of such house or building, and if there is no occupier then of the lessee entitled to possession, or if there is none then of the owner, and the consent of the occupier or lessee shall not be effective after the termination of his occupation or the expiration of the term of his lease, as the case may be. (3) On the termination of the occupation of any occupier or lessee the owner entitled to possession, if he did not consent to the attaching of such work to the house or building, may give notice to the corporation that he requires the same to be removed, and the corporation shall remove the same accordingly within one month after receiving such notice. (4) Nothing in this section shall extend to or authorise any interference with any works of any undertakers within the meaning of the Electric Lighting Acts 1882 and 1888 to which the provisions of sect. 15 of the former Act apply.

The Lands Clauses Acts were incorporated in this statute.

The defendants appealed.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In this case the learned County Court judge has held that the act of the defendants in placing this pillar was a trespass upon the plaintiff's property. Originally the property of the plaintiff went up to the kerb, but he has dedicated part of that property, so that the public have acquired a right of passage over it, though to a certain extent a right of interrupting such passage has been maintained by putting out furniture upon the pavement. It is quite clear, however, that as to the surface, at any rate, this was part of the street. In that state of things the defendants, acting under the Newport Corporation Act 1900, s. 51, placed this iron pillar in the pavement immediately in front of his shop, in a place which was wholly within the boundaries of the land demised to the plaintiff. Their right to place the pillar there was not disputed, but it was said that, as the pillar went down into the soil to a greater depth than what was vested in the defendants, thereby getting and acquiring support from the soil, that was an entry upon and taking of the plaintiff's land which constituted a trespass. The point that arises is whether the erecting of the pillar under the powers conferred by sect. 51 of the Newport Corporation Act 1900 is a taking of land within the Lands Clauses Act 1845, so that the formalities required by that statute must be complied with. It seems to me that sect. 51 contemplates something which is a common law occupation, but it is not meant to be a taking of land under the Lands Clauses Act. I come to the conclusion that this is not a taking of land, but was the exercise of an express statutory power to erect on, in, over, or under a street an electric pole or post. If, however, that injuriously affects the land then there is a remedy under sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act. I must hold that the land has not been taken, but merely that something has been done under statutory powers.

WILLS, J. concurred.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I wish to adopt the judgment given by my Lord, which seems to me a simple way of putting the case. Under sect. 51 for the purpose of working the tramways the defendants may erect poles or posts on, in, over, or under any street or road. As I understand the findings of fact in this case what was done here was for the purpose of working the tramways, and for that purpose the pillar was erected. That was a thing strictly within the terms of the section, and was justified by statutory authority. It is said that the defendants could do this, but that there is reserved to the plaintiff the right to object to any interference with the soil except with his permission, but I am not prepared to accept that as stated. I think that, while no property passes to the defendants, there is a right in them to enter any area under their statutory powers if such area is "on, in, over, or under any street or road in which any corporation tramways are for the time being laid." The basis of the judgment of Chitty, J. in Fareham Local Board and Fareham Electric Light Company v. Smith (7 Times L. Rep. 443) was stated by him as follows: "The local authority was entitled to take so much of the zone above as was required for the due execution of its powers and the due performance of its duties. To express the matter shortly, it was the area of user which showed what was vested, and the street comprised the zone. The local board had a proprietary right in the zone above the surface, or at any rate, had a possession of so much above and so much below as fell within the objects of the Act." There is nothing there contrary to any of the cases referred to by the learned County Court judge. In Taylor v. Oldham Corporation (35 L. T. Rep. 696; 4 Ch. Div. 395) it was held that the usual clause in local Acts vesting sewers in the sewer authority conferred an absolute property in that part of the subsoil occupied by the sewer and not merely an easement, and Jessel, M.R., at p. 411, said: "It was found under the old law and it was sometimes held that the sewer authorities . . . had only an easement, and it was found to be very inconvenient, and consequently in the modern Acts the property in the sewers has been vested in the sewer authorities. That is to say, that, instead of allowing the subsoil to remain in the owner of the soil subject to an easement or right of sewerage or drainage, the absolute property in the sewer (which means not merely the brick barrel or whatever it may be forming the sewer, but the whole interior of the sewer—that is the whole of the space occupied by it) is now vested in the sewer authorities." That was not done here, but what was done was not the taking of the soil at all, but merely the exercise of a statutory right in the nature of an easement in a given area. That does not exclude a good claim if the plaintiff's rights have been injuriously affected.

Damage to pier by ship—Action by owner of pier—County Court jurisdiction—Writ of prohibition—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), s. 3, sub-s. 3.

By sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 it is provided that County Courts having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction as to any claim for "damage by collision."

The plaintiff was the owner of a pier, and brought an action in the County Court against the defendants for damage done by their vessel to his pier. The defendants moved for a writ of prohibition.

Held, that there was no jurisdiction under sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, for the County Court judge to determine the action, and that a writ of prohibition must therefore go.

MOTION on behalf of the owners of the steamship Normandy for a writ of prohibition to the judge of the County Court of Barnstaple to restrain proceedings.

The plaintiff, Reginald Joseph Weld, who, being a person of unsound mind, sued by his committees, was the owner of a pier at Ilfracombe, and the action was brought to recover 200*l.* for damage alleged to have been done by the defendants' steamship to the pier. The action was brought under sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, which gives to any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction power to hear and determine causes as to any claim for "damage by collision."

The defendants contended that the words "damage by collision" referred only to collisions between ships, and that, although the amending Act of 1869 extended the Admiralty jurisdiction of County Courts to damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, yet it did not give the court power to deal with claims for damage to a fixed object such as a pier.

Sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) is as follows:

Any County Court having Admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes): (3) As to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision—Any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

Sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) is as follows:

The third section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, shall extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds.

The defendants now moved the court for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the learned County Court judge from hearing and determining the action.

Dawson Miller, for the defendants, in support of the motion.—Sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, under which the action is brought, gives a County Court jurisdiction to hear and determine causes as to any claim for "damage by collision." Collision must be a collision between ships. That is the ordinarily understood meaning of the word in the Admiralty Court:

Robson v. Owner of the Kate, 59 L. T. Rep. 557;

6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 330; 21 Q. B. Div. 13;

Everard v. Kendall, 22 L. T. Rep. 408; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428.

It is true that sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1869 extended the jurisdiction to damage to ships, "whether by collision or otherwise," but that would not include damage by a ship to a structure such as a pier.

Herbert Chitty and H. Stuart Moore, for the plaintiffs, contra.—The language used in Robson v. Owner of the Kate (ubi sup.) is only a dictum. The damage done there was to a pile-driving machine on a wharf on the bank, and the ground of the decision was that damage which had been done on land outside the ebb and flow of the tide could not have fallen within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, and therefore did not come within sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868. The intention of the Legislature was to give the County Courts the same jurisdiction as the High Court had:

The Zeta, 68 L. T. Rep. 40; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 369; (1893) A. C. 468.

The High Court clearly has jurisdiction to try the action under sect. 7 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. That was decided in

The Uhla, 19 L. T. Rep. 89; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 148; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 29n.

The word "collision" has been used with regard to other objects than a ship—e.g., in the case of damage done by a ship to a barge (The Malvina, 6 L. T. Rep. 369; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 341; Lush. 493); by a ship to a ship (see The Uhla, ubi sup.); by a ship to a wharf (The Excelsior, ubi sup.); collision by a ship with a keel (The Sarah, Lush. 549); and in Union Marine Insurance Company v. Borwick (73 L. T. Rep. 156; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; (1895) 2 Q. B. 279) it was held that a vessel which was driven on to a sloping bank formed of loose boulders to protect a breakwater was lost by collision and not by stranding, and therefore the loss came within the words of an insurance policy, "loss or damage through collision with . . . piers or stages or similar structures." Dawson Miller in reply.

Feb. 9.—The judgment of the court was delivered by BARNES, J.—This is a motion for a writ of prohibition to the judge of the County Court of Barnstaple to restrain proceedings in a suit by the committees of the estate of the plaintiff, the owner of a pier at Ilfracombe, in the county of Devon, against the defendants, the owners of the steamship Normandy of Liverpool. According to an affidavit filed in the case, the summons was issued by the plaintiff in rem, claiming 200l. against the steamship in respect of damage alleged to have been caused by the vessel to the pier, no part of which is afloat. The action was brought under sub-sect. 3 of sect. 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, which is as follows: [His Lordship then read the section.] It was contended by counsel for the applicants, the defendants in the suit, that the suit was not a cause as to a "claim for damage by collision," within the meaning of the sub-section, and that the question raised was covered by authority. On the other hand, counsel for the respondent argued that the words in the sub-section, "damage by collision," include a claim such as that made by the plaintiff, and that the authorities cited on behalf of the defendants were distinguishable from the present case, and inconsistent with the judgments in the House of Lords in the case of The Zeta (ubi sup.). The simple question is whether the words "damage by collision" include damage done to a pier by a ship striking against it. The principal cases relied on by the applicants were Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.) and Robson v. Owner of the Kate (ubi sup.). In the former case it was held that the Admiralty jurisdiction of the County Court in cases of collision was not more extensive than that of the High Court of Admiralty, and, as the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction in the case of a collision on the Thames between two barges propelled by oars only, the County Court had no such Admiralty jurisdiction. In the course of his judgment Montague Smith, J. said (22 L. T. Rep., at p. 409; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S., at p. 392; L. Rep. 5 O. P., at p. 432): "What is the meaning of 'damage by collision'? We have nothing to guide us as to what damage by collision is within the Act, except the general scope and object of the Act. In common understanding, and as understood in the Court of Admiralty, damage by collision is damage sustained by a ship from another ship coming in contact with it." The late Master of the Rolls, then Brett, J., said the Act of 1868 "gives the County Court power to try in a particular way questions of salvage, claims for towage, necessities supplied to ships, and wages, and claims for damage to cargo or damage by collision. Damage by what collisions? Looking at sects. 7 and 22 of the Act of 1868, it seems to me that it means a collision between two vessels—such vessels as were formerly dealt with in the Admiralty Court." These dicta are favourable to the defendants' contention in this case; but the case is not conclusive in their favour, because the basis of the decision appears to have been that it was not the intention of the Legislature to give the County Courts Admiralty jurisdiction over Admiralty causes other than those over which the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction, and that the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction in respect of such a collision as that in question in the case. It did not decide what jurisdiction the County Courts have within their limit of amount in cases of damage done by a ship in which the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction. In Robson v. Owner of the Kate (ubi sup.) it was held that damage occasioned to an object on the bank of a river by contact with the sailing gear of a vessel afloat in the river was not "damage by collision" within sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, so that a County Court had no Admiralty jurisdiction in respect of such damage. Wills, J. in the course of his judgment said (59 L. T. Rep., at p. 558; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 330; 21 Q. B. Div., at p. 14): "It is not necessary to define the word 'collision.' The words 'damage by collision,' used, as here, in an Act the object of which is to confer an Admiralty jurisdiction, cannot be construed as including damage which has taken place on land, outside the ebb and flow of the tide, and which would certainly not have fallen within the original jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in respect of collision"; and Grantham, J. said: "In Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.), which was a proceeding by way of prohibition under this Act, Montague Smith, J. is reported to have said"—he then quotes the passage I have already referred to, and adds: "This explanation seems to me well founded, and I think the preceding words 'damage to cargo,' which obviously refer to damage to cargo while on board a ship, tend to show that the intention of the Legislature was to confine the newly conferred jurisdiction to cases of collision between ships." The reason given by the latter judge for his decision is applicable to the present case; but the basis of the judgment of Wills, J. is that the damage was on land, outside the ebb and flow of the tide, whereas, if there be any distinction in the case before us, the damage is to a structure which stands in the sea. The case mainly relied on by counsel for the plaintiff was The Zeta (ubi sup.), in which it was held that the jurisdiction given by sect. 3 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and extended by sect. 4 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869, included a claim for damage to a ship by collision with an object which was not a ship—e.g., a pier-head. That case turned on sect. 4 of the amending Act of 1869. The argument for the appellants, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, which succeeded in the House of Lords, was that sect. 4 of the Act of 1869 had clear words which gave the County Courts jurisdiction in "all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise," and that the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction over such cases. The respondents do not appear to have disputed that the case fell within the language used in sect. 4, but argued that it was not intended to confer jurisdiction beyond that possessed by the Court of Admiralty, and that the action was not within that jurisdiction. The judgments were to the effect that the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction over claims of the character of that in question in the case, and that the claim fell within the words of sect. 4.

THE NORMANDY.

[ADM.]

Reference was also made by counsel for the plaintiff to expressions in some judgments in which the word "collision" has been used in a general way in relation to the impact of a ship against another object, and to some other cases which have only an indirect bearing on the present case; but in my opinion little assistance is to be derived from these references. I may here observe that the true meaning of collision is not a mere striking against, but a striking together; and to me it seems more correct to speak of a vessel stranding, or running, or striking upon or against rocks or the shore, than colliding therewith; and the same, to my mind, is true when the contact is by a vessel with some structure erected on the rocks or shore, and I notice that the use of the word "collision" in sects. 418 and 419 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 appears to refer only to collisions between ships. If this matter were clear of all that has been said in other cases, the question would appear to me to be a simple matter of construction, and having regard to the object of the Act of 1868, and its general scope, and the ordinarily understood meaning of the words "damage by collision" in the Admiralty Court, where the term "causes of damage" is the general expression for damage cases, I should come to the conclusion that the word "collision" referred to collision between ships. This opinion is in accordance with the case of Everard v. Kendall (ubi sup.) and Robson v. Owner of the Kate (ubi sup.), and there is nothing of substance to conflict with this view unless the argument based on the case of The Zeta (ubi sup.) does so. That argument comes to this, that the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction in 1868 in causes of damage received by or done by a ship which included a case of the present kind, and that the Act of 1868 gave similar jurisdiction to the County Courts within a limited amount; but in my opinion that argument seeks to establish too much. It has been decided in several cases that the County Court Acts of 1868 and 1869, while conferring Admiralty jurisdiction upon County Courts up to certain limited amounts, conferred no greater jurisdiction, except with regard to charter-parties, than was possessed by the Admiralty Court: (see The Dowse, 22 L. T. Rep. 627; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 424; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 135; Allen v. Garbutt, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 520n.; 6 Q. B. Div. 165; and Reg. v. Judge of the City of London Court, ubi sup.). The arguments and judgments in these and other cases show that the question has in such cases not really been whether the particular claim came within the ordinary meaning of the words of the County Court Acts, but whether the claim was one in respect of which the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction, and, if not, it was considered that it could not have been intended to confer Admiralty jurisdiction in such a case in the County Courts, as these Acts were to confer Admiralty jurisdiction, though sect. 2 of the Act of 1869 in certain matters gave a somewhat wider jurisdiction: (see The Alina, ubi sup.). I am not aware whether the words "damage to cargo," in sub.sect. 3 of the Act of 1868, have yet been considered: (see The Victoria, 56 L. T. Rep. 499; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 120; 12 P. Div. 105). So also in The Zeta (ubi sup.) the real question was not whether the claim fell within the ordinary meaning of the words of sect. 4 of the Act of 1869, or as to the meaning of the word "collision," but whether the words of sect. 4 should have a restricted interpretation on the ground, as was contended, that the case was not within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. It was held, however, in the House of Lords, overruling the Court of Appeal, that the case was within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, and thus any difficulty in the construction of the Act of 1869 was removed. In the present case the difficulty does not arise upon any question as to the jurisdiction of the High Court. It is clear from the terms of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and the decisions thereon, that the High Court has Admiralty jurisdiction in respect of this claim as being damage done by a ship (see The Uhla, ubi sup.; and The Excelsior, ubi sup.); but the question is whether the wording of the Act of 1868 is sufficient to give similar jurisdiction to the County Court within the limited amount in such a case. Now, it is quite clear that the Acts of 1868 and 1869 do not give Admiralty jurisdiction within the limited amounts in all cases in which the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction. For instance, no jurisdiction is given in causes of possession, co-ownership cases, mortgage or bottomry, and it cannot therefore be inferred that the County Courts were intended to have Admiralty jurisdiction in all Admiralty causes up to limited amounts. On the contrary, care is taken to specify exactly what causes may be brought in the County Court. Whatever the old Admiralty jurisdiction was at the time when the Act of 1868 was passed, the Acts of 1840 and 1861 had enacted that the High Court of Admiralty should have jurisdiction over all claims for "damage received by any ship or sea-going vessel," and "over any claim for damage done to any ship," and nothing would have been easier than to have used similar words in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act of 1868, whereas the words adopted in that Act are "damage by collision." We have only, therefore, to consider what is included in these words. All cases of damage done by a ship cannot, in my opinion, be so included. It has been held, for instance, that injury to a diver who was caught by the paddle-wheel of a steamer (The Sylph, 17 L. T. Rep. 519; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 37; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 24), approved in The Beta (20 L. T. Rep. 988; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 447), which, however, was dissented from in the case of Smith v. Brown (24 L. T. Rep. 808; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 729); damage done to a cable in freeing it from a vessel's anchor by which it had been fouled (The Clara Killam, 23 L. T. Rep. 27; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 463; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 161); and damage to a vessel through grounding to avoid another vessel owing to negligence in the navigation of the other vessel (The Industrie, 24 L. T. Rep. 446; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 17; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 303) could be sued for in the Admiralty Court; but clearly these cases could not properly be called cases of damage by collision. Other illustrations may be put analogous to the last case, though probably they are rather cases of damage received by a ship than of damage done by a ship. Possibly the plaintiffs' argument need not be put so high as to include in damage by collision all cases of damage done by a ship, but only cases of damage done by one ship to another, or by a ship to some other object by striking against it; but even then the word "collision" in the ordinary meaning, and as ordinarily used and understood in the Admiralty Court, would not be properly applicable to the latter case. Cases of striking something which is not engaged in navigation are very rare, and it is not unreasonable to assume that, in using the word "collision," the framers of the Act intended to deal with the class of case which forms the ordinary subject of a collision suit. It was urged that it would be strange if, as held in The Zeta (ubi sup.), the owner of a pier or dock could be sued in the County Court for damage caused to a ship by the negligence of the servants of such owner, and yet that such owner could not in the County Court sue for damage to the structure by negligence on the part of the ship's people; but the answer appears to be that the amending Act of 1869 covers the one case but not the other. The collocation of the words "damage by collision" and "damage to cargo" in the sub-section, to my mind, also intends to show that the sub-section was only dealing with ships, though what is included in "damage to cargo" is not a subject for present consideration. For these reasons I am of opinion that the writ of prohibition must go, and that the applicants are entitled to their costs of this motion against the respondents.

THE MINNETONKA. (a)

Collision—Both to blame—Damages—Payment by cargo owners to shipowners—Right of cargo owner to recover money so paid from wrong-doing vessel—Registrar and merchants.

A collision occurred between the steamship U. and the steamship M., for which both vessels were found to blame. The U. had on board at the time a cargo of coals shipped by and the property of the Admiralty, and, in order to avoid probable expense, an agreement was come to by which the owners of the U. waived their right to carry the cargo to its destination, and the coals were discharged and sold. The owners of the U. recovered against the owners of the M. a moiety of their damages. A claim was made by the Admiralty, as owners of the cargo on board the U., against the owners of the M. for their proportion of the sum paid to the owners of the U.

Held, affirming the report of the registrar, that they were not entitled to recover anything, as such a payment could not be said to be the natural result of the collision, and that, if the owners of the M. were liable, the sum recovered would be payable to the owners of the U., who had already been paid a moiety of all the losses they had incurred by reason of the collision.

MOTION in objection to the report of the assistant registrar.

A collision occurred on the 9th June 1902, in the English Channel, between the steamships Uskmoor and Minnetonka. The Uskmoor at the time was on a voyage from the Tyne to the Cape with a cargo of coals shipped by and the property of the Admiralty. After the collision the Uskmoor put into the Thames for repairs, and after some correspondence, which is sufficiently dealt with by the learned judge in his judgment, the following letter was written on behalf of the Director of Navy Contracts to the managing owner of the Uskmoor:

Admiralty, S.W., 18th June 1902.—Gentlemen,—With reference to your letter of the 13th June, I have to acquaint you that, to minimise loss in the interests of all concerned, the Admiralty is prepared to agree to the following arrangement, to which it is understood that you and the underwriters have given your concurrence—viz.: The voyage to be terminated and the coal sold. The owners to be paid the sum of 1000*l.*, to be apportioned as a substituted expense, in lieu of those which would otherwise have been incurred, on the basis shown by the following approximate figures:

General Average.				Cargo.		Freight.
£664	10	0	Hire of barges	£166	2	6
106	17	6	Shifting, &c.	53	8	9
424	10	10	Reshipping	—	—	424 10 10
£1195	18	4		£219	11	3
£996	15	0	Apportioned in substitution for the above	£332	5	0
					£644	2	1
					£182	19	11
					£536	16	9

For 1000*l.* the figures will, of course, be slightly different. The Uskmoor to load another cargo on completion of repairs, on same conditions as charter of the 15th May, and at rate of freight current at date of signing the new charter, provided the owners give proper notice to Messrs. Mathwin and Sons, of Newcastle, of the date when steamer will be ready to load after repair. I shall be glad to have your confirmation of this arrangement by return of post, and to have a letter from you agreeing on these conditions to allow the cargo to be handed over to whomsoever it is sold to. The name of the buyers for insertion in such letter will be communicated to you as soon as sale is definitely arranged.—I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant, PERCY MINTER, for Director of Navy Contracts.—Messrs. W. Runciman and Co.

(a) Reported by CHRISTOPHER HEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was agreed to by the owners of the Uskmoor, and the cargo was duly discharged and sold.

An action was brought by the owners of the Minnetonka against the owners of the Uskmoor and heard before the President (Sir F. H. Jeune) and Trinity Masters, and both vessels were found to blame for the collision. The case will be found reported in 87 L. T. Rep. 55; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 316; (1902) P. 250.

An action was then brought by the Admiralty, as owners of cargo on board the Uskmoor, against the owners of the Minnetonka, but was settled upon the terms of both vessels being to blame. At the reference before the assistant registrar and merchants to assess the damages, it was found that there was nothing due from the defendants except the sum of 5*l.* 5*s.* in respect of surveys.

The assistant registrar in his report dealt with the claim as follows:

The first item of the claim is for the difference between the cost of the coal and the price realised. It was contended by the defendants that nothing was due from them, on the ground that the cargo owners had not acted with reasonable diligence in not accepting a better price than that ultimately obtained. We are of opinion that the defendants' contention is right, and that this head of the cargo owners' claim must be disallowed. A sum for the cost of surveys is, however, payable to them—namely, 5*l.* 5*s.*—of which a moiety is recoverable against the defendants. The second head of the claim was for 1000*l.* agreed to be paid by the Admiralty to the shipowners for abandoning the voyage. It is not clear from the evidence that the whole of this sum was to be paid. In our view of the case, however, this doubt is not material, for we are of opinion that under all the circumstances the reasonable and business-like course for all parties was for the cargo to be sold in the Thames, and the payment of any sum to the shipowners by the cargo owners was not a consequence of the collision for which the wrongdoers are liable. The shipowners have recovered from the wrongdoers the cost of repairs and damages for the detention of their ship, and at the end of the period of detention they were in a position to, and did, take up a fresh charter. The duty of the shipowner being to carry the cargo to its destination, it was to his advantage to make an arrangement with the cargo owners whereby he would be free from this duty, and be able to take a new cargo when the repairs were finished. Any payment therefore made by the cargo owners to the shipowners is not a natural and reasonable result of the collision, and therefore is not recoverable against the wrongdoer.—(Signed) E. S. ROSCOE, Assistant Registrar.—12th June 1903.

The Admiralty appealed on the ground that everything had been done by the Admiralty to minimise the loss for the benefit of all parties, and that they were therefore entitled to recover the sum claimed.

Bucknill, J. referred the case back to the assistant registrar for further information as to whether or not the amount claimed by the Admiralty had or had not been paid to the owners of the Uskmoor.

The following is the material part of the further report of the assistant registrar:

By the report dated the 12th June 1903, I found that the cargo owners could not recover this sum from the owners of the Minnetonka, and the cargo owners appealed against the report. The hearing of the appeal on the 13th July was adjourned by Bucknill J. in order that I might report whether any part of the sum of 276*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*, a moiety of which is now claimed by the cargo owners, had been allowed to the owners of the Uskmoor by the report on the claim against the Minnetonka dated the 22nd Dec. 1902. The claim in respect of this sum of 276*l.* is based on several letters which were put in at the previous reference; the particulars of the claim are set out in the letter of the Director of Navy Contracts dated the 18th June. It is to be noted that in the letters of the 13th and 17th June the proposed payment is spoken of as being in respect of freight, a word which would be proper, since, if the ship was repairable, her owners were entitled to carry on the cargo and earn this freight, and in the letter of the 20th June it is stated that the sum payable by the cargo owners would follow the completion of "the general average adjustment." The claim is, however, now put forward as being in respect of the hire of barges for the purpose of warehousing the cargo, and expenses which would have been incurred had the voyage not been abandoned, but which was not in fact incurred and were therefore saved. I have to report that, as in the reference on the claim by the Uskmoor only the actual expenses incurred for discharging the cargo and for the hire of barges were allowed (item No. 7), no part of the present claim has been dealt with in the ship's reference. In the ship's reference, however, all sums in respect of loss of freight, and for expenses at the port of loading, were allowed to the shipowners (see item No. 35). At the further hearing further arguments were addressed to us by counsel for the claimants and the defendants, and I was asked to make several findings on points submitted to us. The points submitted by counsel for the cargo owners and our findings thereon are as follows: (1) That the voyage was not commercially at an end; we find that the voyage was not commercially at an end. (2) That on the 18th June repairs were expected to take six weeks; we find that the repairs were expected to take six weeks. (3) That 1000*l.* was agreed to be paid on terms contained in letters of the 18th June, explained by those of the 19th and 20th; we find that 1000*l.* was agreed to be paid on the terms contained in these letters. (4) That the Admiralty has been called on to pay their share. There is no direct evidence as to this, but the solicitor for the owners of the Uskmoor, who was present at the further reference, stated that the cargo owners would be called on to pay the sum claimed. (5) That the agreement was beneficial to all concerned, and a reasonable and proper one to reduce loss which would have been occasioned had the parties insisted on their strict rights to have voyage concluded. I find, as stated in the previous report, that it was reasonable and for the benefit of all concerned that the voyage should be abandoned, so that expenses in the Thames might be lessened, and that there should be no risk of the deterioration of the cargo. I further find the agreement by the Admiralty to pay 1000*l.*, or a part thereof, was not a reasonable agreement, because the object of the abandonment of the voyage was to save further expenses, and it was unreasonable for the cargo owners to pay any sum to the shipowners, since it was the duty of the shipowners to take all measures necessary to enable them to carry the cargo to its destination (see Carver on Carriage by Sea, 3rd edit., sect. 302); and, as the voyage was not commercially at an end, the cargo owners could have insisted on their cargo being carried to its destination without any payment to the shipowners except that of the agreed freight. I further find that the agreement, so far as it related to the payment of 1000*l.*, or any part thereof, was one arising out of the relation between ship and cargo, and that the collision was not the cause of it, and that the sum claimed is inadmissible as a head of damage in an action against the wrongdoing ship: (The Marpessa, 66 L. T. Rep. 356; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 155; (1891) P. 403). (6) That none of the items shown in the previous reference were allowed in respect of the expenses included in the 276*l.* The finding on this head has already been stated. The points submitted by counsel for the defendants were: (1) That by the arrangement made in June 1902 on the basis of a reshipment of cargo, which was alleged to be necessary and reasonable, the owners of the Uskmoor recovered from the owners of the Minnetonka a complete indemnity for all damages actually incurred arising out of the collision. I find that this was so. (2) That that indemnity, being obtained on the basis of voyage being abandoned, included all loss of expenses and all loss of profits from the date of eleven days before collision when the Uskmoor commenced her voyage by bunkering in the Tyne. That under these circumstances the owners of the Uskmoor could not claim from the owners of the Minnetonka any further sum in respect of the abandonment of the voyage, and that therefore the Admiralty cannot claim any such sum. I find the facts stated in the affirmative. I also find that the owners of the Uskmoor have obtained damages on the basis of the voyage being abandoned, and that the owners of the Uskmoor, if they recover the sum claimed in this reference by the cargo owners from them, should deduct this amount from the sum awarded to them in this claim against the Minnetonka: (see The Marpessa, ubi sup.). I was further asked to vary the previous order as to costs, but, having regard to my finding, I cannot vary the order as to the costs of the previous reference. The costs of this further reference I leave to be dealt with by the court.—(Signed) E. S. ROSCOM, Assistant Registrar.—20th Nov. 1903.

THE MINNETONKA.

[ADM.]

Acland, K.C. for the plaintiffs.—The agreement was to pay a sum of money which should be a substituted expense, and as such ship, cargo, and freight would have to contribute if it was a case of general average. The expense was a diminution of a certain loss. The assistant registrar has found that the parties did the right thing under the circumstances, and that the course taken of discharging and selling the cargo was a reasonable and businesslike one:

The Marpessa (ubi sup.);
Carver on Carriage by Sea, 3rd edit., sect. 302;
Notara v. Henderson, 26 L. T. Rep. 442; 1 Asp.
Mar. Law Cas. 278; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225.

The agreement was made to minimise the loss. The expenses of warehousing cargo would not have been general average losses at all, as they would have been incurred after the ship had arrived in a place of safety. It may be that the owners of the Uskmoor recovered more than they ought to have done from the owners of the Minnetonka, but that is no answer to our claim.

Aspinall, K.C. (Pritchard with him), for the defendants, contra.—In The Marpessa (ubi sup.) the question was whether the owners of the ship could recover money actually paid, and the President (Sir F. H. Jenne) found that the loss had not legally been caused by the collision. In the present case there is the same class of claim, but the parties have come to an arrangement, and apportioned certain hypothetical expenses. The claim has first of all been made on the ground that it is in the nature of loss of freight, then of general average, and now it is called a substituted expense. It is really some sort of suggested liability which arises out of the parties having saved themselves from some hypothetical expense.

Acland, K.C. in reply.

BUCKNILL, J.—This is an application by way of appeal from the report of the registrar, on the ground that that report cannot be supported in law. The matter has been before the court on two occasions. On the last occasion the court referred the matter back to the registrar to find whether any part of the amount claimed by the Admiralty—namely, 276*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*—had in fact been allowed to the Uskmoor, in the reference between the owners of the Uskmoor and the owners of the Minnetonka, for the damage sustained by the Uskmoor in consequence of a collision between those two ships, for which they were found both to blame. The registrar has found that this amount had not been dealt with in that reference. The Uskmoor was on a voyage from the Tyne to South Africa, laden with a cargo of coal, the property of the Admiralty. During the voyage she came into collision with the Minnetonka, in consequence of which the Uskmoor herself was damaged, and also, to a certain extent, the cargo on board. The Uskmoor was then taken to the river Thames to be repaired, and it was ascertained that the repairs would take, it was estimated, about six to eight weeks, and the Admiralty and the owners of the Uskmoor very properly tried to see what could be done in the circumstances for the benefit of each other. On the 12th June the Admiralty wrote to the owners of the Uskmoor asking them what arrangements they had made with regard to the storage of the cargo on shore or in lighters during the repairs to the ship. The letter ended with this paragraph: "Until the receipt of the surveyor's (Mr. Lewis) report it will not be possible to form a definite opinion as to the best course to pursue, but I should be glad to have your views as soon as possible as to the advisability of selling the coal and considering the voyage terminated, so as to avoid the expense of storage and re-shipping." The expense of re-shipping would not fall entirely upon the cargo owners, but the expense of storage, subject to general average, would fall upon the cargo owners. That letter was answered by the owners of the Uskmoor on the 13th June, when they said the repairs would take about eight weeks, and it was impossible for them to advise the Admiralty as to the termination of the voyage, but that if the Admiralty wished to do so they would do so for the consideration of 7*s.* 6*d.* per ton "as full freight." Then on the 17th June Mr. Lewis wrote to the Admiralty, amongst other things, this: "Messrs. Runciman will now accept 1000*l.* in respect of the freight, which is a trifle more than Messrs. Hopkins, Son, and Cookes had advised you. They had written their letter to you before they could make sure whether it was 996*l.* or 1000*l.* All that is wanted from you now is a letter to Messrs. Runciman stating that you offer them 1000*l.* in respect of the freight and stating that you will give them another cargo to replace the present one at the 16*s.* rate or more if the freights should rise in the meantime, of course they giving you proper and sufficient notice when the vessel is expected to be ready, and Messrs. Runciman to have the option of refusing the offer." On the same day Messrs. Hopkins, Son, and Cookes wrote to Mr. Lowrey, the secretary of the Salvage Association, and they put the case in this way: "We beg to inform you that we have carefully considered the facts and circumstances of this case, and assuming the voyage is terminated in London and the ship-owners are paid 4*s.* 6*d.* per ton, equal 996*l.* 15*s.*, this amount will be apportioned as per annexed sheet as a substituted expense in lieu of hire of barges: Six weeks 664*l.* 10*s.*, shifting ditto 108*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, re-shipping cargo 424*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, total 1195*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*; and in addition to the above expenses which will be saved, the expected deterioration by breakage of coal, estimated by Mr. Lewis at about 10 per cent. at least on Cape Town values, and 2 per cent. for loss of weight, is avoided. It will, of course, be necessary to obtain the agreement of all interests to this arrangement." Then Mr. Lowrey wrote on the 18th June to Messrs. Hopkins, Son, and Cookes: "The ship underwriters have approved our suggestion that the coals should be sold in London and that the loss of freight should be treated as a substituted expense." The keynote of this case is that the loss of freight should be treated as a substituted expense. Then comes the letter of the 18th June,

ADM.]

BARTRAM AND SONS v. LLOYD.

setting out the figures of general average and freight, and there is the final letter from the Admiralty on the 20th June to Messrs. Runciman: "Your expression 'to pay the shipowners the sum of 1000*l.*' is understood as meaning that the sum of 1000*l.* will be apportioned on the basis stated in my letter of the 18th June, and a claim made by the owners upon the Admiralty for the portion thereof falling upon the cargo when the general average adjustment is completed." When this case first went before the registrar and merchants it was put in this way: That the shipowners and the Admiralty had agreed that the sum of 1000*l.* was to be paid for freight. To-day the claim is not for freight at all. It is not put as having anything to do with freight. That part of the case has been put on one side. It is put in this way: That the Admiralty have entered into an obligation, binding upon them, to pay to the owners of the ship 276*l.* odd, and that there was a good consideration for that binding contract between them for the abandonment of the voyage. When one comes to test the claim, to see what it really means, it comes to this, that if the voyage had not been abandoned and if the cargo had remained in barges, and if the Admiralty had become responsible to pay, as they would have become, for the hire of the barges, the amount would certainly have exceeded 276*l.* It may be that this is a sum of money which, in the circumstances of this case, the shipowners could recover from the Admiralty—I do not say it would be so or would not be so—but it does not follow that, because the Admiralty would be liable to the shipowners, therefore the Admiralty can put that liability over on to the backs of the owners of the Minnetonka, the wrongdoing ship. The only way in which the Admiralty can recover against the owners of the Minnetonka here is by showing a certain loss, or a sum of money lost; that is, a certain loss in consequence of a reasonable arrangement by the person having a claim minimising the claim which he has against the wrongdoer. But it must be a loss and a liability arising directly in consequence of the wrongdoing act of the Minnetonka. If it is not, then it is not recoverable. Is that the case here? I think not. The real facts as I find them to be and as I understand them to be, and as to them there is really no contradiction, are these: The voyage was abandoned. As between the shipowners, the Uskmoor, the cargo owners, and the Admiralty, a sum of money greater than 276*l.* was agreed to be paid. It is now said that that sum of money is a sum of money for which the Admiralty would have been liable in an event which has not in fact occurred, and that is a sum which directly represents a loss by the Admiralty occasioned by the wrongdoing of the Minnetonka. I think all these suggestions are not according to the real facts—that what really has happened is this, that the parties have put their heads together and come to some hypothetical figure not based upon fact, and not representing a direct loss or damage suffered by the Admiralty in consequence of the collision; and that therefore the Admiralty cannot make good this claim as against the owners of the Minnetonka. But there is something else which, though not absolutely conclusive, is very important to be considered, and that is that this 276*l.*, if the Admiralty could make the owners of the Minnetonka pay it, would be payable to the Uskmoor, and the owners of the Uskmoor have already been paid all the loss they have sustained in consequence of the collision; and although it is possible to conceive a case where the owners of a ship may make a profit by the wrongdoing of the other party, in this case I think the owners of the Uskmoor would not be entitled to make such a profit, although, of course, the Admiralty could not make that answer if they had undertaken, for good consideration, to pay a sum of money to the Uskmoor. In conclusion, it seems to me that this case fails, because it has not been made out in law or in fact to be a loss sustained by the Admiralty directly in consequence of the wrongdoing act of the Minnetonka. Therefore my judgment must be against the appellants, and I confirm the report No. 1 of the registrar, and also report No. 2, with the result that those who have succeeded must have the costs of this appeal, and also of the second reference.

(Before COLLINS, M.R., ROMER, and MATHEW, L.JJ.)

BARTRAM AND SONS v. LLOYD. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Principal and agent—Secret commission—Corrupt bargain—Confirmation by principal—Evidence—Necessity of full knowledge of all facts.

The defendant, acting through his agent, entered into a contract with the plaintiffs, who were shipbuilders, for the building of a ship. Before the contract was arranged the plaintiffs secretly agreed to give a commission to the defendant's agent.

At an interview which afterwards took place between the plaintiffs and the defendant as to the payment by him of money due under this contract, the plaintiffs informed him that they had agreed to pay commission to the agent, and the defendant, after being so informed, paid them a small sum on account. The plaintiffs afterwards brought an action to recover the balance due to them.

At the trial of the action Bruce, J. held that, by reason of the plaintiffs' secret agreement to give a commission to the defendant's agent, the contract was one which entitled the defendant to repudiate, but that by what had occurred at his interview with the plaintiffs he had confirmed the contract and debarred himself from repudiating it: (88 L. T. Rep. 286). On appeal:

Held, reversing the decision of Bruce, J., that the plaintiffs had not shown that there had been a full disclosure to the defendant of all the circumstances in connection with the plaintiffs' agreement to pay commission to the agent, and that therefore there had been no such confirmation by the defendant of his contract as debarred him from repudiating it.

APPEAL by the defendant from the judgment of Bruce, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover a sum of 7144*l.* as damages for breach of contract.

The plaintiffs were shipbuilders at Sunderland, and the defendant was a solicitor at Swansea.

By a contract dated the 16th July 1901 the defendant agreed to purchase, and the plaintiffs agreed to build, a steamer for 40,175*l.*

The defendant, being unable to carry out the contract, asked the plaintiffs to sell the steamer for the best price that could be obtained, and agreed that the balance of loss on the resale should be paid by him to the plaintiffs.

On account of this loss the defendant had paid to the plaintiffs 31*l.* only, and the sum of 7144*l.* was now claimed as damages due to the plaintiffs.

The defence raised was in substance that the defendant was entitled to treat the contract as not binding upon him on the ground that the plaintiffs surreptitiously and without the knowledge and in fraud of the defendant agreed to pay to one Thomas Campbell, who was acting as agent for the defendant, a percentage by way of commission on the purchase price of the steamer.

It appeared that Campbell carried on business as a broker for the sale of ships, but he was also employed by the defendant to act as his expert adviser in connection with the steamer which was the subject of the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant.

On the 11th June 1901 Campbell wrote to the plaintiffs, inclosing particulars of a proposed steamer and asking the plaintiffs to make a tender. He added: "My friend now requests me to obtain prices and see the contract carried through. Of course, he wishes me to obtain prices from several other firms."

On the 12th June the plaintiffs replied, quoting the price of 40,000*l.* on a cash basis. They added: "Price also includes 1 per cent. commission."

On the 13th June Campbell wrote to the plaintiffs acknowledging their letter, and said: "I will be pleased if you could send me another quotation without mentioning commission."

On the 14th June the plaintiffs accordingly wrote to Campbell a letter in precisely the same terms as their letter of the 12th June, save that no mention was made of commission.

On the 16th June the contract was signed.

In Sept. 1902 the arrangement was made by which the plaintiffs were to sell the steamer for the best price that could be obtained, and the defendant was to pay them the balance of loss on the resale.

On the 19th Nov. the defendant, being unable to pay this sum, went to Newcastle-upon-Tyne and had an interview with the plaintiffs. At this interview the plaintiffs told the defendant that Campbell was claiming commission from them in respect of the contract of the 16th June 1901, and they pressed the defendant to pay them something, however small, as an instalment of the money due to them from him.

The defendant then paid them 1*l.*, and they served on him the writ of summons in the present action.

At the trial of the action Bruce, J. was of opinion that the work done by Campbell in connection with the contract of the 16th June 1901 exceeded the work ordinarily done by a broker, and that in consequence of the agreement by the plaintiffs to pay him a secret commission, the defendant was entitled to repudiate his contract with the plaintiffs as soon as he was informed of the agreement to pay commission. But the learned judge, after dealing with the evidence, said: "I therefore find that the defendant, with full knowledge of all the facts relating to the dealings between the plaintiffs and Campbell, chose to approbate his contract with the plaintiffs, and on this ground the defendant cannot now be allowed to rescind the contract sued upon. I must therefore give judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed."

The case is reported 88 L. T. Rep. 286.

The defendant appealed.

The defendant in person.—The correspondence between the plaintiffs and Campbell before the completion of the contract of the 16th June 1901, with their agreement before that date to pay him commission and their re-writing of their offer, but omitting the mention of the commission, was not disclosed to me at the interview in Nov. 1902, nor did I know of it till I obtained discovery in this action. There was no complete disclosure of all the facts such as was necessary to enable the plaintiffs to rely upon an alleged confirmation by me of the contract which Bruce, J. has found that I was entitled to repudiate:

Morse v. Royal, 12 Ves. 335;

Cockerell v. Cholmeley, 1 Russ. & My. 418;

Moxon v. Payne, L. Rep. 8 Ch. App. 881.

He referred also to

Barron v. Willis, 82 L. T. Rep. 729; (1900) 2 Ch. 121.

Arthur Powell, K.C. and Adair Roche for the plaintiffs.—The agreement by the plaintiffs to pay commission to Campbell was not of such a nature as to entitle the defendant to repudiate his contract with the plaintiffs as being brought about corruptly:

Great Western Insurance Company v. Cunliffe, 30

L. T. Rep. 113, 661; L. Rep. 9 Ch. App. 525;

Bering v. Stanton, 35 L. T. Rep. 652; 3 Ch. Div. 502.

[COLLINS, M.R.—There is abundant evidence here that Campbell was not a mere broker, but was known by the plaintiffs to be acting as engineering expert and adviser to the defendant. Assuming that the defendant was entitled to repudiate the contract, yet the fact that it was induced by fraud would not render the contract void. It continued valid until the defendant determined his election by avoiding it:

Clough v. London and North-Western Railway

Company, 25 L. T. Rep. 708; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 26.

Here the defendant was informed at his interview with the plaintiffs in Nov. 1902 that they had agreed to pay commission to Campbell, and, knowing that, he paid them part of the money they claimed from him. That was an election by him, and his election is final:

Scarff v. Jardine, 47 L. T. Rep. 258; 7 App. Cas. 345.

After an election has once been made, the right to repudiate a contract is not afterwards revived by the discovery of another incident in the same fraud :

Campbell v. Fleming, 1 A. & E. 40.

The question whether an election has been made is one of fact, and the learned judge at the trial, on that question of fact, has come to a conclusion favourable to the plaintiffs :

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Bruce, J. at the trial of the action. The plaintiffs are shipbuilders, and the defendant who was formerly a solicitor was concerned in a business connected with ships. Through an agent, of the name of Campbell, the defendant entered into a contract with the plaintiffs by which they agreed to build a ship for him for 40,000*l.* Before the ship was finished the defendant found that in consequence of changes that had taken place in the conditions of the shipping trade it would be impossible for him to obtain any co-adventurers for the purpose of making a profit on the vessel. Thereupon he made an arrangement with the plaintiffs under which they were to sell the ship and he was to pay them the difference between the 40,000*l.* and the price that they could get on the sale. The plaintiffs accordingly sold the ship and have brought this action to recover from the defendant the sum of 7144*l.* being the amount of the difference between the 40,000*l.* and the price realised by the sale of the vessel. The defence raised to the action is this: the defendant says that his contract with the plaintiffs for the building of the vessel was made through Campbell acting on his behalf, and that since action brought he has ascertained that the plaintiffs had secretly agreed to pay Campbell a commission and he therefore repudiates the contract as having been brought about corruptly. Bruce, J. found at the trial that Campbell in making the contract on behalf of the defendant with the plaintiffs had not acted merely as an ordinary broker, that is, as an intermediate agent for two parties, but that there was a special relation between the defendant and Campbell which was known to the plaintiffs and which made it improper for Campbell to receive a commission from them. The learned judge was of opinion that the agreement by the plaintiffs to give Campbell a commission was such as would have debarred them from succeeding in the present action but for certain matters which happened after the making of the contract, and it was in view of these subsequent matters that the learned judge ultimately gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs. Now, it appeared that in Nov. 1902 the defendant had admitted to the plaintiffs his inability to pay the sum they claimed from him and he went to Newcastle-upon-Tyne to see them and try to settle the affair. It was at the interview that he had with them there that the writ in this action was served upon him. Bruce, J. found that during the discussion which took place at this interview the plaintiffs informed the defendant that Campbell was entitled to be paid a commission by them, and the learned judge was of opinion that as the defendant, after being so informed, had been induced by the plaintiffs to pay them l. as an instalment of the money due from him, this act of the defendant amounted to a confirmation by him of the contract which otherwise he would have been entitled to repudiate as having been obtained from him corruptly. He therefore held that the defendant had debarred himself from taking advantage of the fact that the contract had been brought about improperly by the plaintiffs. The real question that arises on this appeal is whether or not Bruce, J. was right in his conclusion of fact as to what happened at the interview between the plaintiffs and the defendant and whether anything that occurred there debars him from relying on the defence that he has raised. Now several authorities have been cited to us, and it is perfectly clear law that the adoption or ratification or confirmation by a person of a contract which he has the right to repudiate must be made with full knowledge of all the facts of the case. That is not denied. It is said that Bruce, J. found that the defendant was aware that the plaintiffs had agreed to pay a commission to Campbell, but I think he has not found that the defendant had full knowledge of all the facts. [His Lordship referred to the evidence, and said that though the defendant was told that the plaintiffs had agreed to pay a commission to Campbell he was not told that the arrangement as to the commission was made at the inception of the matter with the view of inducing Campbell to make the contract for the defendant, nor was he told of the correspondence as to the commission which passed between the plaintiffs and Campbell, or of the other facts on which the agreement was founded.] Under these circumstances, the defendant not being aware of all the facts as to the making of the contract, has he bound himself by what he did at the interview? Bruce, J. has found that the plaintiffs' agreement to pay commission to Campbell was improper, Campbell not being a mere broker but acting as expert adviser to the defendant, as the plaintiffs well knew. It seems that the plaintiffs were aware of a flaw in their position and prevailed on the defendant, at the interview, to pay them l. as evidence of a confirmation by him of the contract. I think that this payment was made by him without full knowledge of all the facts of the case, and that it does not deprive him of his right to repudiate the contract. It appears that he did not really know the facts until he obtained discovery in the action. I think that the effect of the half disclosure of the facts was not before the mind of Bruce, J., or his decision would have been the other way. For this reason I think that the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the plaintiffs' agreement to pay commission to Campbell was improper, and such as to entitle the defendant to repudiate the contract. But the plaintiffs rely on what occurred at the interview in November as a confirmation by the defendant of the contract. I think that in order to make out a proper confirmation the plaintiffs must establish a disclosure of all the material facts entitling the defendant to repudiate, and the disclosure should be such as fairly to bring home to the mind of the defendant a proper appreciation of the facts so as to put him to his election. The plaintiffs have not, in my opinion, satisfactorily established any such disclosure. The words of Lord Erskine, L.C. in Morse v. Royal (12 Ves. 355, at p. 373) seem to me very opposite. He says: "As to the doctrine of confirmation, it stands upon several authorities; where a man, having been defrauded, with complete knowledge chooses to come again in contact with the person who defrauded him; abandons his right to abrogate the contract; and enters into a plain, distinct, transaction of confirmation. But when the original fraud is clearly established by circumstances not liable to doubt, a confirmation of such a transaction is so inconsistent with justice, so unnatural, so likely to be connected with fraud, that it ought to be watched with the utmost strictness, and to stand only upon the clearest evidence; as an act, done with all the deliberation that ought to attend a transaction, the effect of which is to ratify that, which in justice ought never to have taken place." Those words are peculiarly applicable to the present case. It is impossible to suppose that the defendant could have had such a knowledge of the facts as to take upon himself deliberately the loss he would suffer under the contract. There was no possibility of his taking any benefit whatsoever by ratifying the contract. It is suggested that the defendant deliberately, and without any consideration, and without asking for any consideration for what he was doing, chose to say that he would pay a sum which he was not bound to pay. Under these circumstances it is difficult to believe in an alleged confirmation of the contract. It cannot be said that it was from a sense of honour that he took upon himself the liability under the contract. He did not know of the letters that had passed between the plaintiffs and Campbell, and if he had known of them, it would be impossible for anyone to say that he was bound upon any ground of honour to take the liability upon himself. I think that the appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendant.

APPEAL by the defendant company from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought by the Board of Trade against the owners of the sailing ship Glenpark to recover the sum of 99l. 18s. 11d., being the balance of moneys paid by the plaintiffs in respect of the maintenance and relief of certain seamen alleged to have been "distressed seamen" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

In May 1900 the Glenpark left Barry (Cardiff) on a voyage to Cape Town and (or) any ports or places within the limits of 75 degrees north and 60 degrees south latitude, the maximum time to be three years' trading in any rotation and to end in the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe between the Elbe and Brest inclusive at master's option.

On the 29th Jan. 1901 the Glenpark, in the course of her voyage, left Port Germain, in South Australia, on a voyage to Alcoa Bay, her crew consisting of twenty-six hands all told—namely, master, two mates, cook, steward, carpenter, sailmaker, boatswain, five apprentices (one of whom acted as third mate), twelve A.B.s, and one ordinary seaman.

On the 1st Feb. 1901 the Glenpark struck on a sunken rock near Wedge Island, in Spencer
Gulf, South Australia, and became a total wreck.
The crew lost the whole of their effects except the clothes they were wearing, but were saved and taken in the ship's boats to Port Victoria, in South Australia, arriving there on the 2nd Feb.
1901. The log and the agreement with the crew were lost with the vessel.

Between the 2nd and the 4th Feb. 1901 the crew were subsisted at Port Victoria by the Governor of South Australia on behalf of the Crown, acting by the Marine Board of South Australia, at a cost (excluding that incurred in respect of the master) of 13l. 1s.

On the 4th Feb. 1901 the crew were provided with passages from Port Victoria to Port Adelaide by the same authority at a cost (excluding that incurred in respect of the master) of 20l. 16s.
The crew on their arrival on the 4th Feb. at Port Adelaide were (except the master) subsisted there by the same authority at a cost of 26l. 5s., and were also provided by the same authority with necessary clothing.

On the 6th Feb. 1901 the representatives of the owners of the Glenpark at Port Adelaide, in the presence of the superintendent of the Mercantile Marine Board of South Australia, paid each member of the crew the balance of wages due to him under the agreement with the crew up to the time the vessel was lost.

The majority of the crew obtained employment at Port Adelaide, but eight members thereof failed to obtain any employment and were provided with passages to the United Kingdom by the same authority at a cost of 63*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*

The total expenses incurred on behalf of the crew (excluding the master) by the said authority amounted to the sum of 236*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*

The Board of Trade, on behalf of the Crown, paid the sum of 236*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.* to the said authority as money due to them in respect of expenses incurred on account of distressed seamen within the meaning of sect. 193 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and the Board of Trade contended that they were entitled on behalf of the Crown to recover the whole of that sum from the defendants under the same section.

The defendants paid to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs accepted, both without prejudice, various sums amounting in all to 136*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* in respect of the expenses of members of the crew, fourteen in number, and with regard to the expenses of these members the defendants admitted liability; and no question of further payment in reference to such members now arose. As regards these fourteen members of the crew, the wages so paid to them were in every case less than the amount expended on their behalf as hereinbefore mentioned. The sum of 136*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* was in fact greater by 1*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* than the amount of the said expenses, but the difference was, for the purposes of this case, treated as immaterial. The balance of the total sum of 236*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*—viz., 99*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*—had never been paid to the plaintiffs by the defendants in whole or in part, and the plaintiffs now claimed that balance from the defendants in the present action. That balance represented the amount of expenses incurred on behalf of the eleven remaining members of the crew other than the fourteen members above-mentioned, the wages paid to whom were in every case greater than the expenses so incurred.

At the trial of the action Bigham, J. held that the eleven seamen in question were "distressed seamen" within sect. 193 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 notwithstanding the fact that the wages paid to them were in excess of the expenses of their maintenance abroad and passage home. The learned judge also held that under sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, the production of the account of expenses there mentioned and proof of payment were conclusive evidence of the right of the Board of Trade to recover such expenses.

The learned judge therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The case is reported 88 L. T. Rep. 693; (1903) 2 K. B. 324.

The defendants appealed.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) contains the following provisions under the heading, "Distressed Seamen":

Sect. 190. The Board of Trade may make regulations with respect to the relief, maintenance, and sending home of seamen and apprentices found in distress abroad, and may by those regulations (in this Act referred to as the distressed seamen regulations) make such conditions as they think fit with regard to that relief, maintenance, and sending home, and a seaman shall not have any right to be relieved, maintained, or sent home except in the cases and to the extent and on the conditions provided by those regulations.

Sect. 191 (1). The following authorities, that is to say, governors of British possessions, . . . may, in accordance with and in the conditions prescribed by the distressed seamen regulations provide for the maintenance, until a passage home can be procured, of the following seamen and apprentices (who are in this Act included in the term distressed seamen) namely, (a) seamen and apprentices to the sea service, whether subjects of Her Majesty or not, who by reason of having been discharged or left behind abroad or shipwrecked from any British ship, or any of Her Majesty's ships, are in distress in any place abroad; . . . (4) The authority shall be paid in respect of the expenses of the maintenance and conveyance of distressed seamen such sums as the Board of Trade may allow, and those sums shall, on the production of the bills of disbursements, with the proper vouchers, be paid as hereinafter provided.

Sect. 193, sub-sect. 1, as amended by sect. 4 of the Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44) provides that when expenses on account of a distressed seaman for maintenance, necessary clothing, and conveyance home are incurred by or on behalf of the Crown, these expenses shall be a charge upon the ship, whether British or foreign, to which such distressed seaman or apprentice belonged, and shall be a debt to the Crown from the master of the ship or from the owner of the ship for the time being.

Sub-sect. 2 provides:

The debt, in addition to any fees which may have been incurred, may be recovered by the Board of Trade on behalf of the Crown either by ordinary process of law, or in the court and manner in which wages may be recovered by seamen.

Sub-sect. 3 provides:

In any proceeding for such recovery, the production of the account (if any) of the expenses furnished in accordance with this Act, or the distressed seamen regulations, and proof of payment of the expenses by or on behalf of the Board of Trade, shall be sufficient evidence that the expenses were incurred or repaid under this Act by or on behalf of the Crown.

Danckwerts, K.C. and Maurics Hill for the defendants.—To justify the payment of money for the relief of a distressed seaman under this Act, it is not enough to show that the seaman was "discharged or left behind abroad or shipwrecked," it must also be shown that he was "in distress." "Distressed" means "in want"—i.e., in want of something necessary which he is unable to procure for himself, as was Aeneas after his shipwreck: "Ipse ignotus egens Libya deserta peragro"; (Æn. I. 334). In the case of these eleven seamen they received wages which in each case were largely in excess of the expenditure which was actually necessary for their maintenance. With reference to sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, "sufficient evidence" does not there mean "conclusive evidence":

Barraclough v. Greenough, 8 B. & S. 623; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 612.

"Sufficient" means prima facie sufficient:

R. v. Fordham, L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 501.

An enactment altering the law as to evidence, and creating statutory evidence whereby the rights of parties may be defeated, must be construed strictly:

Northard v. Pepper, 10 L. T. Rep. 732; 17 C. B. N. S. 39, at p. 50.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, K.C.) (the Solicitor-General (Sir E. Carson, K.C.) and Henry Sutton with him) for the Board of Trade. —There was some evidence before Bigham, J. that these seamen were in distress, and no evidence was offered in opposition. It would be monstrous to say that a seaman abroad is not in distress merely because his wages are enough to pay for a passage home, and to land him penniless in England. He may have a wife and family dependant on his earnings. [He was stopped.]

Maurice Hill replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Bigham, J., and the principal point raised is a very short one. The question is whether, under the particular circumstances of this case, certain persons were "distressed seamen" within the meaning of sect. 191 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Now the question arises in this way: These sailors were shipwrecked near Australia, and they succeeded in getting in the first instance to Port Victoria, from which place they found their way ultimately to Adelaide. In the wreck they lost all their kit, in fact everything except the clothes in which they stood, but when they got to Adelaide the wages due to them up to that date were paid them by the agents of the shipowners. Now, it is not disputed that up to the time that the wages were paid at Adelaide these men were "distressed seamen," but it is contended by the shipowners that from and after the time that the wages were paid these men ceased to be "distressed seamen," and were therefore not within the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which entitle the British representative at the place where a "distressed seaman" may be to furnish him with the means for maintenance and to supply him with a passage home. Now the words under which the question arises are in sect. 191. [His Lordship read it.] It is said that these shipwrecked seamen do not come within the class of seamen there referred to because, having received their wages, they were not "in distress." It seems to me that the question whether they were, or were not, "in distress," notwithstanding the fact that they had received their wages, is a question of fact. It seems to me to be perfectly possible that a seaman who has lost everything except what he stands up in, and who has upon his shoulders the burden of a family, may very well be "in distress," although he has just been paid his wages. Wages paid to him in a foreign country afford him no provision for getting home again except at his own cost, and leave him, as I have said, with the burden of his family at home. On my reading of the section the fact that a man is shipwrecked is not conclusive evidence of his being "in distress." As was pointed out by my brother Romer in the course of the argument, a shipwrecked person may be a millionaire with plenty of money actually in his pocket so that he stands in no need of assistance from a banker or anyone else. You could not say that such a person was a "distressed seaman," and entitled under the Act to be maintained and provided with a passage home. Therefore the question whether a seaman who has been shipwrecked is "in distress" seems to me to be one of fact. That being so, what is the evidence in the present case? The evidence is that which I have stated, and then by sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, the production of the account of the expenses furnished in accordance with the Act or the distressed seamen regulations, and proof of payment of the expenses by or on behalf of the Board of Trade is "sufficient evidence" that the expenses were incurred or repaid under the Act by or on behalf of the Crown. Bigham, J. seemed to think that "sufficient evidence" was equivalent to "conclusive evidence." Without giving any opinion on that point, it seems to me that the evidence is certainly sufficient, if it is not contradicted. In the present case I think that there was plenty of evidence—in the absence of anything more to the contrary than the fact that wages of a certain amount were paid—upon which the learned judge at the trial was justified in coming to the conclusion that these men were "distressed seamen" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. In fact, on the evidence that was before him, I should have arrived at the same conclusion myself. Therefore on the facts of the case it seems to me that there is no ground for interfering with the decision of Bigham, J. On the question whether the words "sufficient evidence" in sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, mean "conclusive evidence" it is unnecessary that I should give any decision, and I therefore desire to reserve my opinion.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Whether a shipwrecked sailor is or is not at a particular port a "distressed seaman" is a question of fact. He is not of necessity a "distressed seaman" because he has been shipwrecked. For example, as was pointed out by my Lord, a man who had been shipwrecked could not fairly be called a "distressed seaman" if he arrived with 500*l.* in his pocket at a place like Port Adelaide where every necessity can be obtained. On the other hand, I certainly am not prepared to hold that a shipwrecked sailor who has lost everything, coming to a place like Port Adelaide, ceases to be a "distressed seaman" because he is paid his wages, even if those wages turn out to have been sufficient to pay for the expenses of his maintenance there, and his shipment back to England. I do not think that a man could be said to be of necessity a distressed seaman because he may have been paid his expenses to England, landing him there without a penny or without enough to enable him to keep himself at all, even for the shortest possible time on his arriving in England, especially bearing in mind, as has been pointed out, that he may have a family in England dependant on him. It is a question of fact. Now, in the present case we have what the statute calls "sufficient evidence" that these seamen were "distressed seamen" at the time in question. Against that sufficient evidence there is no sufficient evidence to be placed. That being so, I come to the conclusion, on the question of fact, that these seamen were "distressed seamen." Like the Master of the Rolls, I express no opinion, because it is unnecessary that I should do so, upon the point whether "sufficient evidence" in sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, means "conclusive evidence."

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It was not disputed that if the wages paid to the seaman were less than the amount necessary to bring him back to England he would be a "distressed seaman." He would certainly be so, if he were in that position. If that be so, it seems to me that it is a question of fact to be determined by the court how far wages paid to a man under those circumstances were available for the purpose of bringing him home. As I pointed out, it makes a serious alteration in the terms of the contract between the shipowner and the seaman. Now, what is the evidence here? We have before us the account upon which the authorities in Australia acted, and that account, it is said, is evidence that they must have been satisfied as regards each of these men that they continued to be "distressed seamen." If the case were that a seaman, shipwrecked abroad, must arrive destitute in this country if his wages were to be chargeable with the expense of bringing him home, I should approve of the judgment of the official who said that a seaman does not cease to be a "distressed seaman" by reason of the fact that if his wages were paid at once he would be able to discharge his present obligations. As to the meaning of the expression "sufficient evidence" in sect. 193, sub-sect. 3, it is unnecessary to express any opinion whether or not the words mean "conclusive evidence," because there was undoubtedly, in the present case, evidence before the court upon which the court was entitled to act, as it remained unanswered on the part of the shipowners. For these reasons I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

[CT. OF APP.]

Appeal dismissed.

TAYLOR v. HAMSTEAD COLLIERY COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Scheme under Workmen's Compensation Act 1897—Bar to a right of action for damages for negligence—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-s. 2 (b); s. 3, sub-s. 1.

By a scheme which had been duly certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies under sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, a society was established to raise funds by the contributions of the employers and the workmen at certain collieries to make provision for the workmen in case of accidents; and the rules of the society provided that the contributions made by the employers to the society were to be in lieu of, and to exempt them from, any further claims which otherwise the members of the society might be entitled to prosecute as the result of accidents occurring during their employment.

A workman who had accepted this scheme and become a member of the society met with an injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment which resulted in his death.

His widow, after receiving certain sums as compensation under the terms of the scheme, brought an action against the deceased's employers under the Employers' Liability Act 1880 to recover damages for the death of her husband.

Held, reversing the decision of the Divisional Court (Wills and Kennedy, JJ.), that under sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 the acceptance of the scheme was a bar to her action for damages.

APPEAL by the defendant company from a judgment of the Divisional Court (Wills and Kennedy, JJ.), reversing a decision of the judge of the Birmingham County Court.

The action was brought by the widow of a deceased workman under the Employers' Liability Act 1880 and the Fatal Accidents Act 1846, to recover damages from the defendants, the employers of the deceased workman, in respect of an accident caused by the alleged negligence of the defendants whereby the workman was killed.

At the hearing before the County Court judge the defendants took certain preliminary objections—namely, that the plaintiff had accepted a registered scheme under sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897; that the representatives and dependants of the deceased workman had received and were then receiving payment under that scheme; that that relief was substituted for relief under sect. 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and that therefore, under sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), this action could not lie.

The learned judge required evidence to be given of the facts necessary to raise this point, and after hearing such evidence he found as facts (1) That there was a duly certified scheme within sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897; (2) that the deceased workman had accepted the scheme willingly and under no compulsion whatever, and with full knowledge of its terms, in substitution for and in place of the benefits he might claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act; (3) that this was a legal and effectual contract with the deceased workman and the defendants; (4) that the plaintiff had received up to the week before the hearing of the action, was receiving, and would in future receive, the full benefits under the scheme thus contracted for.

It appeared from the evidence that the payments were made to the plaintiff by the colliery company in the first instance, and that on the company handing the receipts for the same to the fund, the fund repaid the employers the money they had paid to the plaintiff.

The learned County Court judge held that this compensation under the scheme was compensation under sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, which the deceased workman had elected to claim, if and when occasion arose, and that consequently the employers were, under sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), not liable both to pay that compensation (which as a fact they had paid and were paying) and also to proceedings under the Employers' Liability Act; that the fund repaid the employers was part of the contract by which the workmen contracted to take payments out of the fund in place of the compensation which otherwise they could have claimed under the Workmen's Compensation Act; and that to allow them to recover in addition compensation under the Employers' Liability Act would be, it appeared to the judge, to allow them to recover compensation twice over—the very thing forbidden by sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and would set aside (without any evidence whatever of fraud or unfairness) the contract expressly meant to protect the employers against liability. Consequently he decided that the action would not lie—the word “workmen” including by the interpretation clause of the Workmen's Compensation Act, in the case of death, “his legal personal representative, or dependants, or person to whom compensation would be payable”—and he dismissed the action.

Sect. 1 (1). If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this Act. (2) Provided that (b) When the injury was caused by the personal negligence or wilful act of the employer, or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this Act shall affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this Act, or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of this Act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this Act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this Act, except in case of such personal negligence or wilful act as aforesaid.

Sect. 3 (1). If the Registrar of Friendly Societies, after taking steps to ascertain the views of the employer and workmen, certifies that any scheme of compensation, benefit, or insurance for the workmen of an employer in any employment, whether or not such scheme includes other employers and their workmen, is on the whole not less favourable to the general body of workmen and their dependants than the provisions of this Act, the employer may, until the certificate is revoked, contract with any of those workmen that the provisions of the scheme shall be substituted for the provisions of this Act, and thereupon the employer shall be liable only in accordance with the scheme, but, save as aforesaid, this Act shall apply notwithstanding any contract to the contrary made after the commencement of this Act.

James Wilson for the appellant.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that the action was barred. The deceased workman never exercised the option given to him by the Act in sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b). There was not a valid election by him which would have prevented him from proceeding under the Employers' Liability Act when an accident arose, if the injury had not resulted in his death. That being so, there is no bar to the claim of the widow in this case. The acceptance of a scheme under sect. 3 of the Act does not debar a workman from bringing an action independently of the Act, the effect of adopting such a scheme being merely to substitute it for the compensation provided in sched. 1 of the Act. [He was stopped.]

C. E. Allan (Shakespeare with him) for the respondents.—The County Court judge was right.

It is submitted that sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), is a bar to this action being brought. That sub-section says that where the injury was caused by the personal negligence of the employer nothing in the Act should affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman might, “at his option,” either claim compensation under the Act, or take such proceedings as he could have taken before the Act. It is contended that the workman did exercise his option in this case to take compensation under the Act, and that therefore, if he had not been killed, he could not have maintained any claim outside the Act. Sect. 3 provides for a scheme of compensation or insurance to be certified and approved by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, and also provides that the employer may contract with a workman that the provisions of the scheme shall be substituted for the provisions of the Act, and the section says that “thereupon the employer shall be liable only in accordance with the scheme.” The learned judge has found as a fact that there was in this case a duly certified scheme within sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Act, and has also found as a fact that the deceased workman had accepted the scheme and that there was an effectual contract between the deceased workman and the employers. It follows from that, by sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, that the scheme becomes substituted for the Act, and, reading this substitution into the provisions of sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), “the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this Act or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of this Act.” The workman has got an option; he has got an election as to which he will choose, compensation under the Act of 1897 or compensation outside and apart from that Act. But he cannot elect to take both; he cannot in respect of the same injury both take compensation under the Act of 1897 and then claim compensation outside the Act, as under the Employers' Liability Act. The scheme being substituted for the Act, by acceptance of the scheme and by taking the benefits under it the deceased workman exercised his option to claim compensation under the Act of 1897, and if the accident had not resulted in his death he could not have claimed compensation outside the Act. The widow of the deceased can be in no better position than the workman himself was in. She also took the benefits of the scheme, and if she can sue under the Employers' Liability Act the defendants would be bound to pay compensation twice over for the same injury, but by sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), the employer is not liable to pay compensation “both independently of and also under this Act.” The point is a new one, not having been raised before in this country, but it was considered by the Court of Session in Scotland in the case of Little v. MacLellan (2 Fraser, 387), where it was held that where there had been a receipt of payments as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 the workman could not afterwards bring an action under the Employers' Liability Act. [WILLS, J.—That case does not seem to touch the present case at all. All it shows is that if there is an election to take compensation under the Act of 1897 it is a bar to proceedings under the Employers' Liability Act.] Yes; that is all.

James Wilson was not called upon to reply.

TAYLOR v. HAMSTEAD COLLIERY COMPANY LIMITED.

[CT. OF APP.]

WILLS, J.—This case has been very well argued, and, shortly put, the contention for the defendants comes to this, that under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897, s. 1, sub-s. 2, the plaintiff, who complains of injury caused by the personal negligence of the employers or of a servant of the employers for whom the employers are liable, which gave rise to a cause of action, has a choice of two remedies—the one a remedy for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and the other a remedy by a proceeding independently of the Act, which, for brevity, may be called the common law action. So far as that proposition is concerned, we are entirely in agreement with counsel for the defendants in his contention. But his contention went further, and it was said that although the plaintiff in this case had not proceeded under the Workmen's Compensation Act, yet she had proceeded under and availed herself of the benefit of a scheme which would have excluded the operation of the Act, and that therefore the state of circumstances is exactly the same as if she had proceeded under the Workmen's Compensation Act. If the Act had intended that the acceptance of benefits under a scheme should be on the same footing as compensation under the Act, it would have been easy for the Legislature to have said so. But the Legislature has not said so, and there appears to me to be no satisfactory ground for taking that view, and there is no ground for saying that a person taking a benefit under a scheme for compensation is in the same position as a person taking compensation under the Act. On looking at sect. 1, sub-s. 2 (b), we see that that was not the meaning or intention of the Legislature. That sub-section says that the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury "both independently of and also under this Act," showing that it was the taking compensation under this Act, which was to be the bar to proceedings taken independently of the Act. Then as to the scheme of compensation, sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, does not say that the scheme is to be compensation under the Act; the scheme is not compensation under the Act, but is to "be substituted" for the compensation which the Act provides, and when we look at what the registrar has to take into account in certifying a scheme under that section, we see that there may be schemes which may be adopted which are not what the Act calls compensation. I think, therefore, that we should not be justified in reading into the Act a qualification that the acceptance of a scheme should be equivalent to compensation under the Act, a qualification which is not in the Act. When the question arises as to whether what the plaintiff has received under the scheme can be taken into consideration in estimating the damages, it may be that the sums she has received under the scheme ought to be taken into account. But however that may be, it seems to me that the receipt of such sums is not an answer to the common law remedy in respect of the injury.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. My brother Wills has so accurately expressed my views on the subject that it is not necessary for me to add anything, except to say that I am not quite sure whether compensation received under a scheme of insurance would not be an answer as to the quantum of damages; but on the grounds upon which we decide this case, I so agree with my brother Wills that I do not wish to add anything.

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal.

The defendant company appealed.

Upon the hearing of the appeal reference was made to the rules of the society of which the deceased workman had become a member on his acceptance of the scheme above mentioned.

The society was called the South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire Mining District Compensation Fund, and was composed of an unlimited number of ordinary members above twelve years of age employed in or about the collieries and ironstone mines of the South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire mining district.

It was registered as a friendly society in 1899, under the Friendly Societies Act 1896, and the scheme was certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies to be on the whole not less favourable to the general body of workmen and their dependants than the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

The printed rules of the society contained the following rule:

Rule 3. The objects of this society are the raising of funds by certain specified contributions from the employers and workmen of the collieries and ironstone mines of the South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire mining district, to make provision in cases of fatal and non-fatal accidents, as follows:—(a) a sum at the death of any member; (b) a weekly allowance to the widows and children of married members whose death was the result of an accident; (c) a weekly allowance to the dependants of members over sixteen years of age whose death is the result of an accident, such dependants being members of a workman's family as specified in the Fatal Accidents Act 1846; (d) a weekly allowance to members who suffer from non-fatal accidents. The society is formed under the powers given by sect. 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and the contributions made by the employers to this society are to be in lieu of and to exempt them from any further claims which otherwise the members of this society may be entitled to prosecute as the result of accidents occurring during their employment.

W. Shakespeare (Arthur Powell, K.C. with him) for the defendants.—The deceased workman accepted this scheme as one of the terms of his contract of employment. By that scheme he has contracted himself out of the Employers' Liability Act 1880, and in place of the benefits of that Act has accepted the benefits of the scheme. A workman may lawfully contract himself out of the Employers' Liability Act 1880:

Griffiths v. Earl of Dudley, 47 L. T. Rep. 10; 9 Q. B. Div. 357.

His widow is bound by his agreement under that Act. Secondly, under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 the acceptance of the scheme is a bar to any other remedy being pursued in respect of an injury by accident which is the subject of compensation under that Act. Under sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), an injured workman who is entitled to compensation must elect between his right to compensation under the Act and any other legal right of action which he may have. The only case in which he is entitled to pursue two different remedies is a case where an action for damages is brought and fails, and the workman then and there asks the judge that compensation may be assessed under the Act:

Edwards v. Godfrey, 80 L. T. Rep. 672; (1899) 2 Q. B. 333.

That case has been discussed by the Court of Appeal in Ireland:

Beckley v. Scott and Co., (1902) 2 I. R. 504.

By rule 3 of the scheme, and by sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Act, compensation under the scheme is substituted for compensation under the Act, and a workman by accepting the provisions scheme instead of the provisions of the Act has exercised the option which he has under sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b). After electing to rely on the scheme he is in the same position as if he had elected to rely upon his right of compensation, and consequently cannot, after that, pursue any other remedy which otherwise he may have had. The claim under the scheme which was made in pursuance of the provisions of sect. 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, is a claim "under the Act," and not a claim made "independently of the Act," within sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b).

James Wilson for the plaintiff.—Compensation under the scheme is not compensation "under the Act." The scheme merely prevents the workmen from claiming compensation under the Act. It does not profess to do anything more than that, and has no reference whatever to any right of action under the Employers' Liability Act. I admit that the sum received under the scheme may be taken into consideration in assessing the damages in the action that has been brought, but submit that the scheme is no bar to the action. The plaintiff has never exercised any option in accepting benefits from the fund as an alternative to her right of action.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court overruling a decision of Judge Whitehorn at the Birmingham County Court. The appeal raises a question of considerable importance, because the point in dispute is one which concerns a great many collieries in the Midlands. A workman in the service of the defendant colliery company met with his death by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. His widow has brought an action against the company under the Employers' Liability Act 1880. At the hearing of that action before the County Court judge it appeared that at the defendant company's collieries a scheme had been adopted which provided a method for compensation in the case of injuries or deaths of workmen employed there. The defendant company took the point that the existence of this scheme was an answer to the action. The County Court judge arrived at certain findings of fact, and he held that the agreement of the deceased workman to the scheme and the acceptance by the plaintiff of compensation under it was a bar to the plaintiff's action. The County Court judge's findings of fact and his holding in law were as follows: [His Lordship read them.] Now, the enactment upon which the judgment of the Divisional Court turned was sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. That section is an expression by the Legislature that when injury has been caused to a workman by the negligence of his employer, or of someone for whom the employer is responsible, the three remedies open to the workman—namely, his remedy at common law, his remedy under the Employers' Liability Act 1880, and his remedy under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897—are not concurrent, but separate, remedies, and the workman must exercise his right of option between them and choose which one he will pursue. That was the view which was taken of that section by this court in Edwards v. Godfrey (ubi sup.). The headnote to that case in the Law Reports runs thus: "Where a workman, who has been injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, brings an unsuccessful action to recover damages against his employer, and is desirous of having compensation for his injury assessed under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, he must follow the procedure prescribed by sect. 1, sub-sect. 4, of that Act, and must apply then and there to the judge trying the action for an assessment of compensation; he cannot at a subsequent date initiate independent proceedings against his employer by a request for arbitration under that Act." Smith, L.J. said that sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), gives to a workman, in cases where he would previously have had a right of action, an option, which he may exercise as he likes, of bringing an action at common law, or of resorting to the procedure for the assessment of compensation given by the Act itself. He said: "The respondent has availed himself of the right given him by that sub-section; he has exercised his option in favour of bringing a common law action, which has failed. Having been defeated in this action, there would, but for the provisions of sect. 1, sub-sect. 4, have been an end of any claim by the respondent against the appellant in respect of the injury. That sub-section, however, is in favour of the workman, and gives him a very great advantage where he has exercised his option and finds too late that he has exercised it in the wrong way; it gives him a locus penitentiae, and enables the County Court judge before whom the action is tried, if applied to by the plaintiff at the time, to assess compensation under the Act." That judgment was concurred in by Williams and Romer, L.JJ. Therefore that is a decision by the Court of Appeal that a remedy by action and a remedy by arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 are in a sense inconsistent, and that a workman must elect which remedy he will pursue, and, having pursued one course, he cannot afterwards pursue the other. I now come to sect. 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, which deals with the power of a workman to contract himself out of the Act. Sub-sect. 1 provides that a scheme of compensation may be drawn up, and, if it complies with certain conditions, it may be certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, and then the employer may contract with his workmen that the provisions of the scheme shall be substituted for the provisions of the Act, and thereupon the employer shall be liable only in accordance with the scheme. The County Court judge has found that the scheme at the defendants' collieries has satisfied the condition of the Act and has been certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, and that the deceased workman had accepted the scheme willingly and without compulsion. That being so, the provisions of the scheme are substituted for the provisions of the Act. If the widow here had claimed compensation under the Act she could not afterwards have taken proceedings under the Employers' Liability Act 1880. But it is said that she has not received compensation under the Act, but was only in receipt of benefits under the scheme. The answer is that the scheme is substituted for the provisions of the Act. It seems to me that a workman who has accepted the benefits of a scheme as a substitute for his rights under the Act is in precisely the same position as if he had taken the rights given him by the Act. The Divisional Court decided this case on a different ground. They referred to sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), at the end of which it is enacted that "the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this Act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this Act except in case of such personal negligence or wilful act as aforesaid." They said that an action under the Employers' Liability Act 1880 is a remedy which is independent of the Act of 1897, and therefore it would exclude a claim for compensation under the latter Act; but then they said that a claim under this scheme is not a proceeding under the Act, but one which stands upon its own merits; and therefore they said there is no incompatibility between an action under the Employers' Liability Act 1880 and the acceptance of benefits under the scheme. But, though a claim for compensation under the scheme is not a proceeding under the Act, yet the acceptance of compensation under the scheme is undoubtedly a bar to proceedings for compensation under the Act, because its provisions are substituted for the provisions of the Act, and a workman who has taken the advantages of the scheme is in the same position as if he had received compensation under the Act. Here the deceased workman before the accident happened had by his contract with the defendant company accepted the scheme, and his widow has received payments under it. She is in no better position in this respect than he would have been, and she is in the same position as if she had instituted proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 and had obtained compensation. I agree with the decision of the learned County Court judge, and I think that the judgment of the Divisional Court must be reversed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. When a scheme has been certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies under sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 and a contract between the employer and his workmen such as is referred to in that sub-section has been entered into, then, in my opinion, the workman, and those claiming through him under the provisions of the scheme, are bound by that contract to accept the provisions of the scheme as substituted for the provisions of the Act, and are in the same position as if he and they had availed himself or themselves of the provisions of the Act by claiming compensation under it, and in such a case they cannot afterwards avail themselves of any other remedy which they might have had either at common law or under any statute passed before the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. That appears to be so from the provisions of the Act which have been referred to by my Lord, and in particular from the words at the end of sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, that "the provisions of the scheme shall be substituted for the provisions of this Act, and thereupon the employer shall be liable only in accordance with the scheme." In the present case there is a scheme that has been certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, and rule 3 of that scheme is as follows: [His Lordship read it.] The defendant company contributed to the funds of the society, and the deceased workman was a member of the society, so that this clause applies here. The scheme carried out in substance the provisions of sect. 3 of the Act, and indeed we have the findings of the County Court judge that the deceased workman accepted the scheme willingly and under no compulsion whatever, and with full knowledge of its terms, in substitution for, and in place of, the benefits which he might claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act. So that there is nothing which prevents the scheme from being part of a binding and valid contract between the workman and his employers. Then, at the end of rule 3, we find it provided that the contributions made by the employers to the society are to be in lieu of and to exempt them from any further claim which otherwise the members of the society may be entitled to prosecute as the result of accidents occurring during their employment. The meaning of those words cannot be cut down. They mean what they say, and they carry out that which is enacted in sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Act. They are, therefore, valid and binding. It follows that those who claim under the deceased workman to be entitled to the benefits of the scheme are debarred from bringing an action under the Employers' Liability Act 1880. The deceased workman has expressly contracted that, by the benefits of the scheme being taken, the defendants shall be exempted from any other claim in respect of an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. As has been observed, the point upon which we are now deciding this case was not really brought to the attention of the Divisional Court, and therefore was not dealt with in their judgment. I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 points out the terms and conditions under which a workman may contract himself out of the benefits of the Act. The County Court judge has found that a scheme which satisfied the requirements of the section, and which was duly certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, was accepted by the deceased workman. In doing that the workman exercised the option which was offered him by sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), of the Act, and he and his widow are bound thereby. Having exercised his option to rely upon the benefits given by a scheme certified under the Act, a workman cannot afterwards claim a right to any of his alternative remedies. He must abide by his election. Sub-sect. 4 of sect. 1 gives a workman a right, in case he should bring an action for damages and the action should be dismissed, to claim compensation under the Act of 1897, subject to certain conditions. That is the only case in which, after making his election, he is entitled to make use of an alternative remedy. This is a very important provision to employers, because it gets rid of any liability on their part to be subjected to a succession of proceedings in respect of one matter. We are bound by the decision of this court in Edwards v. Godfrey (ubi sup.), and it would be impossible to give effect to that decision unless we held that the option of the workman is limited, and must be exercised in the way that I have mentioned. The deceased workman and his widow were undoubtedly bound by his acceptance of the scheme. With reference to the case of Beckley v. Scott and Co. (ubi sup.), I will only add that I have been much struck with the cogent reasoning of the judgment of Holmes, L.J.

CT. OF APP.] FRANK WARR & CO. LIMITED v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. [CT. OF APP.]

FRANK WARR AND CO. LIMITED v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Compensation—Right to supply refreshments in a theatre—Use of cellars—Right to let spaces for advertisements—Licence—"Interest in land"—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.

The lessees of a theatre by a written agreement granted to a refreshment contractor at a fixed weekly rental, for the term of the lease of the theatre, the free and exclusive right to sell refreshments there, with the necessary use of the refreshment-rooms, bars, cloakrooms, and cellars of the theatre, together with the right, during the usual hours, of free access thereto as might be necessary and usual and proper for the purpose of exercising the rights thus granted, and also the sole and exclusive privilege during the term of advertising and letting spaces for advertisements in the refreshment and cloak rooms.

Held (affirming the judgment of Wright, J., reported 88 L. T. Rep. 689), that the agreement did not create any "interest in land" within the meaning of sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, so as to entitle the refreshment contractor to compensation on the theatre being taken over under the Act.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Wright, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover the sum of 2568*l.* 9*s.* which had been awarded in an arbitration under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 as the amount of purchase money and compensation to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs for the plaintiffs' interest (if any) in the Globe Theatre, London, which had been purchased compulsorily by the defendants under their statutory powers.

On the 3rd May 1900 the Countess of Kilmorey demised to William Greet and Edward Coryton Engelbach the premises situated in Newcastle-street and Wych-street, Strand, known as the Globe Theatre, for the term of twenty-one years at the rent and subject to the covenants and conditions set out in the indenture of lease.

On the 16th June 1900 W. Greet and E. C. Engelbach entered into the following agreement with the plaintiffs in the present action, who carried on business as refreshment contractors :

An agreement made this 16th day of June 1900 between Messrs. W. Greet and E. C. Engelbach, lessees of the Globe Theatre, Newcastle-street, Strand, London (hereinafter called the landlords for themselves, their heirs, executors, or administrators), of the one part and Frank Warr and Co. Limited, refreshment contractors, of No. 6, Duke-street, Adelphi, Strand, London (hereinafter called the tenants for themselves, their executors and administrators) of the other part witnesseth that (1) the landlords hereby grant and let, and the tenants hereby take, for the term of the landlords' lease commencing the 1st day of Sept. 1900 the free and exclusive right to sell refreshments at the Globe Theatre, Newcastle-street, Strand, London, with the necessary use of the refreshment-rooms and bars and cloakrooms and wine cellars of the said theatre, together with the free right, during the usual hours, of the tenants, their servants and agents, of free access to and from all parts of the house, including the front of the theatre and premises, as may be necessary and is usual and proper according to the custom of the theatres for the purpose of exercising the rights granted by this agreement, and also the free and exclusive right during the aforesaid term of supplying to the visitors and other people attending the theatre wines, spirits, liqueurs, cigars, cigarettes, flowers, scent, and refreshments of all kinds, programmes, books of words, books of music, opera glasses, and all other articles, and of providing cloakrooms and other accommodation, and also the sole and exclusive privilege during the aforesaid term of advertising and letting spaces for advertisements which shall be confined to the refreshment and cloak-rooms and on all programmes used and offered for sale at the said theatre. (2) The tenants shall pay to the landlords in respect of the said right hereby granted the weekly rental of 35*l.* and 2*l.* for each matinee. (3) The tenants shall supply at their own expense suitable programmes for the use of the audience of the said theatre to be approved by the landlords; the advertisements in the theatre shall be confined to the refreshment bars and rooms and cloakrooms, and such advertisements shall be of such a nature as will not injure the character of the theatre and as are usually found in first-class theatres. (4) The tenants shall provide and maintain a proper and efficient staff of attendants for the service of the refreshment bars and rooms and cloakrooms, and for the sale of programmes, books of words, music, and other articles. (5) In the event of any incivility, misconduct, or breach of any of the rules and regulations of the theatre on the part of any of the employees of the tenants, the landlords or their representatives to have power to call upon the tenants to discharge any such employee. (6) The tenants shall be entitled to charge, receive, and retain all reasonable and usual fees and profits for the sale of refreshments, programmes, books of words, music, cloakroom and other articles supplied to the audience and others of the said theatre, and for the letting of advertising spaces. There is to be a fixed charge for programmes as follows: for boxes, stalls, dress and upper circle, the charge is to be 6*d.*; and for the pit and gallery the charge to be 2*d.*; and the cloakroom charge to be 6*d.* (7) The wines, liqueurs, and other refreshments supplied by the tenants shall be of good quality, and the refreshment bars and rooms and cloak rooms shall be conducted in a proper and orderly manner in accordance with the rules of the theatre and the customs of the refreshment-rooms in first-class theatres. (8) If from any cause whatever no performance shall be given in the theatre on any day or days other than a Sunday in any week, the tenants shall be entitled in respect of each such day or days on which no performance shall be given to a remittance of one sixth part of the week's rent, such remittance to be deducted and allowed from the next payment of rent. (9) The tenants agree to print, provide, and distribute at their own cost programmes free of charge on the first night performance of any new or revised piece, but not on any opening piece or farce except a principal piece. (10) The landlords agree that they will not distribute or allow to be distributed any printed slip containing the full cast or synopsis of scenery, or anything that could be used instead of a programme. If at any time during the term herein granted any difference shall arise between the landlords and the tenants in regard to the construction of this agreement, such difference shall at once forthwith be referred to arbitration in all respects pursuant to the Arbitration Act 1889 or any statutory modification thereof. As witness the hands of the said parties. . . .

From the 1st Sept. 1900 until immediately before the defendants took possession of the Globe Theatre, the plaintiffs used and occupied the refreshment-rooms, bars, cloakrooms, and wine cellars as and when they required them, and exercised the rights, powers, and privileges conferred upon them by this agreement in accordance with the provisions of the agreement.

On the 17th Feb. 1902 the defendants gave to the plaintiffs a notice in writing that by virtue of an Act of 62 & 63 Vict. c. cclxvi., entitled an Act to empower the London County Council to make a new street from Holborn to the Strand, &c., the defendants required to take for the purpose of the works the premises mentioned and described in the schedule to such notice. The property mentioned and described in the schedule included the refreshment-rooms and bars, cloakrooms, and wine cellars at the Globe Theatre. By the notice the defendants required particulars of the plaintiffs' estate and interests in the premises and of the claims made by the plaintiffs in respect thereof. The defendants further gave the plaintiffs notice that they were willing to treat for the purchase of the said premises, and as to the compensation to be made for the damage that might be sustained by reason of the execution of the works.

On the 4th March 1902 the plaintiffs, in pursuance of the notice, served on the defendants a notice in writing by which the plaintiffs claimed compensation for their estate, share, or interest in the premises which the defendants required under their notice. The estate, share, or interest in respect of which the plaintiffs claimed was the exclusive right to sell refreshments together with the necessary use of the refreshment-rooms and bars, cloakrooms, and wine cellars held by them under the agreement of the 16th June 1900. The plaintiffs also claimed compensation for the bar and other fittings, fixtures, and furniture belonging to the plaintiffs on the premises.

On or about the 1st April 1902 the defendants under their statutory powers took possession of the Globe Theatre, in consequence of which the plaintiffs became unable to exercise any of the rights, powers, and privileges granted and let to them by the agreement of the 16th June 1900.

By an indenture dated the 16th April 1902, and made between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the plaintiffs and defendants agreed to appoint an arbitrator to determine the amount of purchase money and compensation to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs for the interest (if any) of the plaintiffs in the land and hereditaments, and also the amount of damage (if any) for disturbance or loss of value in furniture and fixtures, or expenses of removal or other loss incidental to or by reason of the taking by the defendants of the lands and hereditaments to which the plaintiffs might be entitled by reason of the exercise by the defendants of their statutory powers. It was recited in the indenture that the defendants did not admit that the plaintiffs had any interest in the lands and hereditaments, but that they concurred in the appointment of the arbitrator without prejudice to their right to dispute in any action or other proceedings their liability to pay any purchase money or compensation to the plaintiffs for or by reason of the taking of such lands and hereditaments.

On or about the 27th May 1902 an arbitration was held to determine the amount of purchase money and compensation to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs.

On the 28th July 1902 the arbitrator published his award in writing by which he awarded to the plaintiffs the sum of 2586l. 9s. as purchase money and compensation to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs for the plaintiffs' interest (if any) in the lands and hereditaments, and the amount of damage (if any) for disturbance and loss in value of furniture and fixtures and expenses of removal and other loss incidental to or by reason of the taking by the defendants of the lands and hereditaments in exercise of the statutory powers conferred on them.

The defendants refused to pay to the plaintiffs the sum of 2586l. 9s. or any part thereof, and this action was brought to recover that amount.

At the trial of the action before Wright, J. without a jury the learned judge held that the plaintiffs had not acquired under the agreement of the 16th June 1900 any interest in land within the meaning of sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and he therefore gave judgment for the defendants.

The case is reported 88 L. T. Rep. 689.

The plaintiffs appealed.

The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18) provides as follows:

Sect. 68. If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands, or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of the works, and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, and if the compensation claimed in such case shall exceed the sum of fifty pounds, such party may have the same settled either by arbitration or by the verdict of a jury. . . .

Witt, K.C. and J. D. Crawford for the plaintiffs.—Under the agreement of the 16th June 1900 the plaintiffs acquired an "interest in land" within the meaning of sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845. "Interest" is a word of wide signification, and means something more than "estate." The plaintiffs have the user of a defined piece of ground, at all times when it can be used, for a fixed period of years, for the purpose of carrying on there a business with a view to making a profit, and the fact that a profit is made is shown by the award of the arbitrator. It is not necessary for the plaintiffs to show that the profit issues out of the land. The expression profit à prendre is used in some of the older cases, not in its technical meaning, but descriptive of a licence enabling a licensee to do on land something out of which he may make a profit, and therefore allowing him to exercise the licence by means of his servants and agents, as distinguished from a licence to do something for pleasure, a licence of that kind being purely personal :

Wickham v. Hawker, 7 M. & W. 63.

In that case a grant to a person, his heirs and assigns, of free liberty with servants or otherwise to come upon certain lands and there hawk, hunt, fish, and fowl, was held to be a licence of profit and within sect. 2 of the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4. c. 71). A licence to search for and raise metals and carry them away and convert them to the licensee's own use passes an interest which is capable of being assigned :

Muskett v. Hill, 5 Bing. N. C. 694.

A grant of a right to shoot over land and take away part of the game has been held to be an interest in land within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds :

Webber v. Lee, 47 L. T. Rep. 215 ; 9 Q. B. Div. 315.

The same has been held with reference to a right under an agreement for the sale of building materials to be taken down and removed by the purchaser :

Lavery v. Purcell, 58 L. T. Rep. 846 ; 39 Ch. Div. 508.

A right granted to the lessee of certain mines and minerals to sink a pit anywhere within certain limits in land, the surface of which was not demised, has been held to be an interest which entitled the lessee of the mine to compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 :

Re Arbitration between Masters and Great Western Railway Company, 84 L. T. Rep. 515 ; (1901) 2 Q. B. 84.

They referred also on this point to

Temple Pier Company v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 12 L. T. Rep. 369 ; Westminster Corporation v. Johnson, 89 L. T. Rep. 562 ; (1904) 1 K. B. 19.

There is no case directly in point against the plaintiffs' contention, but two cases were relied upon in the court below as being in the defendants' favour :

Bird v. Great Eastern Railway Company, 13 L. T. Rep. 365 ; 19 C. B. N. S. 268 ;

Edwards v. Barrington, 85 L. T. Rep. 659, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal in Daly v. Edwards, 83 L. T. Rep. 548.

It is true that in Bird v. Great Eastern Railway Company the liberty granted to the plaintiff of shooting and fishing over a certain piece of land for the term of three years was held by the Court of Commons Pleas not to be an interest in land which could be the subject-matter of compensation under sect. 68. But there the plaintiff had nothing more than an equitable right, which in 1865 was not a matter for compensation. And Willes, J. put it on the ground that the plaintiff could have had no right of action against his landlord if the landlord had done what the railway company was doing. Edwards v. Barrington is distinguishable. That was a question whether the landlord was entitled to re-enter on a forfeiture by a breach of covenant. There the leaning of the court was against declaring anything a forfeiture unless compelled to do so. Here the question arises under a statute passed with the object of giving compensation to persons whose rights have been interfered with, and the court ought to try and give a construction of the Act which will compensate the plaintiffs, whose rights have undoubtedly been injured by the acts of the defendants. From another point of view this agreement gives an interest in land. It gives the plaintiffs the "necessary use" of the refreshment-rooms and cellars. That must be equivalent to "exclusive use." The cellars, where large quantities of wines and spirits are kept, must of necessity be kept locked, and, in fact, the plaintiffs have always had a key. That is in evidence. The plaintiffs are therefore in sole occupation of the cellars. Even if the theatre be closed, the lessees would have no power under this agreement to turn them out. The cellars have in fact been demised to the plaintiffs. There was also a demise to them of the walls of the refreshment-rooms, &c., for the purpose of exercising their right to fasten advertisements on them.

Dickens, K.C. and Edward Morten, for the defendants, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Wright, J. in an action upon an award in favour of the plaintiffs, in a claim by them for compensation under sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 in respect of an interest in land which they say has been taken or injuriously affected by the London County Council. The arbitrator has assessed the damages as upon an interference with the plaintiffs' rights, and the question in this action is whether there was such an interference with the plaintiffs' rights as to entitle them to any compensation under the Act. It is perfectly clear from the language of sect. 68 that the foundation of the plaintiffs' right to compensation is—to put it at its lowest—an interest in land. The plaintiffs say that they have an interest in certain lands—namely, the Globe Theatre—an interest arising under the agreement whereby they acquired the right to sell refreshments, and other incidental privileges, at the theatre. The question is whether or not that agreement was one which conferred on them an interest in land. It has been pressed upon us that under that agreement the plaintiffs took something more than a mere licence or privilege, but, notwithstanding the very able argument that has just been addressed to us, I am bound to say that I see no escape from the conclusion at which Wright, J. has arrived, and I agree with him that the decision of the House of Lords in Edwards v. Barrington (ubi sup.), which turned upon the effect of an agreement very like the one we have to deal with, is conclusive and binding upon us in this case. The question in Edwards v. Barrington was whether a certain agreement conferred an interest in land. The case before us in some respects different from that before the House of Lords. The agreement in the present case is much more artificially drawn, because it appears to me to have been drawn by someone who understood the terms he was using, whereas in Edwardes v. Barrington, as the Lord Chancellor pointed out, the chief difficulty arose from the fact that the person who drafted the agreement obviously did not really understand the meaning of the words he used. Notwithstanding that words purporting to confer an interest in land were used in that agreement, the House of Lords came to the conclusion that, taking the whole agreement together, no interest in land was given to the so-called tenant. The question in that case was whether the transaction which the House of Lords held was not a demise, but gave a privilege to the grantee, was or was not a breach of covenant which would amount to a forfeiture of a lease. The words of the covenant were these: "Not at any time during the term hereby granted to assign, demise, or otherwise part with this indenture"—that, of course, means that which is comprised in this indenture—"or any estate or interest therein for all or any part of the said term to any person or persons whomsoever without the licence of the lessor or his assigns first had and obtained." The question was whether what had been done under the agreement that had since been made was a parting with an interest in land the subject of the indenture. The point was therefore really the same as that which has arisen in the case now before us, although, as Mr. Crawford very properly pointed out, it arose on the question whether or not there had been a breach of covenant resulting in a forfeiture. Unless the House of Lords had come to the conclusion that it did not pass an interest in land, they could not have held that there was no breach of covenant. Is there, then, any substantial difference between the agreement we have now to construe and the agreement in that case? It seems to me that, so far as there is any difference between them, this agreement is expressed much more clearly than that in limiting what is granted to a privilege as distinguished from a demise. It is carefully drawn so as to exclude the inference that anything in the nature of a demise was granted. [His Lordship read clauses 1, 2, and 8 of the agreement.] Though the word "let" is used, it seems to me that the subject-matter of the letting is most carefully defined so as to exclude any interest in the land. The lessees of the theatre do not let the cellars, but provide for the use of the cellars; instead of letting the refreshment-rooms, they provide for the privilege of using them; and so on. So far as the words go, care seems to have been taken to avoid any implication of a grant of any interest in land. There are certain clauses, such as those with regard to the advertisements, to which Mr. Crawford has particularly called our attention. It was suggested that the clause as to the advertisements might involve the right to the exclusive use of the parts of the wall on which the advertisements were hung, but, even if it could be thought that prima facie a demise of the land might be thereby involved, yet I think that the clause must be read with its context. To get at the true object of the parties the agreement must be read as a whole, and, taking the whole thing together, it seems to me that the inevitable conclusion is that what was intended to be carried out by this agreement was to convey, not an interest in the land, but only a privilege. Now, the agreement in Edwardes v. Barrington (ubi sup.) was one of the same class of privilege—namely, the right to sell refreshments in a theatre—and, if it differs from the agreement in the present case, it differs in this only, that there was more indication there than here of an intention to grant a demise of the premises. Nevertheless the House of Lords came to the conclusion that what was granted was not an interest in land, but a privilege. The House of Lords affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeal (Daly v. Edwardes, 83 L. T. Rep. 548), and there Rigby, L.J. said: "On the whole, I think that the proper conclusion is that Frank Warr and Co. took no estate or interest in land, but that they were entitled, for all reasonable purposes, to consider themselves as having an exclusive licence to provide refreshments, and all that follows from that privilege, and nothing else at all." And Williams, L.J. said: "No one has contended, so far as I can understand, that the grant of a licence and right to the use of all the refreshment-rooms, bars, smokers, &c., during the term of this agreement would amount to an assignment or demise of any estate or interest in the subject-matter of the principal indenture, if in truth and in fact such grant of a licence and right was a grant upon the basis that the landlord should in fact retain dominion and control over the whole of the premises. In my judgment, although the lawyers have chosen to dress up this grant of a licence, or grant of a privilege, in the dress of a lease of land, yet when one comes to look closely at the provisions of this document it is plain that it is really a grant of a privilege and licence merely masquerading as a lease." Those words apply exactly here except that, in my judgment, this agreement does not even masquerade as a lease. It does not on its face suggest that it is a demise of an interest in land. The judgment of the Court of Appeal was approved in the House of Lords, and it seems to me that it is indistinguishable in any sense favourable to the appellants from their case, and that we are therefore concluded by that authority and that it decides this case. That relieves me from discussing in any detail the arguments of Mr. Crawford and his learned leader, Mr. Witt, as to the distinction between a mere licence to go on land and a licence to take a profit out of that land; the distinction between a profit à prendre and an ordinary licence. It seems to me, although it is not necessary to decide it here, that Mr. Witt's principal proposition upon that matter breaks down. He was obliged to contend that a licence to make a profit on the land by trading on the land was in itself equivalent to a right to a profit à prendre. It does not seem to me that it is. I think that the profit must be a profit out of the land itself, and it is because it is something out of the land itself that a licence to a profit à prendre has been held to be within the Statute of Frauds, as being an interest in land. I have not seen any authority which shows that a profit à prendre includes a right to make a profit by carrying on a trade under a particular licence on a particular piece of land. For these reasons I think that this appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the question of the construction of the document under which the plaintiffs claim, I think that, like the document which had to be construed in Edwards v. Barrington (ubi sup.), it only gave a licence, strictly and properly so called, to the persons claiming under it. It did not create any estate or interest in land in their favour. Certainly the document created no demise in favour of the plaintiffs, nor did it amount to a parting with the possession which the lessees of the theatre had at the time when they made the agreement in question. The possession of the theatre, and every part of it, to my mind, remained with the lessees, subject only to such rights to use certain parts of it for certain purposes as were conferred upon the plaintiffs by the agreement. In the next place, there was no easement, properly so called, created over the land in favour of the plaintiffs; no grant of any profit à prendre out of the land; no incorporeal hereditament of any kind that I can see; in fact, nothing at all which at law or in equity would constitute a known estate or interest in the land. The true object and effect of the document was very clearly pointed out by Rigby, L.J., referring to the document which he had to construe, in the passage which my Lord has read from his judgment in Daly v. Edwards (ubi sup.). In arriving at that conclusion, I have not forgotten the argument that was based by the appellants on the words "necessary use of the cellars." To my mind, it would not have made any difference if the "exclusive use" had been conferred on the plaintiffs instead of the "necessary use," because the words "exclusive use" were used in the document which was relied upon in Edwards v. Barrington (ubi sup.). But, as a matter of fact, the words "necessary use" only mean use so far as is necessary for the purpose of enabling the plaintiffs to supply refreshments in the theatre on proper occasions when the theatre is being used for its ordinary purposes, and certainly in this document those words cannot be said to have created an absolute parting with the possession of that cellar from the lessees to the plaintiffs. The fact that the plaintiffs may have had confided to them a key for the purpose of preventing strangers coming in does not, to my mind, make the slightest difference. It appears, so far as the construction of the document is concerned, to have been a voluntary act on the part of the lessees, and certainly could not amount to the creation of any estate or interest in the land in favour of the plaintiffs which was not conferred by the document itself. Now, if this document only created a licence in favour of the plaintiffs, as I think it did, it may be as well (since the effect of a licence has been discussed in the argument) to refer to what was said as to the general effect of a licence, properly so called, in the notes to the case of Thomas v. Sorrell (Vaughan, 330, at p. 351). It is there said: "A dispensation or licence properly passeth no interest, nor alters or transfers property in anything, but only makes an action lawful which without it had been unlawful." Then the learned writer gives instances, and then proceeds to point out how, in addition to a licence, there may be given a right to take something out of the land. He instances (inter alia) "a licence to hunt in a man's park, and carry away the deer killed to his own use; to cut down a tree in a man's ground, and to carry it away the next day after to his own use," and then he says that these "are licences as to the acts of hunting and cutting down the tree, but as to the carrying away of the deer killed, and tree cut down, they are grants." That is to say, that in those two cases the person not only had a licence properly so called, but also a right to profits à prendre; that is to say, a right to take something out of the soil. Now, in the present case let me see shortly if the licence here extends at all beyond what I have called a licence strictly and properly so called. The only part of the document which can be referred to as supporting that contention is that which gives the right to use the cellars and to put up advertisements in certain rooms. Are not these licences properly so called, or do they amount to an interest created in the land, to a grant of something coming out of the land? It is clear to my mind that they create nothing more than a licence properly so called. The possession of the cellars not being parted with, the right to use them could be exercised without any grant of any right or interest in the cellars. The right to put up advertisements in certain parts of the theatre could be enjoyed as a licence without implying the necessity of a grant of any part of the walls of the rooms. Nothing is necessary under this document in order to give full effect to such rights as were conferred on the plaintiffs, which would imply any grant or creation of any estate or interest in land in their favour, or any profits à prendre out of the land. But then it is said that, admitting that licences, generally speaking, create no interest in land, a distinction ought to be drawn between licences which are merely to be exercised for the purpose of pleasure and licences which are to be exercised for purposes of profit. Now, undoubtedly there is a difference between the two in two respects. If a licence is granted merely to go on land for the purposes of pleasure, that, if construed strictly and in the absence of a sufficient context, will not be held to confer anything but a personal licence—that is to say, it will not extend to the licensee's servants or agents. But where you find that the intention was that the licensee should do something which may result in obtaining a profit, the licence will be construed as extending not only to the licensee personally (I am, of course, excepting special cases), but also to his servants and possibly also to his agents. There is another distinction, which depends on the meaning to be given to the word "profits." There is the undoubted distinction, which I have already pointed out, between a licence to go on land for pleasure and a licence to go on land for the purpose of profit, if you mean by that profits to be obtained out of the land. But if the profits are to be obtained merely by something which the licensee may do in the exercise of the licence, and nothing has to come out of the land, then all I can say is that I cannot, either on principle or on authority, see any distinction that can be drawn, or that ought to be drawn, between a licence for pleasure and a licence for purposes which may result in profits; and I think that the attempt of the appellants to draw a distinction between them for the purposes of this case entirely fails. It could not be, for example—and it is not at all a bad test—that whereas a licence to certain persons to come on a field to play cricket is a licence creating no interest in land, a licence to a person also to come on the cricket field and sell refreshments to those engaged in the game is a licence which creates an interest in land. I think no such distinction ought to be drawn, and, as I have said, it is not supported either by principle or authority. That decides this case. But it may be that, although there is no interest in land within the meaning of sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 for which the defendants are bound to compensate the plaintiffs, it does not of necessity follow that there may not be breaches of the contract with the plaintiffs for which they may not have some right of action against someone. That may be so; I do not say that it is so; and certainly nothing that I am saying here must be held to encourage the plaintiffs in bringing any such action against anybody. One reason why I should think that it would be doubtful, to say the least of it, whether any such action would be successful is this: As far as I can see, although it is not necessary to decide the point in the present case, there is nothing in the agreement with the plaintiffs to compel the leasees to keep the theatre open as a theatre, or to use it as a theatre, during any defined portion of their term. All I want to point out is that there may be a distinction between a contract giving an interest in land which may be the subject of compensation under sect. 68 and a contract which gives an interest, though not an interest in land, which if interfered with may give rise to an action for damages. I only say that to prevent there being any misunderstanding upon that point. With these observations I leave the case, and I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Re IBO INVESTMENT TRUST LIMITED.

[CHAN. DIV.]

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The document of the 16th June 1900 did not amount to a demise, but only created privileges and licences to do certain things. The case of Edwards v. Barrington (ubi sup.), in the House of Lords, offered an awkward obstacle to the appellants, and a new line was taken in their argument. It was said that the agreement granted certain privileges from which the appellants could derive profits à prendre, and that that was enough to give an interest in land within sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 which would entitle them to be compensated by the defendants. No single authority was cited in support of the proposition thus put forward by Mr. Witt. He said that it was only necessary to look at the language of sect. 68 to see that such an interest as was conferred upon the plaintiffs by this agreement was intended to be protected by the section. The section speaks of an interest in land "which shall have been taken or injuriously affected by the execution of the works." It seems to me that it is impossible to read those words without seeing that a contract such as this out of which profits may come from the use of land is not within the language of the section. Then Mr. Crawford argued that there was enough in the agreement to show that there was a demise, or that there was an intention to create a lease. In my opinion the language used in this document could not be further from that purpose. The agreement, by clause 1, gives the appellants "the necessary use of the refreshment rooms and bars and cloakrooms." It was not contended that that amounted to a demise of those rooms.

But then come the words "and wine cellars." It was contended that that was quite a different matter, and that the interest created in the wine cellars was an interest in land. The first observation to be made is that there is clearly no exclusive grant or demise of the cellars, because all that is given is the "necessary use" of them. That phrase cuts down any interest in the cellars which might otherwise be given by this agreement, and limits it to what is wanted for the subordinate purpose of enabling the agreement in other respects to be carried out. It seems to me that the use of the word "necessary" absolutely negatives any implication that there is a demise of the cellars, and it cannot be doubted that if the plaintiffs had used these cellars for any purpose other than the purposes of this theatre they would have been violating their agreement, and practically would be trespassers. So much for that. Then there was another argument of the same kind based upon the right of advertising and letting spaces for advertisements in the refreshment and cloak rooms. In the first place what is given is described in the agreement as a "privilege." That certainly excludes the notion of any demise of the walls of the refreshment and cloak rooms to be used for any purpose of advertising, and the whole agreement appears to me to be properly and consistently construed if this particular privilege be treated as subordinate and subsidiary to the main purpose of the agreement. The case of Edwards v. Barrington (ubi sup.), in the House of Lords, was a more formidable case than this; that is to say, it was more difficult there to avoid construing the document as containing a demise. But the House of Lords felt no hesitation in saying that the whole scope of the agreement was obvious, and that the clauses particularly relied on must be treated as subordinate to that paramount purpose. That being so, it seems to me that the case in the House of Lords is conclusive, and, for these reasons and the reasons given by my learned brethren, I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

SUMMONS to review taxation.

In Oct. 1902 a shareholder presented a petition for the compulsory winding-up of the Ibo Investment Trust Limited, and the petition contained many charges of fraud against the directors of the company and personal charges against shareholders. The petition was successfully opposed by the company, by creditors, and by two sets of contributories, directors and non-directors, and in dismissing it on the 10th Dec. 1902 Byrne, J. gave costs to the company, and one set of costs only to the contributories opposing.

The registrar in taxing the bill of costs of one set of contributories disallowed the following items: (1) payment for copies of evidence in support of the petition, in opposition thereto, and in reply; (2) perusals of such evidence; (3) copies of such evidence for counsel; (4) fees to counsel.

Objections were taken to these disallowances on the following grounds:

The ground of the objection is that, personal charges of fraud having been made against the contributories both in the petition and in the evidence in support thereof and the magnitude of the interests involved, the contributories were entitled to defend themselves and their interests against the petitioner's personal attack on them, and it was impossible for counsel representing them to adequately oppose the petition without having the evidence in support of opposition and reply, and it was therefore necessary to take copies of such evidence and supply copies to counsel, and to mark an adequate fee to counsel with his papers. It is submitted that a petitioner is in the same position as a plaintiff in an action (see Annual Practice 1903, vol. 2, pp. 450, 451), and, where fraud is charged, the persons against whom the charges are made are entitled to take copies of all evidence filed in support or opposition. The petition having been dismissed with costs, it is submitted that the taxing officer is in error in adopting the same principle of taxation as where costs are to be paid out of the assets and only allowing a nominal sum for successful contributories, the result of the taxation in this case being that the whole amount allowed is not sufficient to pay one of their junior counsel's fees, and that, although one set of costs only has been allowed by the order, it should be a proper and a full bill.

The registrar's answer to the objections was as follows:

1, 2, 3, and 4. It is not the practice to allow contributories or creditors appearing on a petition the usual charges consequent on taking copies of the evidence filed by the petitioner and the company, unless for some reason such evidence has to be answered by, or is in answer to, evidence filed by such contributories or creditors, or unless some other sufficient grounds are shown for the allowance of such charges. In this case allegations were made with reference to the conduct of the company by its directors, and the defence of such charges was undertaken by the company, all the evidence in answer to such charges being prepared and filed on behalf of the company, and the costs relating thereto have been allowed in the company's bill of costs. The hearing of a petition to wind-up a company in which charges are made against it by reason of the act of its directors is not a proceeding like an action in which fraud is alleged against defendants, who have consequently to defend themselves, but the allegations are made against the company, and the company alone is respondent to the petition; the directors need not appear at all, and if they do it is not the practice of the court to go into and adjudicate upon their conduct in the same way as it would were the court trying an action in which the directors were defendants charged with fraud. I know of no case in which the winding-up judge has allowed directors appearing on a winding-up petition in which fraud was alleged any extra costs for defending their conduct as directors. It is the usual practice to allow them (if the petition is unsuccessful) a set of costs as contributories or a share in such set of costs, as was done in this case. These directors applied at the hearing of this petition for a separate set of costs, but that was refused, and they were told they would get a share of the contributories' costs. Were contributories and creditors allowed the charges consequent on taking copies of evidence filed by the petitioner and company, there would be several sets of solicitors taking copies of the same evidence—clearly an extravagant practice. It is not usual for the contributories and creditors to answer such evidence, and they did not do so in this case. The petition itself nearly always contains sufficient information to enable contributories and creditors to decide whether they will support or oppose, and that is all they are required to do. It cannot be said that the petition in this case was deficient in such information. Wright, J. long ago laid down the practice that he would not hear long speeches on behalf of contributories or creditors on the merits, but made them confine themselves to either supporting or opposing the petition. The fight is between the petitioner and the company. In this case the directors are represented by the same solicitors as the company. In accordance with the usual practice, their names ought to have been put on the company's brief: (see Re Brighton Marine Palace and Pier Company; (1897) W. N. 12). When they applied for a separate set of costs and were refused, the judge intimated that as contributories they would get a share of the contributories' set of costs. It was not brought to the judge's attention (the official in court not being aware of it at the time) that the same solicitor represented the company and directors, or doubtless the usual practice would have been followed, and the directors would then have had no share in the contributories' set of costs. The fact that the same solicitors represented the directors and the company was noticed when the order came to be settled; but, having regard to the judge's intimation when deciding the question of costs, the order was settled in accordance with such intimation. I have disallowed the objections.

This summons was accordingly taken out by the contributories, asking that these objections might be allowed, and that the certificate might be varied accordingly.

Gatey for the summons.—These costs should be allowed, as the applicants were bound to defend themselves against the charges of fraud brought against them in this evidence.

Buckmaster, K.C. and Kirby for the petitioner.—These objections should be disallowed, and the ordinary rule as to one set of costs followed, no special order having been made at the hearing of the petition, which would only be under very special circumstances.

Gatey replied.

BYRNE, J. stated the nature of the application, and of the objections to the registrar's disallowances, and continued:—The petition, as I have every reason to remember, was one which I do not think I should describe unfairly if I said that it was stuffed with charges of fraud. Counsel for the petitioner in his discretion selected six charges of fraud, and certain portions only of the evidence relating to those charges was read, and the whole of it was not gone into before the court. Counsel for the applicants is entitled to say that it was a petition containing charges of fraud against certain directors and contributories. The petition came on and was dismissed. An application was made to me at the time to allow a separate set of costs for the director contributories appearing. I declined to do so, and only one set of costs was allowed in the ordinary form to the contributories. [His Lordship read the order, and, after shortly stating the facts as to the taxation, continued:] The learned registrar, in answer to the objections of the contributories, has pointed out (and justly) that the proceedings by petition for winding-up a company, in which charges are made against the directors, is not, as respects persons appearing upon the petition other than the company, analogous to an ordinary action in which fraud is charged against defendants. The case has to be made out by the petitioner, and the defence to the petition falls upon the company, which has to adduce evidence for that purpose. In this case the contributories did what appears to me to have been the right thing to do—they swore affidavits in support of the opposition by the company. As the company gets all the proper costs of the evidence furnished, and of all proper payments and charges in respect of giving evidence for the party to any litigation, payment for giving evidence is a matter between the party taking the evidence and the witness giving it. When the case came on, the company contested it, and they opposed the petition with the evidence so furnished to them. The contributories and creditors may appear, if they like, upon the petition, at the risk, of course, of having to bear their own costs, for the purpose of expressing their approval or disapproval of the petitioner's application, and opposing or supporting it, as the case may be; but, beyond that, any hearing by the court of evidence in support of the merits of the case is, I apprehend, quite a matter of discretion. I am told it was the practice of one of my predecessors never to allow parties so appearing to be heard upon the merits, but they were merely to be heard to say whether they supported or opposed. Now, I lay down no general rule on the subject, but I want to point out, before adding more, that it would be a curious thing if a petitioner, in making a necessary allegation against the company to support his petition, had to make charges involving other persons that those persons should have conferred on them the same rights as they would have had if they were defendants to an action brought against the company and themselves. The petitioner would have no right to get costs against them, whereas they would, on the footing of their being allowed their costs as hostile litigants, be entitled, if the court should so direct, to get costs against the petitioner. I do not want to lay down any rule as to what the discretion of the court may be in a matter of costs of persons appearing on the hearing of the petition; but I think it is clear that the common order does not give to contributories so appearing any other costs than those the registrar is prepared to allow in the present case, and that, if more is wanted, it must be asked for at the time of the hearing of the petition. In my judgment the reasons given by the learned registrar appear to be sufficient for the course he has taken, and I cannot accede to the demand for a review of the taxation under the circumstances. I therefore dismiss the application.

MORTON v. BANK OF ENGLAND. (a)

Local authority—Formation of school district and incorporation of board of managers—Sale of property belonging to board of managers and investment of proceeds—Dissolution of district by Local Government Board—Postponement of dissolution—Transfer of Consols—Bank of England—Orders of Local Government Board—Poor Law Amendment Act 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101)—Metropolitan Poor Act Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 63), s. 1—Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 2)—National Debt Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 71), s. 22.

The Local Government Board made an order dissolving a metropolitan school district under the Metropolitan Poor Act Amendment Act 1869 as from a date therein mentioned.

By subsequent orders the date of dissolution was further extended, but ultimately the district was dissolved.

At the date of dissolution a sum of Consols was standing at the Bank of England to the credit of the board of managers of the dissolved union. The Local Government Board made an order directing the last acting managers of the dissolved district to transfer the Consols to certain poor law authorities in the order named in the proportions therein mentioned.

The Bank of England refused to recognise the validity of the order or the powers of the last acting managers to transfer the Consols, insisting that if the corporate board of managers was in existence it could only transfer the Consols under its seal, and that if it was not in existence a vesting order was required.

An action having been brought by the last acting managers for a declaration of their right to transfer:

Held, that, on the dissolution of a district constituted under the Poor Law Amendment Act 1845, the corporate board of such district constituted under sect. 45 of that Act continues to exist, while the Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act 1870, s. 12, does not automatically vest the property of the district in the last acting managers, and consequently that the plaintiffs could transfer the Consols under their seal as a corporate board.

It is doubtful whether, when once the Local Government Board has dissolved a district under the Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act 1870, it has power to set it up again or to continue the managers for more than a period of twelve months except for a certain purpose specified on the face of the order.

the Local Government Board), bearing date the 12th March 1849, and made under the Poor Law Amendment Act 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101), the St. Olave's Union and the respective parishes of St. Mary Magdalene, Bermondsey; St. Giles, Camberwell; and St. Mary, Rotherhithe, were combined into a district designated "The South Metropolitan School District" for the management of classes of infant poor therein specified, and a board of management was constituted for the district, and the number of members to be elected on such board from the unions and parishes of the district was thereby fixed. The members of the board were incorporated under sect. 45 of the Act.

By further orders dated the 10th Oct. 1849, the 3rd July 1854, the 8th June 1868, the 27th Aug. 1869, the 13th Jan. 1870, and the 11th March 1873, and issued by the Poor Law Board and by the Local Government Board respectively, the constituent parts of this school district were varied, and on the 30th March 1898 it comprised the Greenwich, St. Olave's, Stepney, and Woolwich Unions, and the parish of St. Giles, Camberwell.

This board of management, in pursuance of an order of the Local Government Board bearing date the 16th Oct. 1897, sold certain property belonging to them. The net proceeds of this sale, which amounted to 16,010*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, were directed, by an order of the Local Government Board dated the 27th Oct. 1898, to be forthwith invested in the purchase of Two and Three-quarter per Cent. Consols in the name of the board of management, and on the 22nd Nov. 1898 a request to open a corporate stock account impressed with the common seal of the board of management was lodged with the chief accountant of the Bank of England.

In Sept. 1902 the sum of 14,485*l.* 0*s.* 5*d.* Consols represented the proceeds of this investment, and there was a further sum of 844*l.* 13*s.* Consols transferred to the same account by an order of Byrne, J. dated the 27th Oct. 1902), making together 15,329*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* Two and a Half per Cent. Consolidated Stock.

By the order of the Local Government Board of the 27th Oct. 1898 it was ordered and declared as follows:

And we declare that the said board of management shall stand possessed of the said stock, when purchased, upon trust to transfer and dispose of the same, and the principal moneys thereby secured, in such manner for the permanent advantage of the South Metropolitan School District as we by an order under our seal of office may direct.

By the order of Byrne, J. on the 28th Nov. 1902 it was ordered as follows:

That the funds in court [that is to say, the before-mentioned sum of 844*l.* 13*s.* Two and a Half per Cent. New Consols] be dealt with as directed in the schedule thereto by the Local Government Board by means of an order under sect. 1 of the Metropolitan Poor Act Amendment Act 1869.

These Consols were in 1903 standing in the books of the Bank of England in the name of the South Metropolitan District School Board.

By an order of the Local Government Board bearing date the 30th March 1898 the South Metropolitan School District was ordered to be dissolved as from the 30th Sept. 1899.

By subsequent orders, dated respectively the 1st Sept. 1899, the 20th Sept. 1900, the 22nd March 1901, and the 23rd Aug. 1901, the date of dissolution was altered, and the school district was finally dissolved as from and after the 29th Sept. 1902.

Upon the dissolution of the district the real and personal property of the board other than the afore-mentioned Consols were realised under the authority of the Local Government Board, and the liabilities of the board of management were discharged. The Consols represented the board's surplus assets.

By an order bearing date the 10th Aug. 1903, and made, as stated therein, "in pursuance of the powers given to it" by the statutes in that behalf, the "last acting managers" were directed to pay forthwith the sum which each of the unions and parish named in the schedule to the order were directed to receive thereunder.

The schedule was as follows:

To the Guardians of the Poor of St. Giles, Camberwell, Parish	8234	19	0
To the Guardians of the Poor of Greenwich Union	2294	4	7
To the Guardians of the Poor of St. Olave's Union	2523	4	11
To the Guardians of the Poor of Stepney Union	957	14	0
To the Guardians of the Poor of Woolwich Union	1269	0	11
	15,329	13	5

By an order bearing date the 22nd Sept. 1903 the Local Government Board made an order declaring that the persons who were acting as the managers of the school district at the time of dissolution, or the survivors of them, should be empowered to act in all matters lawfully intrusted to them for a further period not extending beyond the 25th Dec. 1903.

The clerk to the board of acting managers wrote on the 26th May 1903 to the Bank of England in reference to the transfer of the Consols, and a long correspondence ensued.

The bank refused to recognise the validity of the order of the Local Government Board of the 10th Aug. 1903, or the right of the members of the board of management to transfer the Consols.

The managers accordingly issued a writ by which they claimed (inter alia) a declaration that they were entitled as joint tenants to the Consols, and that they were entitled to require the bank to transfer them into their joint names; and, alternatively, that they were entitled as last acting managers of the dissolved school district to transfer the Consols in the books of the bank into the names of the several sets of poor law guardians mentioned in the order of the Local Government Board of the 10th Aug. 1903 in the shares and proportions respectively mentioned in this order.

The defendants in their defence submitted that the Local Government Board had no power to make the order of the 10th Aug. 1903, and that, if the Local Government Board had such power, the order did not operate to dissolve the corporation created by the Poor Law Amendment Act 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101), s. 45—viz., the South Metropolitan District Board of Management—but only the South Metropolitan School District; that if this corporation was undissolved the Consols could only be transferred under its corporate seal, and that if in fact it was dissolved the Consols could only be transferred by an appointment of new trustees and a vesting order under the Trustee Act 1893.

The Metropolitan Poor Act Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 63), s. 1, provides:

The Poor Law Board as and when they shall see fit may dissolve an asylum or school district contained wholly or partly in the metropolis, and upon such dissolution shall adjust the rights and liabilities of parishes and unions comprised therein respectively, and provide for the compensation of the officers and other persons employed therein respectively in like manner as when a union is dissolved under the authority of the thirty-second section of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834, and so much of that section as requires the concurrence of two-thirds of the guardians in the dissolution of any union is hereby repealed; and prior to issuing any order dissolving such district, the said board may by their order empower the managers of any such district to sell and dispose of any land, buildings, or other property belonging to them and apply the proceeds thereof in the discharge of the debts and liabilities then outstanding against such managers, and to distribute the surplus which may remain among the parishes or unions comprised therein, according to their original proportions; and if the said district shall be dissolved before the same shall be sold, the said board may by their order empower the persons who were the managers of the district at the time of its dissolution, or the major part of them, to make such sale and convey the land to the purchaser thereof and to apply and distribute the produce accordingly.

The Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 2):

SECT. 1. When the Poor Law Board shall have dissolved or shall dissolve any district the component parts whereof shall not have been formed into one union or shall have dissolved or shall dissolve any union, or shall have added or shall add any parish in which the relief to the poor shall be or shall have been administered by a board of guardians to a union or to another parish, the persons who were acting as managers or guardians at the time of dissolution or addition and the survivors of them shall continue in office for the purpose of paying and discharging the debts and liabilities of such district, union, or parish, and of receiving and recovering moneys or other property due to the said district, union, or parish, as the case may be, in like manner as the board of management or board of guardians could have done if no dissolution or addition had taken place; and the said managers or guardians shall be empowered to make all necessary orders for contributions upon the parishes comprised within the district or union so dissolved, or upon the proper authorities of the parish so added, as the case may require, and to enforce the same as the board of management or board of guardians could have done previous to the dissolution or addition respectively: provided that the limitation of time for the payment of debts imposed by the statute of the twenty-second and twenty-third Victoria, chapter forty-nine, shall not apply to the cases of districts or unions dissolved, or of parishes added to a union, before the passing of this Act, where such limitation had not taken effect previous to the dissolution or addition thereof as aforesaid; and provided that no such managers or guardians shall be empowered to act in the manner aforesaid for a longer period from the date of dissolution or addition, unless the Poor Law Board by their order shall authorise them to continue to act for some special purpose.

SECT. 12. Upon the dissolution of any district or union, or the addition of any parish in which the relief to the poor shall have been or shall be administered by a board of guardians to a union or to another parish, the real and personal estate vested in the managers or guardians of such district, union, or parish respectively shall be transferred to and vested in the persons who were acting as managers or guardians respectively at the time of such dissolution or addition, to be held by them as joint tenants according to the nature of such property and in trust for the parishes comprised in such district or union or for the parish, as the case may be, until the same shall be sold, let, or otherwise disposed of under the authority of the third section of the Union and Parish Property Act 1835, and any Act extending the same: Provided that nothing herein contained shall apply to any parish provided for by the fifth section of the Metropolitan Poor Act Amendment Act 1869, or by a local Act.

Bramwell Davis, K.C. and J. B. Matthews for the plaintiffs.—Under sects. 44 and 45 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1844 a district board constituted a corporation under the Act has power to purchase and hire property. Under the Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act 1870, ss. 1, 2, which deals with the property of dissolved districts and unions, the property of any dissolved district or union is to be transferred to and vested in the persons who were acting as managers or guardians respectively at the time of such dissolution, and its effect is to vest the property automatically in these last acting managers, and accordingly in this case these managers have power to execute a transfer:

Corporation of Hyde v. Bank of England, 46 L. T. Rep. 910; 21 Ch. Div. 176.

It would be ridiculous to suppose that the district was dissolved, and that the board of management continued to exist.

Uppjohn, K.C. and Howard Wright for the defendants.—The effect of the order of the Local Government Board was to dissolve, not the board of managers, but the district. The board of managers still continues to exist, and can only properly transfer the Consols by its corporate seal:

Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act 1870, s. 11.

The plaintiffs' argument is opposed to sect. 12 of this Act, which provides that the property shall be transferred to and vested in the last acting managers, which clearly implies a vesting order. The defendants do not admit the validity of the order of the 10th Aug. 1903.

Bramwell Davis, K.C. in reply.

FARWELL, J.—It is by no means easy to find one's way through the maze of these Acts of Parliament; but I have come to a clear conclusion on the one before me, which is the only one with which I am concerned. By the Poor Law Amendment Act 1840, s. 40, the commissioners formed school districts. By sect. 42 it is provided that a board shall be constituted for every district. Now, these are obviously two different and distinct things. The district is one thing and the board for the district is another. By sect. 45 every such district board is incorporated for the purpose of holding property and of suing and being sued. Then the Metropolitan Poor Act Amendment Act of 1869 authorises the Poor Law Board, as and when they shall see fit, to dissolve any school district. Now, that is obviously the district and not the board or the incorporated entity. Then the Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act 1870 contains a preamble, "Whereas it is expedient that better provision should be made for the proceedings of boards of management and boards of guardians, when the districts or unions for which they have acted respectively are dissolved." That clearly again treats the board as existing after the dissolution of the district. It provides that when the Poor Law Board shall have dissolved any district, the persons who were acting as managers at the time of dissolution shall continue in office for the purpose of practically winding-up the affairs of the district, and paying its debts, and receiving and recovering its property, with a proviso that "No such managers or guardians shall be empowered to act in the manner aforesaid for a longer period than twelve months from the date of dissolution or addition, unless the Poor Law Board by their order shall authorise them to continue to act for some special purpose." Then, by sect. 12 of that Act (down to this point the district being dissolved, but the corporate board remaining), it is provided that, upon the dissolution of any district, the real and personal estate vested in the managers shall be transferred to and vested in the persons who were acting as managers at the time of such dissolution, to be held by them as joint tenants in trust for the parishes comprised in such district. Now, obviously the meaning of that is, the district is dissolved by splitting it into its various component parts, all of which would have some share in the property which had formerly been held by the corporate body in trust for the district. Then the provision is that the real and personal estate vested in the managers shall be transferred to the district. The phrase is a little unfortunate, because it is not strictly accurate to say that it is vested in the managers; it is vested in the board of management, which has been incorporated; but I think that, inasmuch as there may be cases in which the managers are not incorporated, because the Act extends to various other districts, asylums, and unions, the reasonable construction is that the property vested in the managers, whether it be vested in them as individuals or as a corporation, shall be transferred and vested. Now, in my opinion, that is not, as has been argued, an automatic vesting order, with the phraseology of which we are familiar. The words in such an order are "shall vest in," and we all understand what that means. But when you say "shall be transferred and vested in," it is the expression "vested in," instead of "vest in," which points to an act to be done by the persons mentioned, who are ordered to do the acts necessary for that purpose. That appears to me to be a simple and reasonable solution of the matter. It has been suggested that it is absurd to have the corporate body still existing. I do not see the absurdity. It is obvious that the property on the dissolution of the district must be somewhere or other, and that, if you ipso facto dissolve both district and board at the same moment, the title to the real estate in land would, I suppose, vest in the Crown, and the title to the Consols in the bank would vest—I do not know, but I suppose—also in the Crown as bona vacantia. But, at any rate, the Legislature appears to me to have adopted a much more convenient course by keeping the corporate body in existence either by implication from the 1st section of the Act of 1870 for so long a period as there remains anything to be done, or, according to the common law rule, so long as any one of the corporate body remains alive. I should prefer myself, if it were necessary to decide, that it was the first. I do not think that it is necessary for me on this occasion to determine to whom the property is to be transferred. On the face of it, it is to be to the persons who were acting as managers at the date of the dissolution. Now, the order of dissolution in this case is dated the 29th March 1898, and it directs the dissolution to take place as from the 30th Sept. 1899. A question has been raised, which is one of very considerable importance, as to the power of the local government board to undo that dissolution and set up the board again, and then to dissolve it again or to continue the managers for a period of more than twelve months, except for a special purpose specified on the face of the order. I do not think that it is necessary for me to determine that, because I think that it is sufficient for me to declare that the plaintiffs are not entitled to claim, as they do, that the property is vested in them under this particular section; but that it would be necessary for the transfer to be executed under the corporate seal of the board, and therefore, when that transfer is presented to the Bank of England, the bank will no doubt, with their usual care and skill, consider whether the persons to whom the transfer is proposed to be made are the right and proper persons. But I hope that they will not come to me again. [His Lordship, at the request of counsel for the plaintiffs, prefaced the order by a declaration that the court, "being of opinion that the corporation created by sect. 4 of the Act of 1844 was still subsisting," dismissed the action with costs. His Lordship expressed an opinion that it would be well if the Local Government Board considered whether the second proviso in the Act 33 & 34 Vict. c. 2 enabled the Local Government Board to continue managers for any purpose or only for a special purpose. His Lordship further expressed his view that the Local Government Board might consider whether, when they had once made an order for dissolution, they had power to make such further orders as they had made in this case.]

settlement should continue to be of a specified annual value. On the death of a younger child, whose portion had vested, but had not been raised, intestate and unmarried, the portion devolved upon the settlor as sole next of kin, but he did not take out administration to his son's estate, and on his death his testamentary dispositions (which, however, were executed at a date prior to his son's death) contained no reference to the portion.

On an originating summons taken out by the trustees of his will, the question was raised whether the portion which devolved upon him on the death of his son sank into the estates upon which it was charged and of which the settlor was absolute owner subject to the interests and terms created by the settlement, or whether it continued to subsist and formed part of his personal estate:

Held, that it was for the benefit of the settlor that the portion should sink into the estates, and that it had merged in the inheritance thereof.

By a settlement of the 27th Sept. 1876, made on the marriage then intended and shortly afterwards solemnised between Robert Abraham Brewster French-Brewster and Geraldine French-Brewster, then and therein described as Geraldine Cooper, certain estates in Ireland belonging to Robert Abraham Brewster French-Brewster were vested in trustees for the term of ninety-nine years from the solemnisation of the marriage upon the trusts thereafter declared and subject thereto to the use of Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster for life, and after his decease to the use that Geraldine French-Brewster should receive the yearly rentcharge of 1000*l.*, and subject and charged as thereinbefore mentioned to the use of trustees for the term of 100 years from the death of Robert A. And it was thereby declared that the premises were limited to the trustees of the term of ninety-nine years upon trust that they should during the joint lives of Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster and Geraldine French-Brewster pay her such sum as would make up the annual sum of 300*l.* by way of pin money. And it was thereby declared that the premises were limited to the trustees of the term of 100 years upon trust to secure the payment of the rentcharge of 1000*l.* And it was thereby declared that the premises were limited to the trustees of the term of 1000 years upon trust that if there should be any child or children of the then intended marriage (other than a first or only son or any other son or sons for the time being entitled to the first estate in tail in the lands therein mentioned) who being a son or sons should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters should attain that age or marry, then the trustees should after the death of Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster by mortgage or sale as therein mentioned raise for the portion or portions of such child or children as aforesaid other than a first or only or other son or sons so entitled as aforesaid such sum of money as was thereafter mentioned (that was to say): If there should be but one such child (other than as aforesaid), the sum of 10,000*l.* to be paid to such child at his age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter at her age of twenty-one years or day of marriage, which should first happen, if the same should happen after the death of Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster, and if the same should happen in his lifetime then immediately after his death. And if there should be but two such children (other than as aforesaid), the sum of 15,000*l.* And if there should be three or more such children (other than as aforesaid), the sum of 20,000*l.*, the said sum of 15,000*l.* or 20,000*l.*, as the event might happen, to be paid to all or such one or more exclusively of the other or others of the children for whose portions the same should be raised as aforesaid at such age or time or respective ages or times (not previous) as to a son to his attaining the age of twenty-one years, or as to a daughter to her attaining that age or marrying, which should first happen, as Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster should by deed or will or codicil appoint, and in default of such appointment in equal shares.

And the settlement contained a covenant by Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster that he had power to grant and assign all the premises thereinbefore expressed to be granted and assigned to the uses and upon the trusts thereinbefore declared, and that the same premises then were and should continue, so long as the estates and terms of years thereby created or any of them should subsist, to be of the full clear yearly value of 1800*l.*

There was issue of the marriage between Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster and Geraldine French-Brewster four sons and no other children—viz., Robert A. French-Brewster, who attained twenty-one in his father's lifetime; Henry Gerald French-Brewster, who also attained twenty-one in his father's lifetime, and died in Jan. 1901 intestate and unmarried, leaving his father his sole next of kin; Arthur Ord French-Brewster, who attained twenty-one in June 1903; and another son, who died in infancy in his father's lifetime.

In 1891 the marriage was dissolved, and by a deed of covenant dated the 2nd June 1891 Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster covenanted to pay Geraldine French-Brewster an annual sum of 2500*l.* for life in lieu of the money payable to her under the settlement of the 27th Sept. 1876, and securities of the value of 11,298*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.* were vested in trustees to secure the annual payment of the additional 1500*l.*

Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster then married his second wife, Annie Veronica French-Brewster, but there was no issue of his second marriage.

By his will and codicil, both executed in 1895, neither of which contained any reference to the charge on his Irish estates comprised in the settlement of the 27th Sept. 1876, Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster gave his second wife an annuity of 1000*l.* for life, divided his real estates among his sons then living, and bequeathed all his residuary personal estate and effects to his trustees upon trust to pay his debts and legacies and to invest the residue in the purchase of lands to be settled to the use of his eldest son for life, with remainder to his sons in tail, with divers remainders over.

On the death in Jan. 1901, intestate and unmarried, of Henry Gerald French-Brewster, the second son of Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster, 7500*l.*, one moiety of the unraised sum of 15,000*l.* charged on his Irish estates by the marriage settlement of the 27th Sept. 1876 in favour of the younger children of his first marriage, devolved upon Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster as sole next of kin, but he did not take out letters of administration to his son's estate.

Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster died on the 20th May 1901, and his will, with the codicil thereto, was proved in Nov. 1901. His executors then took out administration to Robert A. French-Brewster.

After his death the rents of his Irish estates comprised in the settlement of the 27th Sept. 1876, together with the income of the securities vested in the trustees of the deed of covenant of the 2nd June 1891, proved insufficient to satisfy the annuity of 2500*l.* payable to Mrs. Geraldine French-Brewster, and it was a disputed point whether the uncertain value of those Irish estates amounted to the yearly sum of 1800*l.*; also the property passing under his will was insufficient for payment of the annuity of 1000*l.* bequeathed to Mrs. Annie Veronica French-Brewster.

In July 1902 an originating summons was taken out by Mrs. Annie Veronica French-Brewster for the administration of his estate, and judgment was obtained on the 12th Aug. 1902.

This was an originating summons taken out on the 17th July 1903 by the trustees of the marriage settlement of the 27th Sept. 1876 and the deed of covenant of the 2nd June 1891, the defendants being Mrs. Geraldine French-Brewster, the executors and trustees of the will of Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster, Robert Abraham French-Brewster and Arthur Ord French-Brewster, the two surviving sons of Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster, who were the devisees under his will, asking (inter alia) whether by reason of the death of Henry Gerald French-Brewster, a younger child of Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster, leaving his father his sole next of kin, the sum of 7500*l.* (being that moiety of the unraised portions charge of 15,000*l.* mentioned in the marriage settlement which became vested in Henry Gerald French-Brewster) had merged in the fee simple of or other estate and interest in the hereditaments and premises settled by the marriage settlement which (subject to the jointure, rentcharge, and portions charge thereby created) belonged absolutely to Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster, or whether it was still raisable for the benefit of his personal estate.

Eve, K.C. and E. J. Elgood, for the plaintiff trustees, stated the facts.

Martelli for Mrs. Geraldine French-Brewster.

Vernon Smith, K.C. and A. E. Russell for the executors and trustees of the will of Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster.

R. H. Hodge for Arthur Ord French-Brewster.—The 7500*l.* to which Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster became entitled on the death of his son Henry Gerald French-Brewster sank into the Irish estates out of which it was raisable. Where the owner of the fee simple of an estate becomes entitled to a charge thereon, prima facie the charge merges in the inheritance unless the owner does some act to keep it alive:

Swinfen v. Swinfen (No. 3), 29 Beav. 199.

The presumption that the charge merges in the inheritance may be rebutted by showing an intention on the part of the owner that it should not merge, and three tests have been stated as applicable for the purpose of ascertaining whether the owner entertained such intention: First, any actual expression of such intention, which does not exist in the present case; secondly, whether the acts done by the owner are only consistent with the charge being kept on foot, but there is no such act by Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster; and, thirdly, whether it is for the interest of the owner that the charge should be kept on foot, which is not the case here:

Tyrwhitt v. Tyrwhitt, 32 Beav. 244.

In the present case all indications of intention are in favour of the merger of the charge—viz., the fact that the will of Robert A. Brewster French-Brewster contains no reference to the charge; the fact that he did not take out letters of administration to his son's estate; and the fact that it is for his benefit that the charge should merge in the Irish estates, as he covenanted that their annual value should amount to 1800*l.*, and created other subsequent charges upon them:

Oliver v. Lord Vaux and others, 6 De G. M. & G. 638.

Hon. Frank Russell for Robert Abraham French-Brewster.—The charge of 7500*l.* forms part of the personal estate of the testator, and has not merged in the estates upon which it is charged, because that charge and the estates were not held by the testator in the same right, as he was only entitled to the charge upon taking out administration to his son, and subject to payment thereof of his son's debts and liabilities:

Re Radcliffe; Radcliffe v. Bewes, 66 L. T. Rep. 363 (1892) 1 Ch. 227.

It appears from the case of Re Somes; Smith v. Somes (74 L. T. Rep. 49; (1896) 1 Ch. 250) that in the case of Re Radcliffe; Radcliffe v. Bewes (ubi sup.) there were practically no debts owing by the son, and that the father was to receive a substantial benefit, so that by executing the release of his power the father augmented the interest he already took under his son's intestacy, he being sole next of kin.

R. H. Hodge in reply.—In the present case the father did not take out administration to his son's estate, but he became beneficially entitled to the 7500*l.*, and that was sufficient to cause it to merge into the estate on which it was charged and to which the father was entitled:

Swabey v. Swabey, 15 Sim. 106;

Forbes v. Moffatt, 18 Ves. Jan. 384; 11 R. R. 222;

Swinfen v. Swinfen (ubi sup.).

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The only remaining question is whether the portion of 7500*l.*, which vested, but which the father became beneficially entitled to, on the decease of his second son intestate in the father's lifetime, has sunk into the land out of which it was to be raised or must be treated as still subsisting and forming part of the father's personal estate. In my opinion it was clearly for the benefit of the father that it should sink into the estate, having regard to the father's covenant that the premises should continue to be of the full clear yearly value of 1800*l.* The extinction of this charge would reduce the father's liability upon this covenant, and the lands charged would become a better security for the remaining moiety of the portion of 15,000*l.* Again, the father never manifested any intention of keeping alive the charge, and, although the son died in Jan. 1900 and the father not until the 20th May 1901, the father did not take out any letters of administration to the son. The objection urged to the merger or extinguishment of the charge is that the father did not own the estate and the charge in the same right—he was entitled to the estate beneficially, but was only entitled to the charge upon taking out administration to his son, and that any debts of the son would first have to be paid before the title of the father to the residue was cleared. The answer to this objection is that no question of merger arises until all debts and other claims (if any) against the son's estate have been discharged. It is only in respect of the interest which the father takes beneficially in the son's estate that merger arises, so that no prejudice can be occasioned to third parties. It is not claimed that if the father had taken out letters of administration to his son merger would at once have taken place, irrespective of any liabilities of the son. The father would not in that case have been entitled to the land and the charge in the same right, and there would not have been any merger to the prejudice of the son's creditors: (Re Radcliffe; Radcliffe v. Bewes, ubi sup.). This, however, does not affect the question before me, which is whether the father's own beneficial interest in the 7500*l.*, as the sole next of kin of the son, has not merged, and in my opinion it has. Having once arrived at the conclusion that it was for the benefit of the father that it should merge, I see nothing to prevent the extinguishment of the charge taking place. It is established by unquestionable authority that where the owner of land becomes entitled beneficially to a charge thereon as next of kin of a person entitled to the charge, the charge will sink if it is for the benefit of the person entitled to the land that it should, even although some person other than the owner of the land becomes the legal personal representative of the owner of the charge, and even although the charge be secured by an outstanding term vested in trustees for the purpose of raising the charge. This was decided by Lord Loughborough, in 1793, in the case of Lord Compton v. Oxenden (2 Ves. Jun. 261). In that case a lunatic was entitled to land, and his sister, Elizabeth Blomfield, was entitled to two sums of 1500*l.* each secured upon it, one of which two sums was secured by a trust term. She died intestate, leaving her brother her sole next of kin. After the lunatic's death, a bill was filed by his next of kin claiming that these two sums of 1500*l.* each formed part of the lunatic's personal estate and had not sunk into the land, and, on the other hand, it was insisted by Sir Henry Oxenden, the heir-at-law of the lunatic, that he inherited the land free from any charge in favour of the personal estate. It was urged on behalf of the plaintiff that the two sums of 1500*l.* each would have been liable for the debts of Elizabeth, and that, in the absence of any election by the lunatic, it ought not to be held that the charge had merged merely because as sole next of kin of his sister the lunatic had become entitled to the benefit of the charge. Lord Loughborough, however, held that the heir took the land, discharged from the burden which had become merged in the inheritance; and that it made no difference that one of the two sums was secured by a trust term. This case is precisely in point, and the circumstances are undistinguishable from the present. Again, in Forbes v. Moffatt (ubi sup.) Sir William Grant said: "Upon the subject" (of merger or extinguishment of a charge) "a court of equity is not guided by the rules of law. It will sometimes hold a charge extinguished where it would subsist at law and sometimes preserve it, when at law it would be merged." Again, in Swabey v. Swabey (ubi sup.) it was held by Shadwell, V.O. that certain charges on real estate were kept alive so far as was necessary for the payment of certain debts and legacies and subject thereto sank into the inheritance, and that the next of kin had no equity to have the balance of the amount of the charges raised and paid to them. Accordingly I decide that the 7500*l.* in question in this case has sunk into the inheritance.

REX v. JUSTICES OF WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE; Ex parte ELLIS. (a)

Justices—Quarter sessions—Appeal from licensing justices—County solicitor—Disallowance of profit costs of justices clerk.

A county solicitor was appointed for the West Riding of Yorkshire, and paid a salary out of the county funds. His duty was to represent the justices in all judicial business affecting their acts as justices, including the defence of appeals from their decisions under the Licensing Acts.

Held, that the quarter sessions were not entitled to disallow the profit costs of a clerk to justices, who had been retained to act for such justices upon an appeal against a decision under the Licensing Acts, merely because he was employed by the justices instead of the county solicitor.

CAUSE shown against orders nisi for writs of mandamus and certiorari by the justices of the Quarter Sessions of the West Riding of Yorkshire.

On the 5th Feb. 1903 the justices of the East Morley division refused to grant the certificate by way of renewal of the full licence of the Crown Point Hotel. The licensee gave notice of appeal to the quarter sessions, which appeal was dismissed with costs.

The justices duly retained their clerk as their solicitor to act on their behalf in the conduct of the appeal.

The justices for the East Morley division having also refused to grant their certificate by way of renewal of the White Hart Hotel the licensee duly appealed, and the justices at quarter sessions allowed the appeal.

The justices duly retained their clerk in this case also to act on their behalf in the conduct of this appeal.

It has been the custom for more than a century in the West Riding of Yorkshire to appoint a county solicitor, and that officer is now appointed under sect. 66 of the Local Government Act 1888. It is the duty of that solicitor, who receives a salary out of the county funds, to represent the justices in all judicial business affecting their acts as justices, including the defence of appeals from their decisions under the Licensing Acts; and the fact that such was the duty of the solicitor was published in the records of the court, and was well known to all the justices and justices clerks in the Riding, and as a matter of practice the county solicitor had always acted for the justices on appeals from their decisions, and this practice was sanctioned by quarter sessions.

In the case of the Crown Point Hotel the quarter sessions ordered the appellant, the licensee, to pay to the clerk of the peace for the time being of the Riding, to be by him paid over to the justices, the parties entitled to the same, a certain sum by way of costs, which sum was, in the opinion of the court, sufficient to indemnify the justices from all costs they had been put to by reason of the appeal, and it was "further ordered that . . . it be an instruction to the clerk of the peace in ascertaining the amount to be paid to the said justices to exclude the personal professional charges" of the clerk to the justices, who had been employed instead of the county solicitor.

In the case of the White Hart Hotel the treasurer of the Riding was ordered to pay to the justices such sum as was sufficient to indemnify them from all costs and expenses to which they were put in consequence of the appeal, and it was ordered that the personal professional profit charges of the clerk to the justices should be excluded "as being costs not properly incurred by the said justices in the said matter, and not necessary or proper in the opinion of the court to indemnify the said justices."

By the Alehouse Act 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 29:

In every case where notice of appeal against the judgment of any justice in or concerning the execution of this Act shall have been given, and such appeal shall have been dismissed, or the judgment so appealed against shall have been affirmed, or such appeal shall have been abandoned, it shall be lawful for the court to whom such appeal shall have been made, or intended to be made, and such court is hereby required to adjudge and order that the party so having appealed, or given notice of his intention to appeal, shall pay to the justice to whom such notice shall have been given, or to whomsoever he shall appoint, such sum by way of costs as shall in the opinion of such court be sufficient to indemnify such justice from all cost and charge whatsoever to which such justice may have been put in consequence of his having had served upon him notice of the intention of such party to appeal; and if such party shall refuse or neglect forthwith to pay such sum, it shall be lawful for the said court to adjudge and order that the party so refusing or neglecting shall be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to remain until such sum be paid. And in every case in which the judgment so appealed against shall be reversed, it shall be lawful for such court, if it shall think fit, to adjudge and order that the treasurer of the county or place in and for which such justices whose judgment shall have been so reversed shall have acted on the occasion when he shall have given such judgment, shall pay to such justice or to whomsoever he shall appoint such sum as shall in the opinion of such court be sufficient to indemnify such justice from all costs and charges whatsoever to which such justice may have been so put: and the said treasurer is hereby authorised to pay the same which shall be allowed to him in his accounts.

In every case of appeal against the decision of any licensing justice the court to which such appeal is made shall adjudge and order that the treasurer of the county or place in and for which such justice whose decision is appealed against shall have acted on the occasion when he gave such decision, shall pay to such justice such sum as in the opinion of the court shall be sufficient to indemnify such justice from all costs and charges whatsoever to which such justice may have been so put, and which cannot be recovered from any other person, and the said treasurer is hereby authorised to pay the same, which shall be allowed to him in his account. The order of the appellate court may be made either at the sessions when the appeal is heard or at the next ensuing sessions, and the costs may be taxed either in or out of sessions.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Compston with him) showed cause.—The justices in quarter sessions have, under the statutes, to give the licensing justices who appear upon the appeal such costs in their opinion as are sufficient to indemnify them. The two sections that have reference to these cases are sect. 29 of the Alehouse Act 1828 and sect. 20 of the Licensing Act 1902. The first applies where the appeal has been dismissed, and the second where the appeal has been successful. In both sections the sum to be allowed is what is sufficient in the opinion of the court to indemnify the justices for costs properly incurred. If the justices of the Licensing Sessions can employ their own clerk where a county solicitor is provided, the county has to pay twice over as it is liable for its solicitor's salary as well. This office of county solicitor has existed for a very large number of years, and the solicitor is now appointed under sect. 66 of the Local Government Act 1888. He referred to

Roberts v. Jones, (1891) 2 Q. B. 194.

It was held in Reg. v. Justices of London (62 L. T. Rep. 211; (1895) 1 Q. B. 616) that when an appeal is dismissed the Court of Quarter Sessions has a discretion as to the costs of justices who make themselves party to the appeal, and that if they have exercised their discretion by refusing to give the costs of their appeal to licensing justices the High Court cannot interfere by mandamus. The present case is not one for mandamus, for the justices have exercised their discretion and have given such costs as they think are necessary to properly indemnify the licensing justices. Further, they have not exceeded their jurisdiction and therefore it is not a matter for certiorari. He also referred to

Reg. v. Middlesex Justices, 35 L. T. Rep. 402; 2 Q. B. Div. 516;

Bruce Williamson, for the licensee of the Crown Point Hotel, did not contest the rules.

Macmorran, K.C. (Greenwood with him) for the licensing justices.—The sum to be allowed must be what the justices in quarter sessions have considered to be sufficient to indemnify the justices. He referred to

Reg. v. Worcestershire Justices, 83 L. T. Rep. 272 ;
(1900) 2 Q. B. 576 ;

Reg. v. Winder (sup.).

Whatever costs are reasonable should be paid to the justices by way of indemnity, but here the Court of Quarter Sessions took upon themselves to give a direction to the clerk of the peace with reference to the principle upon which he was to tax which is beyond their jurisdiction. The orders are bad on their face in so far as they contain directions which are ultra vires and so certiorari is an appropriate remedy. With regard to the rules for the writs of mandamus the justices at quarter sessions have not in fact exercised their statutory powers. [Danckwerts, K.C. referred to Henderson v. Merthyr Tydfil Urban District Council (1900) 1 Q. B. 434.]

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case is by no means free from difficulty, but, having heard the arguments on each side, I have come to the conclusion that these orders go too far and cannot be supported. It was admitted that the effect of sect. 20 of the Licensing Act 1902 was to place justices in the same position with regard to being indemnified from the costs incurred when their decisions were reversed as they were under sect. 29 of the Alehouse Act 1828 when their decisions were upheld. The two cases before the court are therefore in the same position, and it is only necessary to refer to sect. 29 of the Act of 1828. [His Lordship read that section and continued:] I think Mr. Danckwerts has made good his position that if the justices must be taken to have acted under that section and had fixed a sum, ascertained by them or their clerk for them, which in their opinion would indemnify the licensing justices from the costs which they had been put to in consequence of having been served with the notice of appeal, this court could not have interfered by certiorari or mandamus. In that case the justices would have exercised their discretion, and the court could not therefore interfere. But looking at the orders and affidavits I do not, however, think that that was the way in which the case comes before us, or was intended to come. I agree that the same question arises on both the orders, except that I may say that there does not seem to be the same reason for making the order in the case where the appeal was unsuccessful as in that of a successful appeal, for in the latter case the justices' costs would have had to be paid out of the public funds. The form of the order made in the unsuccessful appeal shows that it was not an ordinary order as to costs, but was an order made, as was stated on the face of it, "in view of particular matters brought before the court." It is now clear on the affidavits what is meant by "in view of particular matters brought before the court." It appears clear, therefore, that the order is not a taxation of the costs of the justices, but is a special order because the court thought that the licensing justices should have engaged the county solicitor to act for them on the appeals.

It seems to me, therefore, that the case is taken out of the mere question of taxation, and raises the question as to whether the Court of Quarter Sessions can take the case out of the section (29), because the justices have employed a solicitor other than the county solicitor. The question raised is whether there is a legal obligation on the licensing justices to employ the county solicitor. I have no doubt that there is no statute or rule of law which compels the licensing justices to employ a particular solicitor. Sect. 66 of the Local Government Act 1888 cannot affect the rights given by sect. 29 of the Act of 1828. I am of opinion that the order drawn up under the circumstances of the case is not an order under sect. 29, and so is in excess of the jurisdiction of the quarter sessions, and therefore the objections raised against the rules being made absolute do not hold good. The order must, therefore, be quashed, and, since the magistrates have not considered the question of costs, the matter must be sent back to them.

WILLS, J.—I am satisfied that the magistrates had no jurisdiction to force the licensing justices to employ a particular solicitor to act for them. It is quite clear that the licensing justices cannot be deprived of their right to be indemnified as to their costs merely because they did not employ a special solicitor. The Court of Quarter Sessions has assumed certain powers which they do not possess. What has been done as appears on the face of the orders themselves was not a matter of taxation, but was an application of a false principle.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree, and I have nothing to add.

Rating—Volunteer drill hall and storehouse—Part occasionally let for other purposes—Exemption from rates—Crown purposes.

Certain premises were used as a storehouse, drill hall, &c., for a volunteer battalion, the whole of the property being in the occupation of, and vested in, the commanding officer. Certain portions of the premises were occasionally let for lectures, balls, &c., but such letting was subservient to the use of the premises for military purposes.

The appellant was the caretaker, and did not reside on the premises, but the musical and dramatic licences were taken out in the name of the appellant. The appellant was rated in respect of such portions of the premises as were let out for the above-mentioned purposes.

Held, that, although the appellant was not the proper person to be rated, as he was only a servant, yet those portions of the premises which were let out were properly rateable.

LEWIS (app.) v. DURHAM UNION (resps.).

[K.B. Div.]

CASE stated by the order of Bucknill, J. pursuant to 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, judgment in conformity with the decision of the court to be entered on motion by either party at the Durham Quarter Sessions.

The facts were as follows:—

The question to be raised concerns the rateability of certain premises situated in the parish of St. Giles, in the city of Durham, and being numbered 40, 41, and 42, in the street of Gilesgate, used as a storehouse, drill hall, sergeant instructors' residence, officers' and non-commissioned officers' quarters.

The whole of the property is in the occupation of the officer commanding the 4th Volunteer Battalion the Durham Light Infantry, the appellant being only a caretaker, whom the overseers of the poor for the parish entered as the occupier in the rate-book.

The appellant is a servant and is paid a weekly wage for attending to the premises, and does not reside on the premises.

The whole of the property is freehold and is vested in the commanding officer for the time being of the 4th Volunteer Battalion Durham Light Infantry, which consists of about 1000 officers and men. It is subject to a mortgage of 6000*l.*, granted to the Public Works Loan Board under the authority of the Secretary of State for War.

The buildings in question consist of two floors and a basement, with a large drill hall between the front and back portions thereof extending to the roof. The primary purpose of the premises is that of a drill hall and storehouse for rifles, clothing, and other arms and property, such as camp equipment, of the battalion.

The premises have been duly certified as a storehouse by the authorities under 26 & 27 Vict. c. 65, s. 26.

The owners have a music licence from the Durham city justices and a dramatic licence from the Durham county justices in respect of so much of the premises as are used for music or theatrical purposes, and these licences are in the name of the appellant.

Certain portions of the premises are occasionally let for lectures, trade exhibitions, concerts, balls, dramatic, and other performances, such letting is subservient, however, to the use of the premises for military purposes. The portions so let come into competition with other buildings in the city of Durham which are let in the same way. These buildings are rated according to their annual value.

The respondents have rated such portions of the premises as are let for the above purposes on a gross estimated rental of 60*l.* and a rateable value of 50*l.*, the portions of the premises used exclusively for volunteer or military purposes are not rated.

The appellant contended that the whole of the premises are exempt from rateability under sect. 26 of 26 & 27 Vict. c. 65, and that they are also exempt as being in the occupation of the Crown for the purposes of the Crown, that the premises were erected and are primarily used for the purposes of the Crown, and the letting being only a secondary or subsidiary use thereof when not required for the purposes of the Crown, and that the premises are not liable to be rated for any amount whatever. He also contended that as the profits obtained from the letting of the hall are appropriated to the repayment of the 6000*l.* borrowed from the Public Works Loan Board, there is no beneficial occupation of the premises to render them liable to be rated; and, further, that the person so rated is not the occupier nor in any way beneficially interested in the premises.

The respondents, on the other hand, contended that to entitle the premises to be exempt from rateability under the section above referred to they must be occupied exclusively as a storehouse, or for some purpose reasonably incident thereto, and must also "be occupied" merely for public purposes, that such portions of the premises as are let are not so occupied, and that the exemption, therefore, does not extend to these portions. They further contended that when so let they are not used for the purposes of the Crown, that the appellant is the licensee of the premises and responsible for their proper management when used under the licences, and that he is therefore properly rateable in respect thereof; and that to the extent of the sums received for the letting there is a beneficial occupation which renders him liable to be rated irrespective of the purposes to which these sums are applied.

Ryde for the appellant.—These premises are occupied for Crown purposes, and so are exempt from the rate. The mere fact that some part of the premises are let for other purposes does not do away with the exemption. Liability to be rated depends upon occupation, and here the premises are occupied for Crown purposes. In Hornsey Urban District Council v. Hennell (86 L. T. Rep. 423; (1902) 2 K. B. 73) it was held that premises used as the headquarters of and for the purposes of a volunteer battalion were owned and occupied by the commanding officer as a servant of the Crown, and for the purposes of the Crown. He also referred to

Smith v. Birmingham Guardians, 7 El. & Bl. 483.

Any profit that is made from these premises being let goes to the Crown, and is applied to Crown purposes—that is, the expense of the battalion. The mere fact that money is made in this way does not do away with the exemption. Rayner v. Drewitt (82 L. T. Rep. 718) cannot be relied upon as an authority against the appellant here, for the point taken in this case could not have been taken there, for it was a summons to enforce the rate, and not an appeal against the rate. He also referred to Coomber v. Berkshire Justices, 47 L. T. Rep. 687; 50 L. T. Rep. 405; 9 Q. B. Div. 17; 10 Q. B. Div. 267; 9 App. Cas. 61.

The appellant is not the proper person to be rated, as the occupation of the servant is the occupation of the master:

Ree v. Tynemouth, 12 East, 46.

Simey for the respondents.—The appellant here is rightly rated because so far as the premises are rateable as being let for these other purposes the licences for these other purposes are in his name. As to the other point, these premises are not exclusively used for Crown purposes, and pro tanto they are not occupied by the Crown or used for Crown purposes and so they are rateable. He referred to Pearson v. Assessment Committee of Holborn Union, 68 L. T. Rep. 351; (1893) 1 Q. B. 389.

This case is covered by the decision in Rayner v. Drewitt (82 L. T. Rep. 718), and there is no distinction between that case and this one. Here there is an occupation in two capacities. In respect of the first the premises are not rateable and have not been rated. In respect of the second they are clearly not exempt, and it can make no difference that the proceeds of these lettings are used for the purpose of repaying the loan. He referred to

Reg. v. Fuller, 8 El. & Bl. 365;

Hornsey Urban District Council v. Hennell, 86 L. T. Rep. 423; (1902) 2 Q. B. 73;

Lancashire Justices v. Cheetham, 8 B. & S. 548; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 14.

Ryde in reply.—The case of Lancashire Justices v. Cheetham (sup.) is the only one against me, and, since the case of Coomber v. Berkshire Justices (sup.), it is clear that Cockburn, C.J. misapprehended the effect of Jones v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board (sup.).

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I think that Mr. Ryde has endeavoured to get us to adopt a test and reject a test inconsistent with the decided cases. I thought at one time during the argument that if you had occupation of premises for Crown purposes, and a utilisation of those premises for other than Crown purposes, such a user was not the same as an occupation and the exemption of the premises was not done away with. But, having gone through the cases, I have come to the conclusion that we have to distinguish between Crown property and property used for Crown purposes, and the view I have expressed was the right one, that the proper word is "used" and not "occupied." Now, the case of Pearson v. Assessment Committee of Holborn Union (68 L. T. Rep. 351; (1893) 1 Q. B. 389) decides that premises occupied by a volunteer corps, and being reasonably necessary for such service, are occupied by servants of the Crown for the purposes of the Crown and therefore are exempt from rates. I agree with Mr. Ryde that that case shows that the exemption is not limited to the specific portion of the premises that is used as a storehouse for the depositing and safe keeping of arms and ammunition, but includes all such parts of the premises as are reasonably necessary for the service of the corps, but, as Collins, J. points out, "they are exempt as being in the occupation of servants of the Crown for the purposes of the Crown." That case established that premises could be exempt if used for volunteer purposes. One must go back and consider whether mere occupation by the servants of the Crown is the sole test, and one must consider whether there must be something amounting to occupation for other purposes by other persons before the exemption is got rid of. Lord Blackburn in Jones v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board (11 H. of L. Cas. 443), at p. 464, says: "Long series of cases have established that where property is occupied for the purposes of the government of the country, including under that head the police and the administration of justice, no one is rateable in respect of such occupation. And this applies not only to property occupied for such purposes by the servants of the great departments of State, such as the Post Office, Smith v. Birmingham (7 El. & Bl. 483); the Horse Guards, Lord Amherst v. Lord Somers (2 T. R. 372); or the Admiralty, Reg. v. Stewart (8 El. & Bl. 360), in all which cases the occupiers might strictly be called the servants of the Crown, but also to property occupied by local police, Justices of Lancashire v. Shelford (Ell. Bl. & Ell. 225); to courts and buildings occupied for the assizes and for the judges' lodgings, Hodgson v. Local Board of Carlisle (8 El. & Bl. 116); or occupied as a county court, Reg. v. Manchester (3 El. & Bl. 336); or for a jail, Reg. v. Shepherd (1 Q. B. 170). In these latter cases it is difficult to maintain that the occupants are, strictly speaking, servants of the Sovereign, so as to make the occupation that of Her Majesty, but the purposes are all public purposes of that kind, which, by the Constitution of this country, fall within the province of Government, and are committed to the Sovereign, so that the occupiers, though not perhaps strictly servants of the Sovereign, might be considered in consimili casu." The enunciation of that proposition affords ground for the rule that it must be an occupation for the purposes of the Crown, in order to give the exemption. But it is said that if you have that occupation you do not lose the exemption by a user of the premises for other purposes. Lord Cairns in Greig v. University of Edinburgh (L. Rep. 1 H. L. Sc. 348) says: "The general principle, as I understand it, approved of by your Lordships in these cases is this, that the Crown, not being named in the English and Scotch statutes on the subject of assessment, and not being bound by statute when not expressly named, any property which is in the occupation of the Crown, or of persons using it exclusively in and for the service of the Crown, is not rateable to the relief of the poor." In that case Lord Cairns lays down the test that where the property is used by other persons, and not by the Crown itself, the use of such other persons must be exclusively in and for the service of the Crown. Then the case of Lancashire Justices v. Cheetham (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 14), if not inconsistent with the other cases, is binding on us. It may not be a right decision, but it was there held that justices who by a local act were empowered to build assize courts and to let them for other purposes, were rateable in respect of the net profits so made by such letting as to that extent they had a beneficial occupation within the principle established by the case of Jones v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board (sup.). It may be that that case is open to criticism, but it is an instance of a user by servants of the Crown of premises for purposes other than the Crown purposes for which they were built. Then the case of Worcestershire County Council v. Worcester Union (76 L. T. Rep. 139; (1897) 1 Q. B. 480) lays it down that county buildings which are used partly but not exclusively in and for the service of the Crown are rateable to the relief of the poor. It is impossible to say that in order to get rid of the exemption for rates the user for other purposes must amount to an occupation. I also think that Rayner v. Drewitt (82 L. T. Rep. 718) is an authority in favour of the view I am now taking. Applying these principles to these facts, I think that on the main point which has been argued before us the decision was right that this property was liable to be rated, for I cannot think that the mere fact that the money obtained by letting the hall was used to repay the loan from the Public Works Loan Board can make that use of the premises a use for Crown purposes. With regard to the other point, the appellant here was not the person rateable in respect of the premises. It is clear that the occupation of the servant is the occupation of the master, and nothing in the present case shows that there should be any exception to the rule. The mere fact that the licences for these premises have been granted to the appellant does not make him rightly rateable.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. Where the occupation of property is only constructively a Crown occupation, the exemption from rating only exists where the whole beneficial occupation enures for the benefit of the Crown. Where it enures for another purpose, then to that extent, pro tanto, the premises are rateable.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think that this case is substantially decided by the decision in Worcestershire County Council v. Worcester Union (76 L. T. Rep. 139; (1897) 1 Q. B. 480).

Summary jurisdiction—Practice—Justices divided in opinion—Adjournment—Case reheard by further justices—Jurisdiction.

An information having been heard before two justices they retired to consider their decision.

Upon their return to court they announced that they were divided in opinion, and they decided to adjourn the hearing to a future day to be heard before themselves and other justices.

Held, that the intimation that they were divided in opinion did not preclude the justices from adjourning the hearing of the information.

CASE stated by five justices on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant under the Licensing Acts 1872-4 for selling and exposing for sale intoxicating liquor during the time that the premises were directed to be closed.

The information first came on for hearing on Tuesday, the 18th Aug. 1903, before two of the before-mentioned five justices, and, after hearing the whole of the evidence in examination and cross-examination then adduced on behalf of the respondent and appellant respectively, the two justices retired to consider their decision, and upon their return they announced in open court that they were divided in opinion. Whereupon the solicitor appearing for the appellant asked that the information should be dismissed, but the two justices decided that a more satisfactory decision could only be arrived at upon rehearing with other of their fellow-justices, and they agreed to adjourn the information to a future day, when they and other justices on the rota for that day would be convened to rehear the information.

In reply to the solicitor for the appellant, who asked whether they were unanimous in agreeing to the adjournment, they stated that they were.

The information again came on for hearing on Tuesday, the 15th Sept. 1903, when the two justices who had previously heard the information and failed to arrive at a satisfactory decision and three other justices who were on the rota for that day were present, and the information was heard and determined, and the appellant was convicted of the offence.

When the information was called on for hearing on the 15th Sept., counsel who appeared for the appellants objected to the jurisdiction of the justices then present to rehear the information, as it had been heard and determined by the two justices on the 18th Aug. last, and that, as the two justices could not agree, and as the information was a criminal information upon which the defendant and present appellant could have been fined on conviction and in default of distress could have been imprisoned, they could not or should not have adjourned the information, but should then have dismissed it, and he cited in support of this contention the following cases: Reg. v. Ashplant (52 J. P. 474) and Kinnis v. Graves (78 L. T. Rep. 502).

The solicitor who appeared for the appellant replied on the point of law, and contended that, although it was a criminal information, it was competent for the two justices who were divided in opinion to adjourn the hearing to a future date, when the information could be reheard by them and any other justices then present, and that no decision or determination was come to by the two justices when they agreed to adjourn the information, and in support of his contention he cited the following cases: Reg. v. Ashplant (52 J. P. 474) and Ex parte Evans (58 J. P. 260).

The five justices determined that they had power to rehear the information, and counsel who appeared for the appellant thereupon asked them to state a case and adjourn further proceedings sine die until such case was disposed of, but they refused to do so and determined to hear the evidence, whereupon counsel who appeared for the appellant, not consenting to the exercise of their jurisdiction, retired from the case, and the respondent called and examined one witness, who was not cross-examined by the appellant's counsel, and the justices convicted the appellant as before-mentioned.

After the appellant had been convicted, counsel for the appellant again applied to the justices to state a case, which they agreed to do.

The justices were of opinion that although the information was a criminal one, punishable after conviction by fine or imprisonment, they had a right to rehear the information; that the two justices who had previously heard it had not determined the matter of the information, but had agreed to adjourn the same for rehearing before themselves and others of their brother justices so that a more satisfactory determination could be arrived at; and that, as the evidence given on behalf of the respondent was not disputed, they decided that the appellant was guilty of the offence with which he was charged, and so they convicted him accordingly.

S. T. Evans, K.C. (Ivor Bowen with him) for the appellant.—The powers of justices to adjourn are contained in sect. 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), which says that “before or during such hearing of any such information or complaint it shall be lawful” to adjourn the hearing of the same, and the same powers are conferred upon a court of summary jurisdiction, when not a petty sessional court, by sect. 20 (11) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49). This adjournment was not “before or during such hearing,” but after the hearing. Where justices are divided equally, the summons ought to be dismissed. He referred to Avory, K.C. (Lewis M. Richards with him) for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In this case no question of mandamus to rehear arises. I have no doubt that the words “before or during such hearing” include what in the ordinary proceedings of the court would take place before a final decision was given. It would be lamentable if, when justices announced that they were divided in opinion, that would be such a termination of the hearing that they could not deal any further with the case. An intimation that they were divided in opinion would not preclude them from adjourning the case any time before their decision was drawn up.

WILLS, J.—I adhere to the opinion that I expressed in Kinnis v. Graves (78 L. T. Rep. 503), where, the Bench being equally divided, the justices on the advice of their clerk, dismissed the information. I there said: “I cannot help saying, however, that in my opinion such a course was not quite wise. What would have been done, had the case been before the High Court, would have been to adjourn the summons and reconstitute the court so as to obtain a decision which would be the decision of a majority—an effective decision.” It is quite clear that the power of the justices to adjourn the matter was not taken away by the words “during such hearing.”

Food and drugs—Milk—Warranty—Addition of preservative by purchaser—Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 6, 25.

A purchaser of milk with a written warranty, who has added a preservative to such milk, cannot rely upon sect. 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, even although the addition of such preservative is not complained of as an adulteration.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the appellant against the respondent under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were admitted or proved in evidence before the justices:—

On the 10th June 1903 the appellant purchased one pint of new milk, for which he paid 2d., from the respondent.

The appellant then divided the milk in accordance with the Act, and one part he took to the public analyst, whose certificate showed that the sample was deficient in fat to the extent of 3 per cent., and contained added water to the amount of 5·2 per cent. at least, and that the sample contained boric acid as a preservative.

On the 9th July 1903 the appellant received from the respondent's solicitors a written notice that on the hearing of the information the respondent would rely on the defence that the respondent purchased the milk in question as the same in substance and quality as that demanded of him by the appellant, and with the written warranty—namely, that it was new milk unadulterated and with all its cream—to that effect, and that he had no reason to believe at the time he sold the milk that it was otherwise, and that he sold the milk in the same state as he purchased it. The notice also gave the name of the person from the respondent received the milk.

The respondent gave evidence, and he admitted that he had put into the milk in question an ounce of milk preservative to each ten gallons of milk. He stated that, although by the directions on the packet in which the milk preservative so used by him as aforesaid was contained it appeared that the preservative should be dissolved in water before being put into milk, he had not followed the directions, but had put the same into the milk in a dry condition without dissolving the same. The respondent stated that he had not discovered that the preservative left any sediment.

It was proved by the borough analyst on behalf of the appellant that dry boric acid would dissolve in milk but slowly, and would very likely leave a sediment, but that there was no sediment in the sample of milk in question and which he analysed.

The respondent contended that the agreement was a warranty, and was a complete defence under sect. 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875.

The appellant contended that sect. 25 of the Act of 1875, required the respondent, relying on the agreement as a warranty, to prove also that he had no reason to believe at the time he sold it that the milk was other than of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the appellant, and that he sold it in the same state as when he purchased it; that by the respondent's own admission the milk in question was not in the same state as when he purchased it, by reason of his having added matter thereto as aforesaid; and that the warranty was therefore not an answer to the charge, and the respondent was not entitled to be discharged from the prosecution.

The justices, being equally divided as to whether the warranty constituted under the circumstances a defence entitling the respondent to be discharged from the prosecution, dismissed the information.

S. H. Emanuel for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case must go back to the justices. It was said that the warranty was a defence, as only boric acid was added, and the milk was sold in the same state as when it was purchased, because the boric acid had nothing to do with the adulteration alleged. When, however, one looks at sect. 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, it is not the written warranty only that affords a defence, but the defendant must show the other matters required by the section. When it was found that the respondent had put in boric acid, the case to be tried was not under sect. 25, but under the protective words of sect. 6. The milk here was not sold in the same state as the respondent purchased it, and the justices ought not to have held that the warranty was a defence.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I only desire to add a few words. Sect. 25 of the Act is plain that the article must be sold in the same state as when the defendant purchased it, and no question can be raised as to whether or not the substance or matter added did any harm or not. If the warranty is going to be relied on, the defendant must show that what was sold was exactly what was purchased.

KENNEDY, J.—I think the section is quite clear, and I do not see how there is any doubt about the matter. In order that a defendant may be discharged from the prosecution, he must prove that he purchased the article in question as the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded of him by the prosecutor and with a written warranty to that effect; that he had no reason to believe at the time when he sold it that it was otherwise; and that he sold it in the same state as when he purchased it. If a man adds boric acid to milk after he has received it, how can he sell it in the same state as when he purchased it when he sells milk plus acid?

LINZELL (app.) v. FELIXSTOWE AND WALTON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (reps). (a) Local government—By-law—Building—“Place of habitual employment for any person in any business”—Stables of building contractor.

By by-law No. 2 certain buildings which should not be constructed or adapted to be used “as a place of habitual employment for any person in any manufacture, trade, or business” were to be exempt from the by-laws relating to new buildings.

Held, that a building divided into three parts, consisting of a rain goods store, a timber store, and stables, used by a building contractor, was not a building used “as a place of habitual employment for any person in any manufacture, trade, or business” even although part consisted of the stables.

CASE stated on an information preferred on behalf of the respondents charging the appellant with having erected a new building contrary to by-law 10 of the by-laws in force of the urban district of the respondents.

By by-law 2:

The following buildings shall be exempt from the operation of the by-laws relating to new streets and buildings: . . . (i) Any building which shall not . . . be constructed or adapted to be used either wholly or partly for human habitation or as a place of habitual employment for any person in any manufacture, trade, or business. . . .

By-law 10 related to new buildings.

The appellant was a building contractor, and the building in question, which was erected in timber and roofed in wood, was divided by partitions which did not extend above the eaves of the roof. One end was used as a cement store and rain goods store, the middle portion was used as a timber store, and the other end was a stable. In this stable the horses, employed by the appellant in his trade, were kept.

The respondents contended that the building was constructed or adapted to be used as a place of habitual employment for any person in any manufacture, trade, or business, and that therefore it was not exempted.

The justices were of opinion that the building was not exempted under the by-law, and they therefore convicted the appellant.

Ashton for the appellant.

R. Cunningham Glen for the respondents.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case seems to be a striking instance of the absolute necessity of using some discretion and common sense in drafting these by-laws. I sympathise very much, if I may be allowed to say so, with Mr. Glen's contention. I think it is ridiculous that stables should be exempt from drainage regulations. It is most desirable that stables should be subjected to drainage regulations; but, in the name of all that is common sense, why cannot the by-laws say stables if they mean stables? When you look at the framing of this by-law, it does not tend to assist the builder or anybody else to know what they may do. By-law 10 begins by including every building. So far there is no difficulty. Then there are a long series of exemptions in by-law 2, and any building is exempted which shall not exceed 30ft. in height and does not contain more than 125,000 cubic feet. We then get a general exemption which exempts certain buildings. The buildings in question consist of one structure in timber, roofed in wood, and divided by partitions. One end is used as a cement store, the middle portion as a timber store, and the other end as a stable. It is stated by the respondents that no part of the building, except the stables, is adapted to be used for the habitual employment of a person in a manufacture, trade, or business. I think the magistrates have stated this case not as a finding on the facts, but they have stated the facts as regards the building, and ask whether they come within the words of the by-law. It seems to me the building is not within the words “a place for the habitual employment of a person in a manufacture, trade, or business," because horses are groomed and kept by a horsekeeper, who is employed by the builder. I must say if the building is exempt under the portion of the by-law relating to 30ft., in order to bring it in again under some other words, they ought to be more reasonably clear than "as a place adapted to be used for the habitual employment of any person in a manufacture, trade, or business." It cannot be that because a man grooms a horse that that is a trade or business. While I agree that it is desirable that there should be by-laws which should include the drainage of stables, I think this by-law is not sufficient to make out that this building, which is not 30ft. high, comes within it. I think, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

APPEAL IN BANKRUPTCY.

Bankruptcy—Right to annul adjudication—Debtor presenting his own petition—Endeavour to avoid committal order—Abuse of process of court—Property vesting in trustee—Personal earnings of debtor—Weekly wages—Commission—Bankruptcy Act 1883 (45 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 41.

The weekly wages and commission earned by a bankrupt between the commencement of his bankruptcy and his discharge are personal earnings of the bankrupt and belong to his trustee, except so much as is necessary for the maintenance of the bankrupt and his family.

Re Roberts (81 L. T. Rep. 467; (1900) 1 Q. B. 122) followed.

A debtor, with the intention of evading a committal order made against him upon a judgment summons, presented his own bankruptcy petition, upon which a receiving order was made. His income was about 300l. a year from weekly wages and commission, and the judgment creditor was his only creditor, the debt amounting to about 200l., being the balance of a judgment obtained against him.

Held, that the presentation of the petition by the debtor was not an abuse of the process of the court.

APPEAL by certain creditors from the refusal of the registrar to rescind a receiving order founded on the bankrupt's petition.

The bankrupt was in employment as a salesman in a cabinet factory, and received a weekly salary of 5l. and certain commission, his total income amounting to about 300l. a year.

In 1899 the creditors obtained judgment against the debtor for 214l. and costs, and they afterwards obtained an order against him for payment of that sum by instalments of 4l. a month.

On three occasions committal orders were obtained against the debtor in default of payment of amounts due in respect of the 4l. a month, and he then paid the amounts due.

On the 8th Aug. 1903 a further committal order was obtained in respect of an overdue instalment, and on the 14th Aug. he presented his petition under sect. 8 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883, alleging he was unable to pay his debts, and was afterwards adjudicated a bankrupt, and a receiving order was made.

The only creditors who proved were the judgment creditors, and for the balance of the judgment debt.

H. Reed, K.C. and Stephen Lynch for the appellants.—The presentation of this petition by the debtor was an abuse of the process of the court. It was done to avoid the effect of the committal order. Unless there was proof that he had means, the order would not have been made. The case of Ex parte Painter; Re Painter (71 L. T. Rep. 581; (1895) 1 Q. B. 85) is in favour of the debtor, but that case was distinguished in Re Betts; Ex parte Official Receiver (84 L. T. Rep. 427; (1901) 2 K. B. 39), which is a similar case to this, and there the receiving order was rescinded. The debtor ought not to be allowed to avoid the committal order made against him by filing a petition in bankruptcy. Here the debtor's weekly wages cannot be administered in the bankruptcy. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—After payment of what is necessary for the support of the debtor and his family, the trustee will be entitled to the balance: (Re Graydon, 74 L. T. Rep. 175; (1896) 1 Q. Muir Mackenzie for the debtor.—This case is within Ex parte Painter (ubi sup.), and there has been no abuse of the process of the court. Re Betts (ubi sup.) was a very different case. There the court considered that the debtor had been committing a series of frauds on his creditors, he having twice before at short intervals presented a bankruptcy petition with the object of evading committal orders. This is a very different case. The debtor owes a debt of 200l., which he cannot pay, and it is no abuse of the process of the court to seek the protection of the Bankruptcy Acts and so avoid being sent to prison and perhaps losing his employment. The trustee will be entitled to retain for the creditors so much of the debtor's earnings as is not necessary for the maintenance of himself and his family:

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think the decision of the registrar was perfectly right, and that there is no ground for saying that the making of the receiving order or the adjudication on the debtor's own petition was an abuse of the process of the court. In Re Roberts (ubi sup.) it was decided that under sect. 41 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883, which vests in the trustee all property belonging to the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy or acquired by him before discharge, all personal earnings of the bankrupt between the commencement of his bankruptcy and his discharge belong to his trustee, save only what is necessary for the support of the bankrupt and his family. Having regard to that decision, which was by no means the first decision to that effect, it is quite plain that these creditors can obtain payment of their debt out of the balance of the personal earnings of the bankrupt after payment of what is necessary for the support of himself and his family, and nothing brought about by this adjudication ought to prejudice the creditors in any degree. The very money which they seek to get from time to time by committal orders will come to them by reason of this adjudication. Under these circumstances it seems to me impossible to say that the presentation of this petition was an abuse of the process of the court. It is true the result of the receiving order will be that the debtor will not be liable from time to time to the pressure of a committal order, but I am not prepared to say the Legislature did not intend that a debtor who was being subjected to such pressure might relieve himself by obtaining an adjudication in bankruptcy against himself. But, as I have already pointed out, this is not a case in which the debtor could thereby achieve the result of relieving himself from payment of the debt due to his only creditors. On the contrary, that debt will or may be paid to these creditors by the statutory means which the Legislature intended to apply in a case such as this. I think, therefore, that it is impossible in the present case to say that the presentation of this petition was an abuse of the process of the court.

ROBERTSON v. BUCHANAN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Covenant—Sale of medical practice—Covenant not to set up in practice within certain distance—Residence beyond distance—Attending former patients within distance.

Where on the sale of a medical practice the vendor covenants not to "set up in practice" within the distance of two miles from the house at which he carried on the practice sold, he does not commit a breach of that covenant by attending at their request for remuneration two or three of his former patients within that distance, though it is not essential to the breach of such a covenant that the vendor should reside within the prohibited area; he may reside beyond the distance and yet commit a breach of the covenant by acts done within it.

Decision of Joyce, J. affirmed.

By an indenture dated the 14th March 1901, and made between J. Buchanan of the one part and J. Robertson of the other part (after reciting a lease of No. 337, Brixton-road, and its assignment to J. Buchanan, and that J. Buchanan had agreed to sell and assign to J. Robertson the premises together with the practice of a physician and surgeon then or lately carried on by J. Buchanan upon the premises at the price of 750*l.*), J. Buchanan, in consideration of the said sum of 750*l.*, assigned to John Robertson the residue of the said lease of No. 337, Brixton-road, and also his practice as a physician and surgeon carried on by him at that address, and the goodwill, benefits, and advantages thereof; and Buchanan covenanted with Robertson

That he the said John Buchanan will not for a period of ten years computed from the 14th day of February last, except with the consent of the said John Robertson, set up in practice as a physician and surgeon either alone or jointly with any other person or persons whomsoever within the distance (as the crow flies) of two miles of No. 337, Brixton-road aforesaid.

At the beginning of 1903 J. Buchanan took up his residence at No. 259, Vauxhall Bridge-road, which, it was alleged, was only 554 yards outside the prescribed radius, and practised as a physician and surgeon, having plates with his name on them on the door and gate of the premises.

Robertson afterwards commenced this action against Buchanan, and alleged that the defendant had since been soliciting and attending some of his old patients within the prescribed radius, and claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from setting up in practice as a physician or surgeon within two miles of No. 337, Brixton-road, in breach of the covenant contained in the indenture of the 14th March 1901, and an injunction to restrain the defendant from soliciting or canvassing the former patients of the defendant in his practice of physician and surgeon sold by him to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff then moved for an interim injunction.

In his affidavit in support of the motion the plaintiff relied on two cases in which he alleged the defendant had solicited two old patients.

The defendant in his affidavit denied that he had solicited any of his old patients. He deposed that he had attended one lady only at her express written request. As to the other case, he said the lady was a personal friend on whom he happened to call, and at her request he gave her a prescription and received no fee for doing so.

The defendant also deposed that at the time of the sale he refused to enter into a covenant restraining him from carrying on practice within a certain limit, but offered not to set up in practice within a radius of two miles if the plaintiff agreed that he might carry on practice by visiting patients if requested without restriction; and that he expressly pointed out to the plaintiff that under the proposed arrangement he would be entitled to attend the plaintiff's next-door neighbour if requested, though he could not have a house or surgery for practice within the radius.

This was denied by the plaintiff.

(a) Reported by W. C. Biss, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The motion came before Joyce, J. on the 17th Dec. 1903, when no order was made except that the costs be costs in the cause.

The plaintiff appealed, and the notice of appeal claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from setting up in practice or practising as a physician or surgeon within the prohibited area.

It was agreed that the appeal should be treated as the trial of the action.

Hamilton, K.C. and G. Lawrence for the appellant.—The defendant, having covenanted not to "set up in practice" within this radius, is not entitled to take a house just outside it and attend patients within it. A covenant not to "set up" in practice is equivalent to a covenant not to start and carry on practice. A general practitioner may practise in more than one place; that is, he may have his residence at one place and also carry on practice at another place. This covenant can be broken by the defendant attending patients within the radius although he resides outside it:

Mitchell v. Hender, 23 L. J. 273, Q. B.

It is not essential to the practice of a surgeon or physician that he should have any house at all:

Palmer v. Mallett, 58 L. T. Rep. 64; 36 Ch. Div. 411;

Turner v. Evans, 2 De G. M. & G. 740; 2 Ell. & B. 512.

It is immaterial whether the words used are "set up" or "compete." The covenant means that the defendant, having sold his practice to the plaintiff, will not destroy the value of what he has sold. The purchaser is entitled to the practice he has paid for:

Rogers v. Drury, 57 L. J. 504, Ch.

Younger, K.C. and E. G. Palmer for the defendant.—All the plaintiff has purchased is the right of the defendant to set up in practice within the limited district, and to solicit his old patients. The sale of the goodwill prevents the solicitation; the covenant does not—it only refers to the undertaking of the defendant not to place himself within two miles of the old address. The proximity of a doctor to his patients is of importance. "Set up" does not mean the same as "carry on." In the cases referred to, the words were "carry on." The defendant has not set up in practice within two miles of the old address. In Trego v. Hunt (73 L. T. Rep. 514; (1896) A. C. 7) it was held that where the goodwill of a business is sold (without further provision), the vendor may set up a rival business though he may not canvass the customers of the old firm, and this covenant was to provide against that. They also referred to Hamilton, K.C. in reply.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The parties, I understand, have agreed this appeal shall be treated as the trial of the action. I am not sure that I am very pleased that that is the case, because I have no doubt that, when the parties agreed that that should be so, they intended to obtain, and thought that they would obtain, in our judgment on this appeal a construction of this agreement which would prevent all disputes in the future. I am rather afraid that, having regard to the evidence and the position taken up by the two parties, there may still be matters on which these two gentlemen may fall out if not guided by common sense and a friendly spirit. If these two gentlemen, in respect of the particular words of this covenant, intend to give on the one side and the other true effect to the bargain made between them, each side giving full measure, I do not think that they will find much difficulty; but if after our judgment they approach it in a litigious spirit, I think it may yet be open to them to throw away a good deal of money. What has happened here? There has been a sale of this business formerly carried on by the respondent at No. 337, Brixton-road. No doubt something was intended to be sold, and, having regard to the view which the law has taken of what passes on the sale of the goodwill of a business, purchasers have to protect themselves by express covenant. Otherwise they may find that as a matter of law what the one intended to sell and the other to buy does not actually pass. Our duty is to look at this covenant and see what it says. The business is the business which the respondent carried on as recited in the indenture. [His Lordship read the recital and assignment contained in the indenture, and continued:] There undoubtedly is a sale of the practice then carried on by the respondent at this particular house in the Brixton-road. I do not suppose that either party would suggest for a moment that it was not the intention on both sides that the respondent should sell, and the appellant should buy, the connection which the respondent had formed during the time that he had resided and carried on business as a general practitioner at No. 337, Brixton-road, and I assume that both parties intended to give effect to that sale. Then I turn to the covenant. [His Lordship read it, and continued:] What is the meaning of those words, not to "set up in practice"? I do not think that they mean the same thing as not to "practise" simply. I think if the words had been not to "practise" it would have been very difficult, if not impossible, for the respondent to justify attending a single patient for remuneration within the limits named. I think that the parties had this intent in their minds, and I am partly confirmed in that conclusion by the evidence. The defendant did not covenant not to "practise," but covenanted not to "set up in practice." In my judgment they are very different things, and a man may well commit a breach of a covenant not to practise by an act which would not constitute a breach of a covenant not to set up in practice; and I believe that distinction was present to the minds of the parties. Then, on the evidence before us, has there been a breach of this covenant? In my opinion there has been no breach. It is plain on the respondent's evidence that in the case of the two patients whom he did attend he went at their own invitation because he had been their medical adviser previously, and under these circumstances, though he did practise, he did not set up in practice within the prescribed limits. I invited counsel on behalf of the respondent to do something, which I still hope the respondent will be willing to do—viz., to give an assurance that it was not his intention to carry on a practice by any acts of his own within this district. I cannot doubt that if the respondent were to drive about daily in this district so as to fall in with those who are well acquainted with him the result may be that he would speedily get back the whole of his former patients by informing them of the fact that he was living only just over two miles from No. 337, Brixton-road. It seems to me that if he acted in this way or in a similar way, though falling short of actual solicitation, he would be guilty of a breach of this covenant even if he did not reside or keep a place of business within the district. It seems to me that that conclusion is entirely consistent with the natural grammatical meaning of these words. Counsel for the respondent, who argued for a more restricted meaning of the covenant, never succeeded in getting through with a translation of the covenant without using the word "set up" as a transitive verb with the house as its object. Here it is clear that the word is not transitive, but is used in the middle sense. It is the speaker himself who is setting himself up, and, in my judgment, he does it if he goes and habitually practises in the district, quite irrespectively of whether he has a house or not. Therefore, though I think that the respondent is entitled on the evidence before us to say that there is no case at present for an injunction, so far as I am concerned, it is only on the basis that his real intention is not to set up practice in this district, but only to attend an old patient here and there, from doing which he is not, in my opinion, debarred by his covenant.

[CT. OF APP.]

Re OLDFIELD; OLDFIELD v. OLDFIELD.

[CT. OF APP.]

STIRLING, L.J.—The plaintiff in this action, the purchaser of a medical practice, seeks for an injunction to restrain the defendant, the vendor, from committing a breach of a covenant contained in the conveyance. The covenant is this: [His Lordship read it, and continued.] I desire to confine myself to the facts in evidence, and what the defendant has done is to visit two or three old patients who invited him to attend them professionally without any solicitation on the part of the defendant. Does that in itself constitute a breach of this covenant? I think not. I think that a man who visits two or three old patients is not setting up in practice within the proscribed area. But a passage in the defendant's affidavit was referred to in which the defendant states his version of what took place when the covenant was under discussion, and, according to his affidavit, he pointed out that he would be entitled to attend the plaintiff's next-door neighbour, and it is said that that is a claim on the part of the defendant to attend every person who invites him to do so, and it is said that that is evidence that the defendant threatens and intends to visit in the way which is pointed out, and that therefore an injunction ought to be granted. I think not. I think we must look at this as a matter of common sense. I think I am at liberty to take this into consideration, that people who live two miles from a doctor do not send for him except under special circumstances. But I do not say that if the defendant received from a large number of persons resident within the area invitations to visit them professionally, he might not by responding to them commit a breach of this covenant. I think, therefore, that it has not been established that the defendant has been guilty of a breach of this contract, or that he threatens or intends to do so, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Re OLDFIELD; OLDFIELD v. OLDFIELD. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Will—Precatory trust—Absolute gift followed by expression of desire.

The decisions of the Court of Appeal in Re Diggles (59 L. T. Rep. 884; 39 Ch. Div. 253), Re Hamilton (72 L. T. Rep. 748; (1895) 2 Ch. 370), and Re Williams (76 L. T. Rep. 600); (1897) 2 Ch. 12) are not inconsistent with the rule laid down by Lord Alvanley in Malim v. Keighley (2 Ves. 333, 335) as to what creates a trust in the case of a gift, which was approved of by the House of Lords in Knight v. Boughton (11 Cl. & F. 513, 548).

Testatrix devised and bequeathed all her real and personal property equally amongst her two daughters as tenants in common for their own absolute use and benefit, and appointed them her executrices. She then continued: "My desire is that each of my said two daughters shall during the lifetime of my son pay to him one-third of the respective incomes of my said two daughters accruing from the moneys and investments under this my will."

Held, that the expression of the testatrix's desire was not sufficient to cut down the former absolute gift, and no trust was created in favour of the son.

Decision of Kekewich, J. affirmed.

MARY OLDFIELD, of Crawford, Burley-in-Wharfedale, in the county of York, widow, by her will provided as follows:

I hereby revoke all testamentary instruments heretofore made by me. I give, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal property over which I have any power of appointment or otherwise unto and equally amongst my two daughters Kate Oldfield and Sarah Florence Oldfield as tenants in common for their own absolute use and benefit, and I appoint my said two daughters Kate Oldfield and Sarah Florence Oldfield to be the executrices of this my will. My desire is that each of my said two daughters shall during the lifetime of my son pay to him one-third of the respective incomes of my said two daughters accruing from the moneys and investments under this my will.

The testatrix died in 1903, leaving personal estate only.

After her death a summons was taken out by J. R. Oldfield, the son mentioned in the will, to have it decided whether the will created an effectual trust in favour of the plaintiff during his life of one third share in the income of the estate of the testatrix.

The summons was heard by Kekewich, J., who held there was no trust in favour of the plaintiff, and he appealed.

(a) Reported by W. C. Biss, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Levett, K.C. and Gatey for the appellant.—On the words of this will there is a presumption of a trust, and the respondents must show no trust was created. The last clause of the will is sufficient by itself to create a trust. It comes within the rule stated by Lord Alvanley, M.R. in Malim v. Keighley (2 Ves. 333; affirmed on appeal, Ib. 529a), which was approved of by the House of Lords in Knight v. Boughton (11 Cl. & F. 513, 548). The old decisions were not followed by the Court of Appeal in Re Hamilton (72 L. T. Rep. 748; (1895) 2 Ch. 370), Re Williams (76 L. T. Rep. 600; (1897) 2 Ch. 12), and Re Diggles (59 L. T. Rep. 884; 39 Ch. Div. 253); and in Re Hamilton (ubi sup.) Lindley, L.J. purports to overrule Malim v. Keighley (ubi sup.), the case of Knight v. Boughton (ubi sup.) in the House of Lords, in which it is approved, not having been cited to him. They also referred to Ingen, K.C. and E. Ford for the respondents.—There is a complete will here, including the appointment of executrices, by which the property is given absolutely to the respondents. Then follows the expression of a desire that they will pay a part of their respective incomes, not out of the income from the testatrix's estate, to the appellant. Where there is an absolute gift it requires a very strong evidence of intention to create any trust:

Re Diggles (ubi sup.);

Re Williams (ubi sup.).

Levett, K.C. in reply.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion this appeal must be dismissed. I will say a word or two in the first place upon the case in the House of Lords of Knight v. Boughton (ubi sup.), to which our attention was called. It was argued by counsel for the appellant that, though it is quite true to say that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Hamilton (ubi sup.), and also in Re Williams (ubi sup.), and also in Re Diggles (ubi sup.), departed from the old decisions in which it was held that a catalogue of words in a will, one of which was "desire," without more, raised a trust unless there was something in the will expressly to negative that construction, yet the Court of Appeal in all those cases was mistaken; that it had not been called to their attention that the case of Malim v. Keighley (ubi sup.), in which Lord Alvanley, M.R. laid down the rule that "wherever any person gives property and points out the object, the property, and the way in which it shall go, that does create a trust unless he shows clearly that his desire expressed is to be controlled by the party and that he shall have an option to defeat it," was affirmed expressly by the House of Lords in Knight v. Boughton (ubi sup.). Now, I may point out that Malim v. Keighley was brought to the notice of Lindley, L.J. in Re Hamilton (ubi sup.), and that he purported to overrule it.

Counsel says he would not have done so if he had been aware that Malim v. Keighley had been affirmed by the House of Lords in Knight v. Boughton (ubi sup.). No doubt the House of Lords affirmed the passage I have just quoted from the judgment in Malim v. Keighley, and which is also quoted in Re Hamilton (ubi sup.), but it all depends on how you read the words of Lord Alvanley. If you read those words as meaning "the way in which the property shall go" (in the imperative), there is nothing, to my mind, in any of those cases to show that that would be contrary to what was affirmed by the House of Lords in Knight v. Boughton (ubi sup.). Having said that, I will now deal with the case before us. [His Lordship then read the first clause in the will, comprising the gift to the daughters absolutely, and continued:] Thus far we have very strong words to show the intention of the testatrix was that these two ladies should not only have the legal estate in everything she had to leave, but should have that legal estate for their own absolute use and benefit. That being so, if I found that any express trust had been intended to be created controlling the use of the property by these two daughters, I should have expected to find clear and very strong words to that effect. What are the words which are said to create a trust? They are these: "My desire is that each of my said two daughters shall during the lifetime of my son pay to him one-third of the respective incomes of my said two daughters accruing from the moneys and investments under this my will." Now, in the first place, I would point out that the income with regard to which the testatrix has expressed her "desire" does not extend to real property; and, in the next place, it does not extend to the estate of the testatrix—to that which she was leaving—but to the income which would come to the daughters respectively "from moneys and investments under this my will." Those "investments" cannot, in my opinion, mean the investments belonging to the testatrix up to the time of her death in the sense of money being property with regard to which a trust was to be raised before anything came to the daughters. This is a desire expressed with regard to the income of the share which each daughter was to take absolutely under the first clause of the will. Under these circumstances, one has to ask oneself this: Would anyone desiring to create a trust have created it by the use of such language as is used by this testatrix? Is it not more probable that, if she had intended to create such a trust, she would have left her property to the daughters, charging one-third of the income of the property with a trust in favour of the son, and then have given the residue of the income or of the property, subject to the life interest to the son, to the daughters? In my judgment there is nothing in this expression of desire sufficient to cut down the absolute gift for the use and benefit of the daughters which is comprised in the first part of the will. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the decision of the learned judge should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the law, so far as it is necessary for the decision in this case, there does not seem to be much difficulty. It is sufficient to refer to the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Re

Williams (ubi sup.), and I do so because there was a difference of opinion among the learned judges in that case in the application of the law; but, looking at the judgments of Lindley and Rigby, L.J., although they differed in opinion upon the construction of the will before them, what they lay down as being the law is substantially the same. Lindley, L.J. says this (76 L. T. Rep. 602; (1897) 2 Ch. 18): "There can be no doubt that equitable obligations, whether trusts or conditions, can be imposed by any language which is clear enough to show an intention to impose an obligation, and is definite enough to enable the court to ascertain what the precise obligation is and in whose favour it is to be performed. There is also abundant authority for saying that, if property is left to a person in confidence that he will dispose of it in a particular way as to which there is no ambiguity, such words are amply sufficient to impose an obligation." Then, after referring to the cases, he proceeds: "But still in each case the whole will must be looked at; and unless it appears from the whole will that an obligation was intended to be imposed, no obligation will be held to exist; yet, moreover, in some of the older cases obligations were inferred from language which in modern times would be thought insufficient to justify such an inference." Then, when I turn to what Rigby, L.J. says, I find that he cites (76 L. T. Rep. 605; (1897) 2 Ch. 29) the passage which was quoted to us from the judgment of Lord Langdale in Knight v. Knight (3 Beav. 172) in which the general rule is stated to be that a trust is created, first, if the words are, on the whole, to be considered as imperative; secondly, if the subject of the recommendation or wish is certain; and, thirdly, if the objects or persons intended to have the benefit of the recommendation or wish are also certain; and an instance is given of the application of the rule. Upon that passage from Lord Langdale's judgment Rigby, L.J. comments thus: "In the instance so given by Lord Langdale it is to be assumed that there is nothing in the will to prevent the words of request from being imperative. Very slight indications throwing doubt upon this might be sufficient to lead to a contrary construction." Now, those two propositions, one stated by Lindley, L.J. and the other by Rigby, L.J., seem to coincide as regards the law applicable to the present case; and all we have to consider is whether the expression "I desire" is such as to impose an obligation on the defendants in this case. The testatrix commenced her will in these words: [His Lordship then read the first clause of the will, and continued:] Under those words the two daughters take as tenants in common and not, as trustees usually do, as joint tenants; they take for their own absolute use and benefit—that is, with full power to deal with the property as they may think fit. Then, after appointing them executrices, the testatrix goes on thus: [His Lordship then read the clause commencing "my desire," and continued:] Now, does that create a trust? If so, it is entirely inconsistent with the previous clause by which this property is given to the two ladies for their own absolute use and benefit. If a trust is created, what is it? It does not impose a joint obligation upon these two ladies, as would be the case if they were trustees, but each daughter is to pay the son out of her own income, so that, if it were a trust, it would be a separate obligation upon each daughter to take her own income and pay out of it one-third to the son during his life. I cannot think that this is what was meant. Looking at the whole will, I am of opinion that it was only intended to express a wish; and that it was intended each daughter should have the use and enjoyment of her own income, and that the expression of the wish should not impose an obligation.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

Lunacy—Practice—Vesting order—Direction to transfer stock—Title of proceedings—Lunacy Act 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 116, sub-s. 1 (d), ss. 133, 333—Rules in Lunacy 1892, rr. 9, 57, 58, schedule, form 1.

An order in Lunacy containing a direction made under sect. 133 of the Lunacy Act 1890 should be intitled "In the matter of the Lunacy Acts 1890 and 1891," as well as in the matter of the particular lunacy. But this is not to apply to a case under sect. 116, sub-sect. 1 (d), where the title contains a reference to the statutes 53 Vict. c. 5 and 54 & 55 Vict. c. 65.

An order was made by a master in Lunacy directing (inter alia) that certain stock which was standing in the name of Peregrine Purvis, a person of unsound mind, in the books of the Bank of England, should be transferred into court.

The order was intitled "In the matter of Peregrine Purvis, a person of unsound mind"; but the title did not contain any reference to the Lunacy Acts.

The bank objected to acting on the order, upon the ground that they would not be protected under sect. 333 of the Lunacy Act 1890, unless the order contained a reference to the statute.

An application was accordingly made to compel the bank to act upon the order, which application came on to be heard before Williams, L.J., sitting in chambers as judge in Lunacy.

Buckmaster, K.C. and Walters for the applicants.

Latham, K.C. and Howard Wright for the respondents, the bank.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. (without deciding any question as to the rights of the parties) said that it would be expedient that in future an order in Lunacy, containing a direction made under the authority of sect. 133 of the Lunacy Act 1890, should be intitled in the matter of the Lunacy Acts 1890 and 1891, as well as in the matter of the particular lunacy; but that this was not to apply to a case under sect. 116, sub-sect. 1 (d), of a person who, through mental infirmity arising

KEITH v. R. GANCIA AND CO. LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Landlord and tenant—Mortgage—Lease by mortgagor after mortgage—Foreclosure—Payment of rent to mortgagee—Licence to tenant to grant underlease—Sale by mortgagee subject to tenancy—Estoppel in pais.

A lessee mortgaged leaseholds by subdemise in 1881, and in 1892 granted an underlease to a third party. In 1894 the mortgagee foreclosed, and the underlessee paid rent to him. In 1899 the mortgagee died, and his executors granted to the underlessee licence to grant a sublease of part of the premises, which he accordingly did. In 1900 they sold the premises, the assignment being made subject to the underlease.

Held, that the mortgagee's executors having led to the belief that the reversion expectant upon the determination of the underlease was vested in them were estopped from averring the contrary; and that therefore the purchaser was not entitled to say that the underlease was not binding upon him.

Decision of Joyce, J. affirmed.

By a lease dated the 11th Dec. 1880 certain vaults situated under the Princess' Theatre, Oxford-street, and the offices belonging thereto, were (with other hereditaments) demised to Walter Gooch, as to part thereof for a term of sixty and a quarter years from the 6th April 1880, as to another part thereof for the term of sixty years from the 9th July 1880, and as to the residue thereof for the term of fifty-nine and a quarter years from the 6th April 1881, at the rent therein mentioned.

By a deed dated the 9th March 1881 Walter Gooch demised the premises comprised in the lease of the 11th Dec. 1880, to W. T. Neve for the residue of the several terms of years granted thereby, except the last three days of each term, by way of mortgage for securing payment of 20,000*l.*, with interest thereon.

The deed gave the mortgagee a power of sale, and it was provided that in the event of a sale the mortgagor would stand possessed of the last three days of the terms respectively in trust for the purchaser.

The premises comprised in the lease became before the 24th March 1892 vested in Harriet Gooch for the residue of the several terms of years, but subject to the mortgage to Neve.

By an underlease dated the 24th March 1892 Harriet Gooch purported to demise the vaults and offices (part of the premises comprised in the lease of the 11th Dec. 1880) to the defendant company (R. Gancia and Co. Limited), from the 25th March

This deed provided that if the defendant company should be wound-up under the provisions of the Companies Acts the lessor might re-enter upon the demised premises, and thereupon the term thereby granted should absolutely determine.

The defendant company entered into possession of the premises thus demised to them.

On the 21st March 1895, in an action by Neve against Harriet Gooch in the Chancery Division, an order was made that she should thenceforth stand absolutely foreclosed from all right and equity of redemption of and in the premises comprised in the mortgage of the 9th March 1881.

From the date of that order until the death of Neve the defendant company paid to him the rent of 140*l.* reserved by the lease of the 24th March 1892.

Neve died on the 8th March 1899.

On the 9th Aug. 1900 Neve's executors assigned to the plaintiff, B. F. Keith, the premises comprised in the lease of the 11th Dec. 1880 for the residue then unexpired of the several terms of years thereby granted (except the last three days of each of the terms), and for all such estates and interests in the nominal reversions expectant on the determination of the same terms respectively as the executors had power to assign; and the assignment was expressed to be made subject (as to such parts of the premises as were subject thereto) to, but with the benefit of, the deed of the 24th March 1892.

Subsequently to the 9th Aug. 1900 the defendant company paid the rent of 140*l.* to the plaintiff.

On the 8th Oct. 1902 an order was made by the High Court for the winding-up of the defendant company under the Companies Acts.

On the 27th Nov. 1899 the defendant company had executed a sublease of part of the premises comprised in the underlease of the 24th March 1892 to the defendant Sinclair from the 25th Dec. 1899 for a term of thirteen years and three months less ten days then next ensuing at the rent of 240*l.*

This sublease was made in pursuance of a licence dated the 13th Oct. 1899, by which the executors of Neve, describing themselves as "the persons in whom the reversion expectant on the determination of the term granted by the lease of the 24th March 1892 is now vested," granted a licence to the defendant company to demise to the defendant Sinclair the vaults, &c., for the residue of the term of twenty-one years thereby granted, less the last ten days thereof.

The defendant Sinclair was in possession under this sublease.

The London and Westminster Bank were, as equitable mortgagees of the defendant company, in possession of the remainder of the premises comprised in the underlease of the 24th March 1892.

This action was brought by the plaintiff claiming possession of the vaults and premises comprised in the underlease of the 24th March 1892, on the ground that, by reason of the winding-up order, a right had accrued to him to re-enter on the vaults and premises and to determine the tenancy of the defendant company, and that he had served a notice upon them demanding possession accordingly.

The defendant Sinclair counter-claimed under the provisions of the Conveyancing Act and Law of Property Act 1881 relief from the forfeiture, and asked for an order that the vaults, &c., comprised in the sublease of the 27th Nov. 1899 should vest in him for the residue of the term thereby granted and upon the conditions thereof.

The other defendants also took out a summons asking for relief against the forfeiture; and on the 1st April 1903 this summons came on for hearing, with the trial of the action and counterclaim, before Joyce, J., when the following judgment was delivered:—

JOYCE, J.—The first, and practically, I think, the only question that really arises in this case, is as to the effect of what took place between the parties in Oct. and Nov. 1899. Now at that time Neve had foreclosed, and he was dead, and the claim under the foreclosure was vested in his executors, Neve and Buttanshaw. They were receiving from R. Gancia and Co. Limited the same rent as was reserved by the document which has been called the "underlease." Suppose at that time that the executors of Neve and R. Gancia and Co. Limited and Sinclair had entered into a tripartite agreement which recited that the executors of Neve were the reversioners of the underlease to R. Gancia and Co. Limited; that they had been asked to conceal under the terms of that underlease to the granting of the sublease by R. Gancia and Co. Limited; and that R. Gancia and Co. Limited had thereby agreed expressly, with such consent, to grant the sublease to Sinclair. If such a document as that had been made and executed by the three parties, to my mind it is absolutely clear that the executors of Neve could not, after that, have turned round and asserted their paramount title as mortgagees or as representing mortgagees, and have asserted or objected that R. Gancia and Co. Limited had no underlease at all. Nor could they have asserted that either as against R. Gancia and Co. Limited or as against Sinclair, who took under the sublease. Now, upon carefully considering what really did happen, and looking at the correspondence and documents, I am of opinion that what happened is really equivalent to such an agreement in fact. And I hold that the executors of Neve, whose testator had foreclosed, were, as reversioners of the underlease to R. Gancia and Co. Limited, in truth and substance parties to the sublease to Sinclair, and fully concurred in it. Now what took place next was the sale and assignment to Keith in Aug. 1900. Upon that sale it appears perfectly clear to me that all the parties had full knowledge—not merely notice but full knowledge—of everything that occurred, and knew exactly how matters stood. When it was completed the counterpart of the underlease appears to have been handed over to the purchaser, Keith. In my opinion the true construction of that assignment, when you come to examine it, is not, as in the case referred to before Cotton, L.J., that the lease, or, rather, that the underlease was actually excepted from the covenant against incumbrances. There was no express covenant, I think, in this case. Probably it was implied. But, in my opinion, it really amounts to an agreement between the vendors and the executors of Neve, who, in my opinion, had undertaken or incurred a responsibility both to R. Gancia and Co. Limited and to Sinclair. It amounted to an agreement between them and the purchaser Keith that that sublease and the underlease should continue to subsist. At all events, if I am wrong in this, it is clear to my mind that Keith, the purchaser at that sale, was not and could not be, as against R. Gancia and Co. Limited or Sinclair, in a better position than the executors of Neve themselves were. The result of all this is to my mind that the present plaintiff cannot successfully contend that as against him the sublease is not subsisting, nor can he contend that as against him the underlease is not subsisting, and that that was the view which Keith, the purchaser, and his advisers took of the matter is plain from their notice to inspect the dilapidations, and from their notice which purported to forfeit the underlease. That really disposes of the action. Perhaps I may say one word with reference to the general law as to leases granted by a mortgagor after the mortgage. I think the result of the cases is that although the mere payment and receipt of rent as between the lessee and the mortgagee may convert the lessee into a tenant from year to year, it does not to my mind follow from that alone that the lessee holds upon the terms of the lease so far as they are applicable to a tenancy from year to year. I think, as stated in Smith's Leading Cases, and in other text-books, in every case it is a matter of evidence or inference (which is the same thing) from what is done. When a new tenancy is thus created I agree that the terms of such new tenancy must be proved by evidence; and the mere fact that the tenant is paying rent to the mortgagee after notice is no evidence that the tenancy is to be on the same terms as those on which the tenant held under the mortgagor. To my mind that is made out distinctly by the judgments of Wills and Blackburn, J.J., in the case of Oakley v. Monck (14 L. T. Rep. 20; L. Rep. 1 Ex. 159). The plaintiff says the result was that there was an agreement, or I think he says that even without an agreement R. Gancia and Co. Limited held upon the terms of the lease as tenant from year to year. Upon those terms, so far as applicable to a tenancy from year to year, I am unable to see anything from which I can infer any such agreement. But I do see my way to infer an agreement, and I think that there was in effect an agreement, that the underlease should continue to subsist and the sublease should continue to subsist. Therefore it appears to me, as I have already said, that the action fails. The order as drawn up declared that the underlease of the 24th March 1892, was binding on the plaintiff, and ordered that the defendants be relieved against the forfeiture of that underlease occasioned by the winding-up of R. Gancia and Co. Limited.

From that decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Levett, K.C. and E. R. Simpson for the appellant.—The mortgage to Neve having been executed on the 9th March 1881 before the date of the coming into operation of sect. 18 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act 1881—whereby a mortgagor in possession is authorised, as against every incumbrancer, to make from time to time any such lease of the mortgaged property as is described in that section—the underlease of the 24th March 1892, which was granted to R. Gancia and Co.

KEITH v. R. GANCIA AND CO. LIMITED.

[CT. OF APP.]

Limited by the representative of the mortgagor without the consent of the mortgagee, was invalid and not binding upon the mortgagee. The effect of the payment of rent by R. Gancia and Co. Limited to the mortgagee and his acceptance thereof was only to create a tenancy from year to year upon the terms of the underlease and so far as they were consistent with a yearly tenancy:

Dougal v. McCarthy, 58 L. T. Rep. 699; (1893) 1 Q. B. 736;

Doe d. Hughes v. Bucknill, 12 C. & P. 566.

It is a matter of evidence, and the court has to decide upon the evidence, whether there was an intention that the yearly tenancy should continue upon the terms of the former demise. [ROMER, L.J.—There are some observations of Tindal, C.J. in Brown v. Storey (1 Man. & Gr. 117, at p. 126) that may assist you, as they appear to be distinctly in your favour.] The plaintiff was therefore enabled to determine the tenancy upon the making of the winding-up order against R. Gancia and Co. Limited. The licence to sublet given to R. Gancia and Co. Limited could not operate as a new lease or an agreement by the mortgagee to grant a lease to R. Gancia and Co. Limited, for both a lease and an agreement to grant a lease must be in writing:

Statute of Frauds, s. 1:

Real Property Act 1845, s. 7:

Shelford's Real Property Statutes, 9th edit, p. 515.

The plaintiff has the legal estate. There being some estate in the defendant Sinclair, the court cannot enlarge that estate by means of estoppel. The doctrine of estoppel by consent does not apply to such a case as the present. The defendant Sinclair had the same means of knowledge as the plaintiff had, and there was not sufficient to create estoppel by conduct. It was never intended that a lease should be allowed to be created by mere estoppel:

Burton's Compendium, p. 850;

Co. Litt., p. 45b;

Pickard v. Sears, 6 Adol. & Ell. 469;

Willmott v. Barker, 43 L. T. Rep. 95, 15 Ch. Div. 96, at p. 105.

Hughes, K.C. and F. L. Wright for the respondents, the defendant company and the bank.—We submit that the doctrine of estoppel applies to the present case; and that the executors of the mortgagee by their conduct, and in particular by the terms of the licence to subdemise given by them to R. Gancia and Co. Limited, are estopped from denying the validity of the underlease to R. Gancia and Co. Limited. We rely mainly upon the licence, for we submit that that constitutes an estoppel in pais. The authorities which support the proposition that we are now presenting to the court are

Heath v. Pugh, 44 L. T. Rep. 327; 6 Q. B. Div. 345; on appeal, 46 L. T. Rep. 321; 7 App. Cas. 235;

Cairncross v. Lorimer, 3 Macq. 857;

Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Ex. 654;

Pickard v. Sears (ubi sup.).

[VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Is not an estoppel in pais limited to the extent upon which it has been acted?] The cases which we have cited show that it is not so limited. A person is estopped from denying representation when that representation has been acted upon. Moreover, by virtue of the order for foreclosure absolute, the mortgagee became bound by the estoppel which bound the mortgagor. That, we say, has the effect of the foreclosure decree. Where a lease has been granted by a mortgagor there is no difficulty in the mortgagee affirming the lease, with the concurrence of the lessee:

Corbett v. Plowden, 50 L. T. Rep. 740; 25 Ch. Div. 678.

We submit, therefore, that the executors of the mortgagee were able, if they chose, to affirm the underlease granted by the mortgagor's representative to R. Gancia and Co. Limited, and that they have in fact done so in the present case. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Woodfall's Law of Landlord and Tenant, 11th edit., 1877, p. 204; 13th edit., 1886, p. 233.] These defendants did not set up a new lease or an agreement to grant a new lease. There was only a ratification by the mortgagee of an act done on his behalf by his agent, the mortgagor's representative. They referred also to Turn v. Turner, 59 L. T. Rep. 742; 39 Ch. Div. 456.

Younger, K.C. (with him Edward Ford) for the respondent Sinclair.—The absence of any direct authority upon the present point is strongly in favour of the view that there is no distinction between a lease granted by a mortgagor by way of subdemise and a lease granted by way of assignment. It merely operates by way of estoppel. It is a lease by estoppel. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Fox on Landlord and Tenant, 3rd edit., ch. 6, citing Cuthbertson v. Irving, 4 H. & N. 742.]

Levett, K.C., in reply, referred to Ashburner's Law of Mortgage, p. 241.

[ROMER, L.J.—If a person conveys simply there is no estoppel. But if he recites that he is seised in fee and purports to convey in fee, he is estopped from denying that he is not so seised.]

Cur. adv. vult.

March 7.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—[His Lordship stated the facts of the case substantially as above set forth, and continued:] Now Joyce, J., in dealing with the action, puts it in this way. He says, suppose that in Nov. 1899 (that is to say, before the assignment to the plaintiff) the executors of Neve and R. Gancia and Co. Limited and Sinclair had entered into a tripartite agreement which recited that the executors of Neve were the reversioners of the underlease to R. Gancia and Co. Limited, and that they had been asked to consent under the terms of that underlease to the granting of the sublease by R. Gancia and Co. Limited, and R. Gancia and Co. Limited had thereby agreed expressly to grant the sublease to Sinclair. He goes on to say that if such document as that had been made and executed by the three parties, to his mind it is absolutely clear that the executors of Neve could not after that have turned round and asserted their paramount title as mortgagees, or as representing mortgagees, and have asserted or objected that R. Gancia and Co. Limited had no underlease at all. Nor could they, he adds, have asserted that either as against R. Gancia and Co. Limited or as against Sinclair. The learned judge, having said this, goes on to say that in his opinion what happened is really equivalent to such an agreement in fact, and he held that the executors of Neve, whose testator had foreclosed, were, as reversioners of that underlease, in truth and in substance parties to the sublease to Sinclair and fully concurred in it. I am not quite sure what this means. In the first place, I assume that in the supposed tripartite agreement the learned judge means that R. Gancia and Co. Limited had agreed to grant a sublease, and that the executors had agreed that R. Gancia and Co. Limited should do so, and that he does not mean by the supposed agreement that the executors agreed themselves to grant a lease to Sinclair. If I am right, the supposed agreement would have been carried out, so far as the grant of the lease by R. Gancia and Co. Limited to Sinclair is concerned; and the only agreement which it could have been said that the executors had broken would have been an implied agreement that they would not, in contravention of the recitals, deny that they were reversioners of the underlease to R. Gancia and Co. Limited, and invalidate the consent which they purported to give, as reversioners of the underlease to R. Gancia and Co. Limited, to their sublease by the assertion of a paramount title inconsistent with the subsistence of the sublease. But this view of the tripartite agreement, even if it can be supported, is hardly consistent with the result indicated by Joyce, J. as following on the assumption that what happened was equivalent to such an agreement in fact, because he says: "I hold that the executors of Neve, whose testator had foreclosed, were, as reversioners of the underlease to R. Gancia and Co. Limited, in truth and in substance parties to the sublease to Sinclair, and fully concurred in it." Such a result would not follow as the consequence of a breach of an implied covenant not to invalidate the sublease to be granted by R. Gancia and Co. Limited to Sinclair. Such an implied covenant would not make the executors parties to the sublease or make them concur in it, in the ordinary sense of that word. I am not quite sure that the learned judge, in the passages which I have quoted, has not somewhat confused the agreement which he suggests with the estoppels arising on it, which I will consider presently. But it is sufficient to say at present that no estoppel preventing the executors from denying that they were the reversioners of the underlease to R. Gancia and Co. Limited could operate as a grant by them of a lease to Sinclair on the terms of the sublease granted by R. Gancia and Co. Limited to Sinclair. There is the difficulty also that the sublease, whoever grants it, requires by the Real Property Act 1845, and that any agreement relating to land has, by the Statute of Frauds, to be in writing; and it is not easy to extract from the documents any implied agreement which would support the learned judge's view. Moreover, I am not satisfied that any agreement can be suggested, as having been entered into without writing, which could be supported by part performance and which would afford a defence in this action. I propose now to deal with the question whether estoppel will enable the defendants to successfully defend this action. If the conduct of the plaintiff enables the defendant to do so, I do not trouble myself about the exact form of the pleadings. It is plain that all parties came into court prepared to try the question of what is the effect of the plaintiff's assuming the character of reversioner and inducing the defendants to alter their position. That being so, all necessary amendments must be treated as made. That there is an estoppel preventing Neve's executors, Keith's predecessors in title, and therefore Keith, from averring as against R. Gancia and Co. Limited, or Sinclair that he really was not such reversioner I do not doubt, for it seems to me plain that the executors, by their words and conduct, wilfully caused both R. Gancia and Co. Limited and Sinclair to believe in the existence of a state of things, and induced them to act on that belief, so as to alter their own previous position; and it seems to me that Keith, who claims through the executors, is concluded from averring against either R. Gancia and Co. Limited or Sinclair a different state of things as existing at the same time. Now it is true that, where one has an estoppel in pais of this sort, the estoppel cannot go further than to prevent the party estopped from putting the party who has acted on his representation in a worse position than he would have been if that representation had been true. Then what would have been the position of Sinclair if Neve's executors had really had vested in them the reversion expectant upon the determination of Mrs. Gooch's lease to R. Gancia and Co. Limited. (And observe this is quite a possible state of things, because there is no reason why they, being the assignees by way of subdemise of Mrs. Gooch's lease of the 11th Dec. 1880 from Bailey, should not have taken an assignment from her of the reversion expectant upon the determination of the underlease granted by her to R. Gancia and Co. Limited.) I take it that Neve's executors, as the assignees of Mrs. Gooch, would no more have been entitled, as between R. Gancia and Co. Limited and themselves, to deny Mrs. Gooch's title than Mrs. Gooch herself would have been. The result of this is that the plaintiff's action fails. He is not entitled to recover possession of the premises, because he is estopped from denying that he is reversioner in respect of the lease granted by Mrs. Gooch to R. Gancia and Co. Limited, and not the less so because at the time he represented himself as such he was as mortgagee entitled to say that the lease by Mrs. Gooch to R. Gancia and Co. Limited, did not bind him. I think that this estoppel against the plaintiff arises equally as between himself and Sinclair and as between himself and R. Gancia and Co. Limited. Both Sinclair and R. Gancia and Co. Limited altered their positions by reason of the assertion by Neve's executors that the reversion attendant upon the determination of the underlease to R. Gancia and Co. Limited was vested in them. By reason of this assertion R. Gancia and Co. Limited granted and Sinclair accepted the sublease. This did not make either R. Gancia and Co. Limited or Sinclair the tenant of Neve's executors. The estoppel simply prevents Neve's executors, or their successor, the plaintiff, from denying that Mrs. Gooch's reversion was vested in them as alleged by them, or from setting up an overriding title inconsistent with the licence by them as reversioners authorising the sublease to Sinclair. Moreover, the conduct both of Neve's executors and of the plaintiff since the granting of the sublease of 1899 is only consistent with a continued assertion by them respectively of their position as reversioners and the validity of the sublease. I refer to the assignment to Keith being expressly subject to the sublease of 1892, and to the plaintiff's notice to R. Gancia and Co. Limited to repair. I do not think that it makes the slightest difference that, on the admitted facts, and in particular the payment of the rent reserved under the underlease of 1892 to Neve's executors and to Keith, a tenancy from year to year under Neve's executors or Keith would ordinarily be inferred. This would be only part of the truth which the plaintiff would be estopped from denying. There is no evidence whatever that R. Gancia and Co. Limited was aware of the true position of affairs. For the reasons which I have given I think that the judgment of Joyce, J. ought to be supported, and this appeal dismissed with costs. I should wish to add that I entirely agree with the judgment so far as it relates to the relief against forfeiture. And with regard to the counter-claim by Sinclair for a vesting order, which Joyce, J. had ordered to stand over, I see at present no reason why such order should not be made under sect. 4 of the Act of 1892.

Re LECONFIELD; WYNDHAM v. LECONFIELD. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Revenue—Estate duty—Succession duty—Will charging residue with duties payable on testator's death on property of which he was tenant for life—Succession duty on proceeds of sale of timber cut by succeeding tenant for life—Heirlooms of national interest—Finance Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28), s. 20—Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), s. 23.

By his will, dated in 1900, a testator, who died in 1901, directed the trustees to pay out of the residuary proceeds of his estate (1) so much of the estate duty and other death duties which under the Finance Act 1894, or any amending statute, should become payable upon or by reason of his death in respect of all the estates and property of which he should immediately before his death be tenant for life under a certain will or resettlement as the capital moneys and investments subject thereto should be insufficient to pay; and (2) all such succession duty as should become payable upon his death in respect of the same estates and property.

Held, that, as to the duty in respect of the sale of certain timber, the provision of the will was applicable to duty payable in respect of a succession on the death of the testator, which duty was payable out of his residuary estate.

Held, also, that, as to certain heirlooms of national interest, the duty did not become payable upon the death of the testator, and would not until the happening of the event mentioned in sect. 20 of the Finance Act 1896.

Decision of Joyce, J. (89 L. T. Rep. 434) reversed.

By his will, dated the 10th Sept. 1834, George O'Brien, last Earl of Egremont, devised freehold and copyhold estates of great extent and value in the counties of Cumberland, York, Sussex, and Southampton, to the use of George, afterwards created Baron Leconfield, during his life, with remainder to the use of the son of the latter, Henry, afterwards second Baron Leconfield, during his life, with remainder to the first and other sons of the second baron successively in tail male; and he bequeathed certain leaseholds on trust that the rents and profits should be received by the persons entitled to receive the rents and profits of the estates.

The testator also bequeathed certain chattels of great value, known as the Petworth House heirlooms, upon trust that they should devolve as heirlooms with the estates.

The testator died on the 14th Nov. 1837.

George, first Baron Leconfield, died on the 18th March 1869.

The Hon. George O'Brien Wyndham, eldest son of Henry, second Baron Leconfield, and first tenant in tail under the will, died in the lifetime of his father on the 13th Jan. 1895, a bachelor and intestate, having attained the age of twenty-one years, but not having barred his estate tail.

His father, Henry Baron Leconfield, took out letters of administration to his estate on the 23rd March 1895, and thus became absolutely entitled to the heirlooms.

On the 6th Dec. 1897 Henry Baron Leconfield and his eldest surviving son, the Hon. Charles Henry Wyndham, executed a disentailing assurance of the settled estates, and on the 7th Dec. they executed a resettlement of them, under which (subject to a power of appointing uses and to the payment of a rentcharge to the Hon. C. H. Wyndham) they were limited to the use of Henry Baron Leconfield for life in restoration of his life estate under Lord Egremont's will, with remainder to the use of the Hon. C. H. Wyndham for life without impeachment of waste, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with divers remainders over.

The moneys and investments subject to the settlement had been disentailed by another assurance of the 6th Dec. 1887, and by the resettlement were settled on the trusts of capital moneys arising under the Settled Land Acts to be applied primarily in the purchase of lands to be settled.

Certain of the heirlooms were also included in the resettlement, and were settled to devolve as heirlooms with the settled estates, and the remainder of the heirlooms were settled in the same way by another settlement dated the 15th June 1898, with a proviso in both cases that they should not vest absolutely in any tenant in tail unless he should attain the age of twenty-one years.

By his will, dated the 19th April 1900, Henry Baron Leconfield gave certain settled legacies, and declared his intention and will to be that all settlement estate duty payable on his death under or by virtue of the Finance Act 1894, or any Act of Parliament amending, extending, or modifying it, by reason of the settlement thereinbefore made of such settled legacies, as well as all other estate duty payable on his death under or by virtue of any such Act in respect of his estate, should be borne by his general estate in exoneration of any legatee or beneficiary under any of the preceding gifts or dispositions.

The testator devised and bequeathed all his residuary real and personal estate to the general trustees of his will on trust for sale and conversion, and he directed them to pay out of the moneys arising therefrom and the moneys of which he should be possessed at his decease his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, and to pay and provide for legacies to a daughter and younger sons, and to stand possessed of the residue of the same moneys (thereinafter referred to as "the said residuary proceeds") upon the trusts and for the purposes thereafter declared and expressed concerning the same.

The will (after certain provisions as to the appropriation of funds to meet the legacies) then proceeded as follows:

And I declare that my general trustees or trustee shall stand possessed of the said residuary proceeds upon trust with all convenient speed after my death to apply the same, or an adequate part thereof, in payment and satisfaction of (firstly) so much of the estate duty and other death duties (if any) including any interest which, under or by virtue of the Finance Act 1894, or any statute amending, extending, or modifying the same, shall become payable upon or by reason of my death in respect of all the estates and property (including as well real estate as leaseholds, moneys, funds, stocks, shares, and securities) of which I shall immediately before my death be seized or entitled as tenant for life under or by virtue of or by reference to the will of the late Right Hon. George O'Brien, Earl of Egremont, or the said resettlement [meaning thereby the resettlement of the 7th Dec. 1897] as the capital moneys, stocks, funds, shares, and securities (if any) which at my death may be subject to such will or resettlement, and as such might, under sect. 9, sub-sect. 7, of the Finance Act 1894, or any such other statute as aforesaid, be expended in paying such estate duty or other death duties shall be insufficient to pay; and (secondly) all such succession duty as shall become payable upon my death in respect of the same estates and property.

The ultimate surplus of the residuary proceeds the testator gave in trust for such of his younger sons as attained the age of twenty-one years in equal shares.

The testator died on the 6th Jan. 1901, leaving him surviving his son the Hon. Charles Henry Wyndham, who succeeded as third Baron Leconfield and tenant for life in possession of the settled estates and property, and four younger sons, of whom two had attained the age of twenty-one years.

His will was proved on the 16th April 1901.

The amount of his residuary estate was very large, and the capital moneys, stocks, funds, shares, and securities subject to the resettlement being insufficient to pay the estate duty on the estates and property of which the testator was immediately before his death tenant for life, a large sum had been applied out of the residuary proceeds in payment of estate duty and succession duty, and a large surplus of the residuary proceeds remained after making these payments.

Questions arose, however, in the administration of the estate with regard to the estate duty on the heirlooms, having regard to sect. 20, sub-sect. 1, of the Finance Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28).

Application was made to the Treasury with regard to the heirlooms, and the greater part of them, amounting to the value of 149,600L, were exempted from duty under the provisions of the sub-section, until they should be sold or should be in the possession of some person competent to dispose of them.

Doubts were entertained whether the general trustees of Henry Baron Leconfield's will were bound to provide out of the residuary proceeds of his estate, for the payment of the estate duty on the exempted heirlooms, if it should become payable; and a further question arose with regard to succession duty.

It appeared that the timber on the settled estate was of great value; a considerable quantity was ripe for cutting at the death of Henry Baron Leconfield, and more had matured since, and the present tenant for life, Charles Henry Baron Leconfield, not being impeachable for waste, had cut, and intended from time to time to cut, portions of the timber.

Under the provisions of sect. 23 of the Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), he, as present tenant for life, was chargeable with succession duty as successor, upon his interest in the net proceeds of sale of the timber, and as he was a stranger in blood to Lord Egremont, from whom his interest was derived, the duty was leviable at the rate of 10 per cent. under sect. 10.

This duty also he claimed that the residuary proceeds ought to bear, and the general trustees of Henry Baron Leconfield's will accordingly took out an originating summons, asking, among other things, for the determination of the question whether, upon the true construction of the will they, as such general trustees, were bound to retain in their hands during the lifetime of Charles Henry Baron Leconfield, or for any and what period, a sufficient part of the testator's residuary estate to meet all or any and what part (a) of the estate duty which would, upon the happening of the first of the events mentioned in sect. 20 of the Finance Act 1896, become, in respect of such of the heirlooms as were exempted from estate duty on the ground of their national or historic interest; and (b) of the succession duty which would, in the event of the timber comprised in the succession being cut, become payable in respect of the successor's interest in the proceeds thereof.

The defendants to the summons were Charles Henry Baron Leconfield, as the present tenant for life; the trustees of the resettlements of 1897 and 1898; and the younger sons of Henry Baron Leconfield, as residuary legatees under his will.

The summons was adjourned into court, and came on to be heard before Joyce, J. on the 6th Nov. 1903, when his Lordship decided (89 L. T. Rep. 434) that the trustees were bound, during the lifetime of Lord Leconfield as the present tenant for life or until further order, to set aside a sufficient sum to pay the estate duty on the heirlooms; but that for the succession duty on the proceeds of sale of the timber they were not bound to make any provision.

From the decision as to the proceeds of sale of the timber Lord Leconfield, and as to the exempted heirlooms the residuary legatees, respectively now appealed.

The appeal by Lord Leconfield was first argued.

Younger, K.C. and MacMullan for the appellant.—This duty is succession duty chargeable on the late Lord Leconfield's death; and the direction contained in the will, as to the payment out of residue of succession duty payable on his death, therefore covers it. The direction in the will ought to be interpreted not as meaning "upon the moment of my death," but "in respect of the succession thereby created." They referred to Hughes, K.C. and the Hon. Frank Russell for the respondents the residuary legatees.—This duty does not become payable on the late Lord Leconfield's death, and may never become payable at all. It is a duty which only becomes chargeable on the successor when the successor cuts the timber in respect of his interest in the sale moneys of the timber.

Austen-Cartmell for the respondents the general trustees of the will.

A. L. Ellis for the respondents the trustees of the resettlements of 1897 and 1898.

The appeal by the residuary trustees was then argued.

Hughes, K.C. and the Hon. Frank Russell, for the appellants, contended that the heirlooms came within the Finance Act 1896, s. 20, and that accordingly no duty was payable thereon.

Younger, K.C. and MacMullan, for the respondent, Lord Leconfield, contra.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I will deal with these two appeals separately, although both appeals really turn on what is one passage, divided into sections, in the will of the late Lord Leconfield. Perhaps I had better read the passage in the will as a whole first. [His Lordship did so, and continued:] Now, the question raised by the first appeal that we have to determine here is this: We have to say whether or not succession duty, payable in respect of succession to land which is covered with timber, is, having regard to the terms of sect. 23 of the Succession Duty Act 1853, a duty which the trustees under this will are directed to pay. Joyce, J., in delivering his judgment, says this: "I am not sure what the testator intended by the words beginning 'secondly' in reference to the particular question that has arisen, or what he would have said if the point had been called to his attention; but upon the whole I think the right way of dealing with this question is to read the words beginning 'secondly' literally; and therefore I think that with respect to timber it is unnecessary to make any provision, and that in my opinion would be a fairer and more convenient result to all parties concerned." Now, in order to understand that judgment one has to turn to the Act which deals with succession duties—that is, the Succession Duty Act 1853. It is best here, I think, first to look at sect. 2 of that Act, and one finds by that section: "Every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, to any other person, in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution, a 'succession'; and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled; and the term 'predecessor' shall denote the settlor, disponent, testator, obligor, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the successor is or shall be derived." One gets there a definition really of what a "succession" is. And then when one turns to sect. 10 one finds that section provides: "There shall be levied and paid to Her Majesty in respect of every such succession as aforesaid"—that really is the succession on death—"according to the value thereof, the following duties"; and then the section sets out the various duties. Then we have to arrive at the duty to be levied on succession, and we see by sect. 2 what the succession is—that is, succession on death. That being so, if one turns to sect. 20 one finds that: "The duty imposed by this Act shall be paid at the time when the successor, or any person in his right or on his behalf, shall become entitled in possession to his succession, or to the receipt of the income and profits thereof." I do not think I need read more of that section; but I wish to point out that what sect. 20 does is—the duty having been created on the succession—to deal with the time when that duty shall be paid, and with the interest really out of which it is to be paid. Then sect. 21 provides that: "The interest of every successor except as hereinafter provided, in real property, shall be considered to be the value of an annuity equal to the annual value of such property, after making such allowances as are hereinafter directed, and payable from the date of his becoming entitled thereto in possession, or to the receipts of the income or profits thereof during the residue of his life, or for any less period during which he shall be entitled thereto; and every such annuity, for the purposes of this Act, shall be valued according to the tables in the schedule annexed to this Act; and the duty chargeable thereon shall be paid by eight equal half-yearly instalments, the first of such instalments to be paid at the expiration of twelve months." Then the section goes on and makes provision that "if the successor shall die before all such instalments shall have become due, then any instalments not due at his decease shall cease to be payable, except in the case of a successor who shall have been competent to dispose by will of a continuing interest in such property." I call attention to sect. 21 in order to show that it really provides for a valuation of the interest, and also provides for the time of payment. One observes that under this section—as indeed I think we may say under all these other sections—that never really is the duty due and payable as a whole immediately on death, but it is nevertheless a duty which is imposed by this Act on succession, and although not immediately due and payable is a duty payable from the time of the death. Then if one turns to sect. 22 one finds that that deals with the rules for valuing houses and land; and sect. 23, which is the immediately material section in this case, provides that "where timber, trees, or wood, not being coppice or underwood, shall be comprised in any succession, the successor shall be chargeable with duty upon his interest in the net moneys, after deducting all necessary outgoings for the year, which shall from time to time be received from any sales of such timber, trees, or wood, and shall account for and pay the same yearly; provided that no money shall be payable on the net moneys received from the sale of timber, trees, or wood in any one year, unless such net moneys shall exceed the sum of 10l.; provided, that if the successor shall be desirous of commuting the duty, and shall deliver to the commissioners an estimate of the net moneys obtainable by him from the sale of such timber, trees, and wood as may, in a prudent course of management of the property, be felled by such successor during his life, the commissioners, if satisfied with such estimate, shall accept the same and assess the duty accordingly. Here again the section to my mind obviously treats succession duty as being a duty which is imposed on the succession on the death. The whole of sect. 23 is merely a provision for valuation and for the time when the duty shall become due and payable. In my judgment the provision at the end of the section for the commutation of the duty itself points very strongly to the same conclusion. I mean that it points to the conclusion that it is not true to say—as was put to us in argument—that the duty only becomes chargeable in each year upon the event of a sale, but it is really a duty which I think, in the more accurate user of the word "chargeable," is chargeable immediately upon the death at the succession. At all events, whether you use that word or not, to my mind it is perfectly plain that the duty is imposed from the death, and I think that the provision for the commutation goes strongly to negative the suggestion that the duty is really only a duty which becomes imposed upon the happening of the contingency of a sale. I think that the duty here is a duty which arises on the succession on the death, and that it is not true to say that it is a duty which arises on the death plus any contingency—to wit, a sale. Sect. 24, which is the section that deals with advowsons, seems to me to point in the same direction. Under these circumstances, having regard to the provisions in the statute with regard to succession duty, and in particular to sect. 23, which is relied on by the respondents to the first appeal, I now say that I read these words, "all such succession duty as shall become payable upon my death in respect of the same estates and property," not as meaning due and payable, for if one so read them the words would be useless and futile, as there is no succession duty which becomes due really immediately upon death. But I read the words as if they had run: "All such succession duty as shall become payable in respect of any succession upon my death in respect of the same estates and property." And although I have added those words in order to make my meaning more plain, I must not be supposed to say that I consider that it is necessary to introduce those words to cause this clause in the will to have the meaning which I attribute to it. In my judgment, if you take the words as they stand, "all such succession duty as shall become payable upon my death in respect of the same estates and property," and put upon them their natural interpretation, they mean only what I have just said. In my judgment, therefore, so much of the judgment of of Joyce, J. as decides that the trustees of the will had not the duty and the right to pay the duty in respect of the succession out of the residuary estate ought to be reversed and a declaration made to the contrary. Having now dealt with what I have called the first appeal, I will deal with the second appeal, which is an appeal that depends upon the first half of that clause in the will which I have read already, and which I need not read again. Now, in respect of this part of the case, Joyce's, J. judgment is as follows: "This point is one of some difficulty, but it seems to me to stand in this way, that, primi facie, under the provisions of the Finance Act 1894, all the heirlooms subject to that resettlement are liable to duty, and became liable to duty upon the death of the testator, the late Lord Leconfield; but that as to a particular class of heirlooms they are within the specific provisions of the Act of Parliament, which says that for heirlooms and chattels of that particular character the payment of this duty is postponed, or, rather, they are to be exempt during a certain period and under a certain event. Upon the whole, I think that the proper thing to decide is, and I do decide, and I think it was the intention of the testator, that a sufficient sum shall be set aside for the purpose of providing for the payment of this duty, to be retained during the life of Lord Leconfield, or until further order, with liberty to apply. If any event happens on which it is perfectly clear that this is not wanted the parties may come again. I do not say pay the money into court, or anything of the sort. Of course the residuary legatees will have the income on the sum set aside in the meantime." I am sorry to say that in respect of this appeal also I cannot see my way to agreeing with Joyce, J. Really this appeal depends upon the words of the 28th section of the Finance Act 1896. That section says: "Where any property passing on the death of a deceased person consists of such pictures, prints, books, manuscripts, works of art, scientific collections, or other things not yielding income as appear to the Treasury to be of national, scientific, or historic interest, and is settled so as to be enjoyed in kind in succession by different persons, such property shall not, on the death of such deceased person, be aggregated with other property, but shall form an estate by itself, and, while enjoyed in kind by a person not competent to dispose of the same, be exempt from estate duty, but if it is sold or is in the possession of some person who is then competent to dispose of the same, shall become liable to estate duty." Then "(2) The person selling the same, or for whose benefit the same is sold, and also the person being in possession and competent to dispose of the same, shall be accountable for the duty, and shall deliver an account, in accordance with sect. 8 of the principal Act, in the case of a sale within one month after the sale, and in the case of a person coming into possession . . . I do not think that I need read anything more from the sub-section. Now, in my opinion the effect of sect. 20 is to exempt heirlooms of this character from this duty. It is quite true that only heirlooms which "appear to the Treasury to be of national, scientific, or historic interest," are so exempt. But there is no question here but that these heirlooms are heirlooms which do so appear to the Treasury. And in my judgment it would not be true to say that the finding—if I may use the expression—by the Treasury would not relate to the time of the death. These heirlooms have all along had this characteristic of being of national or historic interest, although they might not be so certified by the Treasury until a later period. But I have to deal with the words of the will, bearing in mind that what sect. 20 of the Act of 1896 does is to exempt this property until the happening of a particular event. It is not like sect. 15 of the Act of 1894, in which the Treasury have power, in respect of certain subject-matter, to remit the duty. Here the duty is exempt until something has happened. Under these circumstances it seems to me that this is not a duty which comes within the terms used in the first part of the clause in the will. Those words are, "so much of the estate duty and other death duties (if any) as . . . shall become payable upon or by reason of my death in respect of . . ." Then the clause details the estates. It seems to me that this duty does not become payable by reason of the death of the testator; but the truth of that matter is that at the death of the testator these heirlooms are exempted from duty, and it is only when that event happens which is defined by sect. 20 of the Act of 1896 that the duty becomes payable. The event so defined, as we have already seen, is that the heirlooms are sold when they are in possession of some person competent to dispose of the same. When that happens, then the section in terms says that they shall become liable to estate duty. Under those circumstances I think that in respect of these heirlooms there is no duty and no right in the trustees to provide out of the residuary funds money for estate duty.

STIRLING, L.J.—Those two appeals arise out of a direction which is given by the will of the late Lord Leconfield as to the payment of estate duty and succession duty out of certain property of great value to which his eldest son became entitled as tenant for life upon the testator's death. The questions are of some difficulty having regard to the language in which the testator has expressed himself. Now the first appeal relates to a direction given in respect of the payment of succession duty. It runs thus. [His Lordship read the clause, and continued:] Among the estates and properties specified is the very large real estate, of which a part is covered with valuable timber which is said to produce by its cutting, in the ordinary course of management, an income of something like between 3000*l.* and 4000*l.* a year. The question which arises is whether the succession duty payable on that is included in the direction or not. Joyce, J. has held that it is not, but with the greatest respect I have come—though not without considerable hesitation—to a different conclusion. The duty in question is imposed by sect. 10 of the Succession Duty Act 1853, which says this: "There shall be levied and paid to Her Majesty in respect of every such succession as aforesaid, according to the value thereof, the following duties." Then when the successor shall be the lineal issue or lineal ancestor of the predecessor, "a duty at the rate of 1*l.* per centum upon such value," and so on, there being a number of other provisions raising the amount of duty or the percentage mainly out of regard to the distances of the relationship between the predecessor and the successor. The succession is defined in the early part of the Act, and the main definition is to be found in sect. 2, and from that it is to be gathered that a succession, speaking broadly—but sufficiently for the present purpose—is a beneficial interest in property arising upon the death of some person after the date appointed for the commencement of the Act. Now, the duty being so imposed, there are in certain parts of the Act directions as to the assessment and payment of the duty. Sect. 20 gives a general direction that the duty is to be paid when—speaking broadly again—the successor becomes entitled in possession. Sect. 21 says how the duty is to be assessed and paid as regards real estate and provides as follows: [His Lordship read that section and continued:] Upon that it is to be observed that the first instalment becomes payable, not at the death, but twelve months after the death, and that therefore, if the successor dies before any instalment becomes payable, there is nothing payable. Then we come to sect. 23, which deals with the timber, and, reading it shortly, it has reference to where timber shall be comprised in any succession. Therefore it applies to timber included in the succession, which is the case here; and it provides that: "The successor shall be chargeable with duty upon his interest in the net moneys, after deducting all necessary outgoings for the year, which shall from time to time be received from any sales of such timber, trees, or wood, and shall account for and pay the same yearly." So that the successor pays the duty from time to time as the timber is sold in the course of the management of his estate. Now, it is contended, and that view has been adopted by the learned judge in the court below, that seeing that the duty is not payable until a sale takes place, and then from time to time yearly as sales do take place, that is not succession duty which became payable upon the death of the testator in the present case. Now, the objection to that is this, that if that reasoning be sound, then it would seem equally clear that duty which is payable under sect. 21 in respect of the annual value of the property otherwise than from timber is also open to the same objection, and it does not fall within the direction in the will. Yet it is admitted that the direction does apply to the succession on the ordinary annual value of the estate apart from the timber. As I have said, the words do give rise to difficulty, but the succession takes place on death—takes place upon the death of the testator; and seeing that it is admitted—I think rightly admitted—that the direction in the will extends to the annual value of the real estate, apart from the timber, I do not see my way to draw any distinction between the two. Therefore I think that the direction ought to be held to apply equally to the timber also. The other question is one of a different kind altogether, and it relates to some very valuable heirlooms which are the subject of family settlement. The direction by the testator with regard to those is as follows: [His Lordship read the clause of the will, and continued:] The estate duty and other death duties which are to be paid under this direction are such as become payable upon or by reason of the death of the testator. Now these heirlooms fall under sect. 20 of the Finance Act 1896, which deals with pictures and other things not yielding income which have appeared to the "Treasury to be of national, scientific, or historic interest," which are settled so as to be enjoyed in kind in succession by different persons. That being so, the Act provides that the property shall not, on the death of the deceased person, be aggregated with other property, but shall form an estate by itself, and, while enjoyed in kind by a person not competent to dispose of the same, shall be exempt from estate duty. That is the position of the property in the present case, and therefore no estate duty is now assessable or payable in respect of these heirlooms. Then the Act goes on to provide that if the property is sold, or is in the possession of some person who is then competent to dispose of the same, it shall become liable to estate duty. It is said that the duty is not payable upon the death of Lord Leconfield, but that it will or may become hereafter payable by reason of his death. I do not think that that is so within the meaning of the language used in the will. It seems to me that it will only become payable by reason of the heirlooms either being sold or coming into the possession of someone who is competent to dispose of the property. That event has not arisen, and therefore I think that no provision ought to be made for the payment of the estate duty.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have very little to add. Under the Succession Duty Act 1853, succession duty is levied and made payable in respect of one entire succession. On the succession of the present Lord Leconfield upon his father's death, in respect of different portions of the property comprised in the succession, duty is payable at different times and has to be ascertained by different methods. But it is a succession duty payable in respect of one entire succession, and I think—though perhaps it is unnecessary to express a concluded opinion upon it—that the succession duty payable in respect of any part of the succession is meant by sect. 22 of the Act of 1853 to fall upon the whole interest of the successor. Now, if that be the true view of the Act, it seems to me that it can make no difference at all that in the particular class of property with which we are now dealing—namely, timber—there is a provision that you are to ascertain the amount by reference to the actual sales or by reference to the commutation which the commissioners are bound to allow. That being so, I, for the reason stated by my Lord, and by Stirling, L.J.—though with great respect to the learned judge in the court below—come to the same conclusion as my brethren. I think that this succession duty is payable "upon my death in respect of the same estates and property." With reference to the other point, it seems to me that we must come to the conclusion that, under sect. 20 of the Finance Act 1896, the duty is not a duty which is liable to be remitted by the Treasury, but that the heirlooms form property which is altogether exempt from duty. It seems to me impossible, that being the true view, in reading the language of the will, that estate duty shall be payable in respect of the heirlooms. It is true, no doubt, that the Treasury authorities did not ascertain and settle which particular heirlooms were exempt; but when they do ascertain that, the exemption would obviously take effect as from the death of Lord Leconfield. For these reasons I think that the appeals ought to be allowed.

GRAY AND OTHERS v. BONSALE. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Landlord and tenant—Forfeiture—Nonpayment of rent—Judgment for possession against assignee of lease—Application by sublessee for relief—Conveyancing Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 13), s. 4.

The court has jurisdiction to grant relief to an underlessee under sect. 4 of the Conveyancing Act 1892 in case of forfeiture of the original lease for nonpayment of rent.

APPEAL of the plaintiffs from an order of Bucknill, J. made at chambers.

In Sept. 1858 a lease of a yard in Moorgate-street, in the City of London, was granted by the predecessor of the plaintiffs to Woods for a term of sixty years at the yearly rent of 300*l.*

On the same day the same lessor granted to Woods a lease of an hotel adjoining the yard for a term of sixty years at the yearly rent of 800*l.* This lease contained a proviso that if the rent of 300*l.* reserved by the lease of the yard should at any time be unpaid, the amount in arrear should be added to the rent reserved for the hotel and be subject to the conditions and provisos contained in the lease of the hotel.

The leases contained provisos for re-entry upon nonpayment of the rent reserved.

Shortly after the lease was granted Woods subdemised the yard, at the same rent of 300*l.*, to the Midland Railway Company for the whole of the term, less the last fourteen days thereof.

Subsequently Woods assigned all the premises, both the hotel and the yard, for all the residues of the terms to the defendant Bonsale.

The reversions upon both the leases were vested in the plaintiffs.

The rents due under the leases not having been paid, the plaintiffs brought this action against Bonsale to recover possession of all the premises under the provisos for re-entry on nonpayment of rent, and they obtained judgment for possession in default of appearance.

The Midland Railway Company thereupon applied to Bucknill, J. at chambers for relief, neither Woods nor the defendant Bonsale being made parties to the application. The plaintiffs waived any objection upon the ground that Bonsale was not made a party to the application.

The learned judge made an order granting relief to the Midland Railway Company upon payment of costs and of all arrears of rent.

The Common Law Procedure Act 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 126) provides:

Sect. 1. In the case of any ejectment for a forfeiture for nonpayment of rent, the court or a judge shall have power, upon rule or summons, to give relief in a summary manner, but subject to appeal as hereinafter mentioned, up to and within the like time after execution executed, and subject to the same terms and conditions in all respects as to payment of rent, costs, and otherwise, as in the Court of Chancery; and if the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall upon such proceeding be relieved, he and they shall hold the demised lands according to the lease thereof made, without any new lease.

The Conveyancing Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41) provides:

Sect. 14 (2). Where a lessor is proceeding by action or otherwise to enforce such a right of re-entry or forfeiture, the lessee may in the lessor's action, if any, or in any action brought by himself, apply to the court for relief, and the court may grant or refuse relief, as the court having regard to the proceedings and conduct of the parties under the foregoing provisions of this section, and to all the other circumstances, thinks fit, and in case of relief may grant it on such terms, if any, as to costs, expenses, damages, compensation, penalty or otherwise, including the granting of an injunction to restrain any like breach in the future, as the court in the circumstances of each case thinks fit. (3). This section shall not affect the law relating to re-entry or forfeiture or relief in case of nonpayment of rent.

The Conveyancing Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 13) provides:

Sect. 1. This Act may be cited as . . . and the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act 1881 and this Act shall be read together, and may be cited together as . . .

Sect. 4. Where a lessor is proceeding by action or otherwise to enforce a right of re-entry or forfeiture under any covenant, proviso, or stipulation in a lease the court may, on application by any person claiming as underlessee any estate or interest in the property comprised in the lease or any part thereof, either in the lessor's action, if any, or in any action brought by such person for that purpose, make an order vesting for the whole of the term of the lease or any less term the property comprised in the lease or any part thereof in any person entitled as underlessee to any estate or interest in such property upon such conditions as to the execution of any deed or other document, payment of rent, costs, expenses, damages, compensation, giving security or otherwise, as the court in the circumstances of each case shall think fit, but in no case shall any such underlessee be entitled to require a lease to be granted to him for any longer term than he had under his original sublease.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Lush, K.C. and B. A. Cohen for the appellants.—The learned judge had no power to grant relief to the underlessees upon this application. The application for relief was made under sect. 1 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1860, and under that statute relief cannot be granted to an underlessee unless he brings the original lessee before the court, because the effect of granting relief under that statute is to restore the original lease and the liability of the original lessee:

Hare v. Elms, 68 L. T. Rep. 223; (1893) 1 Q. B. 604.

In this case the two leases granted on the same day must be treated as being one lease by reason of the provision as to payment of rent of the yard contained in the lease of the hotel. If relief is granted at all, it ought to be upon the terms that all the premises are vested in the underlessee. The provisions of sect. 4 of the Conveyancing Act 1892 do not apply at all in cases of forfeiture for nonpayment of rent. Under sect. 14 of the Conveyancing Act 1881 an underlessee had no right to relief at all in cases which came within that Act. The Act of 1892 was passed to remedy that state of the law so far as concerned underlessees, and to enable them to obtain relief in cases which came within sect. 14 of the Act of 1881. Sect. 1 of the Act of 1892 provides that it is to be read together with the Act of 1881, and then by sect. 4 provides that an underlessee may apply for relief when the lessor is proceeding to enforce a forfeiture. By sub-sect. 8 of sect. 14 of the Act of 1881 it is provided that "this section shall not affect the law relating to re-entry or forfeiture or relief in case of nonpayment of rent." Therefore, as sect. 4 of the Act of 1892 must be read together with sect. 14 of the Act of 1881, relief cannot be given under sect. 4 of the Act of 1892 in cases of nonpayment of rent:

Cholmeley School, Highgate v. Sewall, 71 L. T. Rep. 88; (1894) 2 Q. B. 906.

[ROMER, L.J. referred to Imray v. Oakshettle (76 L. T. Rep. 632; (1897) 2 Q. B. 218.) That case was decided upon the terms of sub-sect. 6 of sect. 14 of the Act of 1881, which are very different from the terms of sub-sect. 8; and, further, there was no other statute in operation in respect of the matters dealt with by sub-sect. 6 as there is in the case of sub-sect. 8. It would be a strange result if, although the lessee himself cannot apply for relief under the Act of 1881 in case of forfeiture for nonpayment of rent, but only under the Common Law Procedure Act, yet an underlessee can apply under the Act of 1892, or under the Common Law Procedure Act. There are such important differences between the provisions as to relief in the Common Law Procedure Act and those in sect. 4 of the Act of 1892 that it is impossible to suppose that it can have been intended that relief could be given under either Act in cases of nonpayment of rent. The Common Law Procedure Act says that no new lease is to be made, whereas under the Act of 1892 the underlessee may be ordered to execute a new lease. In the case of London Bridge Buildings Company v. Thomson and others (89 L. T. Rep. 50), before Joyce, J., this point was not taken.

Neville, K.C. and C. H. Sargant for the respondents.—It is true that the application to the learned judge was made under the Common Law Procedure Act 1860, but the order can be supported in this court upon any other ground. The underlessees could obtain relief under the Common Law Procedure Act 1860. It was not necessary in this case to bring the original lessee before the court, and the appellants waived any objection upon the ground that the assignee was not before the court. In Hare v. Elms (ubi sup.) the original lessee had not assigned his lease at all, and the effect of granting relief would have been to restore the privity of estate between him and the lessor; in this case the original lessee had assigned all his estate to Bonsale, and therefore an order for relief would not reimpose any burden upon him. The person in whose shoes the underlessee ought to be made to stand is the person in whom the term was vested at the time of the forfeiture:

Webber v. Smith, 2 Vernon, 103.

The effect of the order which the learned judge has made is that the underlessees are put in the place of Bonsall, the assignee. The Conveyancing Act 1892 is a perfectly general Act, and the provisions of sect. 4 are not a mere amendment of sect. 14 of the Act of 1881. These provisions are in terms applicable to all cases, whether within sect. 14 of the earlier Act or not, and the former jurisdiction to grant relief under the Common Law Procedure Act is left untouched. The decision of this court in Imray v. Oakshette (ubi sup.) is a clear authority that the provisions of sect. 4 of the Act of 1892 are not limited by the exceptions contained in sect. 14 of the Act of 1881. These two leases cannot possibly be taken to be all one lease of one property. The respondents are willing to execute any proper lease or deed of covenant in respect of the yard.

Lush, K.C. in reply.—The respondents ought not to be relieved except upon the terms of making good any breaches of covenant—for instance, the repairing covenant; and also of paying an increased rent, as was done in Ewart v. Fryer (83 L. T. Rep. 551; (1901) 1 Ch. 499).

ROMER, L.J.—I think that in substance the learned judge was right in holding that relief should be given to the underlessees in this case; but I am not satisfied that he has given relief in quite the right form. On the question which was argued before us, which I think was really the only question of much substance—that is, whether the lease of this yard was to be considered as a separate lease—I think that the contention of the appellants must fail. So far as persons claiming under the lease of the yard are concerned, I think that that lease must not be connected with the lease of the hotel, and not the less because in the lease of the hotel there was a special provision enabling the lessor to re-enter and determine the lease of the hotel if the rent payable under the lease of the yard fell into arrear. That was a provision which might affect all persons claiming under the lease of the hotel, but it was not a provision which could affect any person claiming under the lease of the yard. Therefore I think that it was quite right for the learned judge to hold, as I gather that he did in effect hold, that for the purpose of this application the lease of the yard was the only lease to be considered. Now, it is clear to my mind that relief could have been granted to the underlessees of this yard either under the Common Law Procedure Act 1860 or under the provisions of sect. 4 of the Conveyancing Act 1892. According, however, to the terms which would have to be imposed if the Common Law Procedure Act 1860 were to be applied, difficulties would have arisen which are, I think, wholly got rid of if we simply apply the provisions of sect. 4 of the Conveyancing Act 1892. Those difficulties would arise from considering what would be the position of the original lessee and of the assignee of the lease if a vesting order were not made under sect. 4 of the Act of 1892, or the underlessee made to execute a proper deed so as to create a privity of contract and of estate as between the underlessee and the lessor. If relief of the ordinary kind were granted under the Common Law Procedure Act 1860—that is, simple relief from forfeiture and no more—the effect, or at any rate the probable effect, would be simply that the original lease would stand, and that the underlessee would simply remain in his position of underlessee, but under no direct liability to the lessor. In that case the old term that existed before and the old liability of the original lessee, and possibly of the assignee, would remain. I think that that would have been an inconvenient course to adopt, especially as the original lessee was not before the court, and the assignee was not before the court, the lessors having waived the necessity of his presence. Still, his absence did, in my opinion, create a difficulty in applying the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1860 in the ordinary way. That being so, I think that the general power conferred upon the court by sect. 4 of the Conveyancing Act 1892 ought to be put in force, and that the provisions of that section are those which can be most usefully applied in a case like this. It was contended that sect. 4 of the Conveyancing Act 1892 does not enable the court to grant any greater relief to an underlessee than could have been granted to an underlessee by the Court of Chancery under its old jurisdiction, or by the courts of common law under the Common Law Procedure Act 1860. That contention was founded upon the provision contained in sub-sect. 8 of sect. 14 of the Conveyancing Act 1881, which enacts that “this section shall not affect the law relating to re-entry or forfeiture or relief in case of nonpayment of rent.” It was argued that we must import that provision into sect. 4 of the Conveyancing Act 1892, and that under sect. 4 the court has no further power in the case of forfeiture for nonpayment of rent on the application of an underlessee than it would have had under the law existing before the Conveyancing Act 1881. In my opinion that contention is not well founded. I think that sect. 4 of the Act of 1892 is not a mere amendment of sect. 14 of the Act of 1881. On the contrary, I think that sect. 4 is what it purports to be—that is, a general enabling clause empowering the court to give relief to underlessees in case of forfeiture of the superior lease under any circumstances and upon such terms as appear to the court to be just, having regard to all the circumstances of the case. I think that this view is in substance supported by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Imray v. Oakshette (76 L. T. Rep. 632; (1897) 2 Q. B. 218), in which a similar question arose. In sub-sect. 6 of sect. 14 of the Conveyancing Act 1881 there is a provision that sect. 14 shall not apply to a covenant or condition against assigning, underletting, parting with the possession, or disposing of the land leased; and in Imray v. Oakshette (ubi sup.) it was contended that, that being so, the court could not grant relief to an underlessee, under sect. 4 of the Conveyancing Act 1892, in cases in which relief could not be granted to the lessee under sect. 14 of the Act of 1881. It was argued, as it has been argued in this case, that sect. 4 of the Act of 1892 is a mere amendment of sect. 14 of the Act of 1881, but that argument failed, and it was decided that the court had jurisdiction under sect. 4 of the Act of 1892 to relieve an under-lessee against a forfeiture of the original lease, though such forfeiture was occasioned by breach of a covenant not to assign or underlet without licence, and therefore could not be relieved against in favour of the lessee under the Act of 1881, notwithstanding the provision that the Act of 1881 and the Act of 1892 were to be read together. If the judgments of Lopes and Rigby, L.J.J. in that case are looked at, it will be seen that, after carefully considering the two sections in the two Acts, they came to the conclusion that sect. 4 of the Act of 1892 is, as I have said it is, a substantive section in itself, unlimited in its application, and is not to be regarded as a mere amendment of sect. 14 of the Act of 1881 so far as the underlessee is concerned. Upon these grounds I think that the objection in law to the application of sect. 4 of the Act of 1892 to the present case falls to the ground. That being so, I think that the proper course to be adopted here is to give relief to the underlessee under the provisions of sect. 4 of the Act of 1892, and I think that that ought to be done by vesting in the underlessee the term of the underlease, and making the underlessee covenant with the lessors to pay the rent of the yard during the term, which in this case I think ought clearly to be 300*l.* a year, the rent reserved by the lease, and to observe and perform the covenants contained in the original lease with regard to the demised premises. In that view it appears to me that it will certainly be unnecessary to bring either the lessee or the assignee before the court; in fact, I think that the appellants do not dispute that, if relief is given in that form under sect. 4 of the Act of 1892. It is said on behalf of the appellants that there may have been breaches of the covenants to repair, and that, before the vesting order is made and a proper deed executed by the underlessees, the repairs ought to be done. I agree that, if that be so, the repairs ought to be made good as a term or condition to be imposed by the court upon the underlessees in granting relief against forfeiture. But, as I am not satisfied that there have been any breaches of the covenants to repair, I think that it is best to refer the matter back to the court below to investigate that question. If it turns out that there have been such breaches, it will, as I have said, be a condition that these breaches be made good. If there have not been any such breaches, then relief will be granted upon the terms which I have indicated; but the details of the deed to be executed, and the form of the order as to vesting, ought to be settled by the court below when the final order comes to be made. The order of the learned judge will be discharged and the matter referred back to be dealt with.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I must say that I am not at all satisfied that, if the rights of the underlessees depended only on the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1860, it is an imperative rule that a person in the position of the original lessee in this case must be brought before the court. That seems to me to be a question of discretion. The original lessee, Woods, parted with his interest in this property to Bonsall, and it is difficult to conjecture what interest Woods could possibly have. It is said that, because under the Common Law Procedure

Act 1860 no new lease has to be granted, but the old lease is set up, difficulties may arise. All difficulties, however, seem to me to be effectively and finally dealt with by sect. 4 of the Conveyancing Act 1892. Construing that section reasonably and without reference to the supposed effect of the incorporation of the Conveyancing Act 1881, it is an independent enactment directed to get rid of difficulties and grievances, and it must be construed according to its terms. It follows, therefore, that there ought to be a vesting order and the execution of such a deed by the underlessees as is mentioned in sect. 4 as one of the conditions upon which relief may be granted. The suggestion that there ought to be any increase of rent cannot be entertained. As to any other conditions, we do not know what circumstances may be brought before the learned judge to show that particular stipulations may be required.

Order varied.

*Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN C. TRAAE, FOR THE OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP
RIKARD NORDRAAK, AND LENNARD AND SONS LIMITED. (a)*

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Ship—Charter-party—Hire—Suspension of hire—Detention by ice "caused by breakdown of steamer"—Vessel detained owing to repairs made necessary by stranding.

By a charter-party it was provided by one clause that, in the event of loss of time from damage preventing the working of the vessel, the payment of hire should cease until she should again be in an efficient state to resume her service, and by another clause that "detention by ice should be for account of charterers unless caused by breakdown of steamer."

During the voyage the vessel stranded; the necessary repairs were effected and she resumed her voyage; owing, however, to the delay thus caused she was unable to proceed to the destined port before it was closed by ice, and she was consequently detained at an intermediate port.

Held (affirming the judgment of Ridley, J.), that there was a detention by ice "caused by breakdown of steamer," and that payment of hire ceased during that detention.

APPEAL of C. Traae from the judgment of Ridley, J. upon a special case stated by arbitrators.

The arbitrators appointed under a submission contained in a charter-party, dated the 1st Oct. 1902, stated a special case for the opinion of the court which, so far as is material, was as follows:

By the charter-party, dated the 1st Oct. 1902, it was agreed between C. Traae, for the owners of the steamship Rikard Nordraak, hereinafter called "the owners," and J. M. Lennard and Sons Limited, hereinafter called "the charterers," that the owners should let and the charterers should hire the steamship for the term of about two calendar months from the day on which she was placed with a 'clear hold at the disposal of the charterers at Cardiff, Barry, Penarth, Newport, Swansea, or Port Talbot, as therein mentioned, to be employed on a voyage to Spain and Portugal, thence to the Baltic, and back to United Kingdom or the Continent, as charterers or their agents should direct, upon the following (among other) conditions:

Clause 1. That the owners should maintain the vessel in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for and during the service.

Clause 3. That the charterers should pay for the use and hire of the vessel at the rate of 370*l.* per calendar month, commencing on and from the day of her delivery to charterers as aforesaid, and at and after the same rate for any part of a month used to complete a voyage, hire to continue from the time specified for terminating the charter until her delivery to owners (unless lost) in the same good order and condition as when accepted (fair wear and tear only excepted) at a port in United Kingdom or on the Continent between Bordeaux and Hamburg.

Clause 14. That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four running hours, the payment of hire should cease until she should be again in an efficient state to resume her service; but should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather or from any accident to the cargo, such detention or loss of time should be at the charterers' risk and expense.

Clause 16. The act of God, perils of sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates, and thieves, arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people, collisions, stranding, and other accidents of navigation excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner.

Clause 26. Detention by ice to be for account of charterers unless caused by breakdown of steamer.

The steamship was duly placed at the disposal of the charterers under the charter-party, and proceeded under the charter-party to Pomaron, in Spain, where she loaded a cargo under the charter-party, for which bills of lading were signed for delivery of the said cargo at St. Petersburg.

The steamship sailed from Pomaron for St. Petersburg on the 19th Oct. 1902.

On the 28th Oct. 1902, while in the course of the voyage to St. Petersburg, the steamship grounded at or near Fairmunde, in the Baltic, and thereby received such damage as to render her unfit to continue the said voyage without repair. The captain accordingly put back to Copenhagen for repairs, where the vessel arrived on or about the 1st Nov. 1902, and the necessary repairs were completed on the 1st Dec. 1902. The cargo, or part of it, had been discharged for the purpose of the repairs. It was reloaded after the repairs were completed, and the vessel sailed from Copenhagen on the 1st Jan. 1903, and arrived at Revel, at the entrance of the Gulf of Finland, on the 6th Jan. She put into and stayed at Revel because she was unable to proceed further towards St. Petersburg by reason of ice. She is still at Revel, not frozen in, but awaiting the breaking up of the ice at St. Petersburg and the approaches thereto.

In these circumstances a dispute arose between the owners and the charterers under the charter-party as to the period for which, according to the true construction of the charter-party, the payment of hire should cease in consequence of the damage received by the steamship by grounding as aforesaid, and whether hire is payable by the charterers under the charter-party during the period of the detention of the ship at Revel.

The arbitrators found and awarded that no hire was payable by the charterers to the owners under the charter-party for the period from the 28th Oct. 1902 until the 20th Dec. 1902 inclusive, but that hire was payable by the charterers to the owners in respect of the period from the 20th Dec. 1902 until the 6th Jan. 1903 inclusive.

They found as a fact that the port of St. Petersburg became closed by ice on the 26th Nov. 1902, and not before, and that by reason of the ice it was practically impossible for the steamship, after completion of her repairs as aforesaid, to get nearer to St. Petersburg than the port of Revel, where she now lies. They further found as a fact that, if the steamship had not grounded on the 28th Oct. 1902 and received damage as aforesaid, she could easily have reached St. Petersburg and have discharged her cargo and have got away from that port before the 26th Nov., and before the port of St. Petersburg was closed by ice.

In these circumstances it was contended before the arbitrators on behalf of the charterers that the detention of the ship at Revel was a detention by ice caused by breakdown of steamer, and that, according to the true construction of the charter-party, the hire ceased during the period of such detention. On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the owners that the detention at Revel was not a detention by ice at all, or that in any case it was not a detention by ice caused by breakdown of the steamer, and that therefore the hire continued to run during the period of such detention.

If and so far as it was a question of fact, the arbitrators awarded and determined that the detention of the steamship at Revel was a detention caused by breakdown, and, subject to the opinion of the court on the question hereinafter submitted, they awarded and determined that the hire ceased under the charter-party during the period of such detention.

The question for the opinion of the court was:

Whether upon the facts stated and upon the true construction of the charter-party hire was and would be payable by the charterers to the owners under the charter during the detention of the ship at Revel awaiting the opening of the port of St. Petersburg.

If the court should answer this question in the negative, then the award as above stated was to stand.

If the court should answer the question in the affirmative, then the award as above stated was to be set aside, and in that case the arbitrators awarded and directed that the hire continued to run at the rate stipulated by the charter-party, notwithstanding the detention of the steamer at Revel.

[CT. OF APP.]

The special case was argued before Ridley, J., and the learned judge held that the decision of the arbitrators was right, and gave judgment in favour of the charterers.

The shipowners appealed.

Sims Williams for the appellants.—The decision of the learned judge, holding that the award of the arbitrators must be upheld, was wrong. Under this charter-party the liability to pay hire would not cease in any case except upon the happening of one of the events specified in clause 14. The detention of the vessel at Revel was not caused by any one of those events. The vessel, as soon as she was repaired, was again in an efficient state, and the liability to pay hire would again arise. It had been decided that hire did not cease to be payable because, owing to accident, the vessel was delayed for repairs:

Harelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 555;

Inman Steamship Company v. Bischoff, 47 L. T. Rep. 581; 7 App. Cas. 670.

In consequence of those decisions this clause was inserted in charter-parties. In Hogarth v. Miller Brother and Co. (64 L. T. Rep. 205; (1891) A. C. 48) this clause came up for consideration, and it was held that there was a suspension of hire only during the time that the vessel was actually inefficient for service. Even if this detention can be said to have been caused by the stranding of the vessel, "stranding" is one of the excepted perils specified in clause 16. Clause 26 does not provide that the payment of hire shall cease if there is a detention by ice caused by breakdown of steamer. It is an entirely separate and distinct clause, and a provision for the cesser of hire ought not to be read into it. If the charterers have any remedy under clause 26, it is a remedy in damages only. This detention by ice was not "caused by breakdown of steamer." The vessel after she was repaired was not broken down at all, and was able to proceed on the voyage. She was not detained by ice, for she was not frozen in at all. At Revel her cargo could have been discharged and forwarded by land to St. Petersburg.

Scrutton, K.C. and H. W. Loehnis, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—I think that this appeal must fail. It seems to me that clause 26 of the charter-party means what it plainly says: "Detention by ice to be for account of charterers unless caused by breakdown of steamer." The steamer was broken down, and by reason of that breakdown she was so long delayed that she was unable to proceed on the voyage as far as St. Petersburg by reason of that port being blocked by ice. Therefore there was a "detention by ice," which was not to be "for account of charterers," but was to be for account of the shipowners. Therefore the payment of hire was suspended during that detention. This appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Costs—Action settled—"Record withdrawn. No costs on either side"—Costs of interlocutory proceedings ordered to be paid by plaintiff—Right of defendant to tax after settlement of action.

During the progress of an action several orders were made, upon interlocutory applications, that the plaintiff should pay the defendants' costs, in some cases "in any event."

The action was subsequently settled upon the terms, indorsed on the briefs of counsel, "Record withdrawn. No costs on either side," the question of the costs of the interlocutory proceedings not being present to their minds.

Held (dismissing the appeal), that after the settlement of the action the defendants were entitled to taxation and payment of their costs of the interlocutory proceedings which the plaintiff had been ordered to pay.

APPEAL of the plaintiff from an order of Bucknill, J. made at chambers.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages from the defendants for an alleged libel.

During the progress of the action there were several interlocutory applications, in chambers and in the Court of Appeal, in which the plaintiff was ordered to pay the costs of the defendants, in some cases "in any event."

Before the action was tried it was settled by the parties upon the following terms: "Record withdrawn. No costs on either side." The counsel, who came to this agreement and indorsed their briefs with the terms above stated, said that the question of the costs of the interlocutory applications was not present to their minds when they so settled the action.

The defendants applied to the master for an order to tax their costs of those interlocutory applications, but the master refused to make an order.

Upon appeal, Bucknill, J. at chambers made an order for the taxation of the defendants' costs of those interlocutory applications.

The plaintiff appealed.

Ernest Pollock for the appellant.—The learned judge had no power to order the taxation of these costs. The terms of settlement mean that there shall be no taxation of any costs at all of any kind; that there shall be a complete truce between the parties, and no further proceedings of any sort or kind between them. When the record is withdrawn there is nothing left in the court at all, and nothing upon which any order of any kind can be made. Therefore there cannot be any order for taxation of any costs, or any taxation of costs:

Stodhart v. Johnson, 3 T. R. 657;

Burdon v. Flower, 7 Dowl. P. C. 786.

The withdrawal of the record ought to be construed as a waiver of all claims to costs to which a party may have been entitled before the settlement. The master refused to make an order, in accordance with the well-settled practice of all the masters to refuse to tax any costs when the record has been withdrawn. [ROMER, L.J. referred to Order LXV., r. 33.]

Norman Craig, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—It appears to me that there is no ground whatever for this appeal. During the progress of the action orders were made that the plaintiff should pay costs to the defendants, in some cases "in any event." Those orders cannot be got rid of unless the parties have clearly agreed that those costs shall not be paid. In this case it was agreed that the record should be withdrawn, and it is said that that foregoes all rights to any costs under orders previously made. In my opinion no implication arises in point of law from that agreement that it was agreed to forego such costs. In those circumstances the orders made for payment of the defendants' costs were left as they were, and the defendants have a right to have those costs taxed and paid. This appeal therefore fails, and must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. Taxation of the costs under these orders follows as a matter of course when the order has been made and the proper time arrives, without any further order to tax, though I think that in the circumstances of this case it was a proper course to take to apply for an order to tax.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. According to the old practice, when an order was made dismissing an application with costs, the successful party might tax his costs at once, and it could not be said that a subsequent settlement could, apart from express agreement, affect the right to such costs. In the present case the costs were not to be taxed and paid at once, but that cannot make any difference. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

KNIGHT v. ISLE OF WIGHT ELECTRIC LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Nuisance—Noise, vibration, and smell—Electrical works—Generating station—Injunction.

By a provisional order made under the Electric Lighting Acts, and duly confirmed by Act of Parliament, the corporation of R. were authorised to supply electrical energy for public and private purposes within the area of the borough; it being provided by the order that nothing therein should exonerate the undertakers from any indictment, action, or other proceedings for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused or permitted by them. The corporation entered into arrangements with the defendant company for the erection, maintaining, and working of a generating station within the borough; and the defendant company, in pursuance of such arrangements, acquired as a site for the proposed works a piece of land adjoining the garden of the plaintiff's house, and proceeded to erect therein the requisite engines, dynamos, and other machinery.

The plaintiff, who occupied her house as a ladies' school, complained of various annoyances to the inmates of her establishment by noise, vibration, and offensive smells or vapours produced by the operation of the defendant company's works, and instituted an action for an injunction and damages in respect of the alleged nuisance.

The court being of opinion that the annoyances complained of were not trivial or a kind to be expected from any ordinary and reasonable use by the defendant company of the land they had acquired, and, further, that, in spite of a diminution in intensity and frequency of the annoyances complained of since the commencement of the action, yet even at the date of the trial such annoyances had repeatedly and recently recurred, an injunction and damages were granted accordingly.

ACTION for an injunction to restrain the defendant company from so working their engines and carrying on their works as to interfere with the enjoyment of certain premises occupied by the plaintiff for the purposes of her business, or so as in any way to cause annoyance, nuisance, or danger to the plaintiff or the persons inhabiting or frequenting the said premises.

The plaintiff was the lessee and occupier of a large house and garden at Ryde, in the Isle of Wight, where she had for some time been carrying on a ladies' school. The defendants had recently acquired a piece of land adjoining the school premises, and had erected thereon extensive works for the supply of electric light and energy.

The plaintiff alleged that the running of the engines and machinery used in the works caused vibration and noise which seriously interfered with the rest and repose of the plaintiff and the inmates of her house, and that the defendants also caused or permitted offensive smells of great intensity and injurious to health to be emitted from their works and to come upon the plaintiff's premises. In respect of these acts she claimed an injunction and damages.

The facts will be found more fully set out in his Lordship's judgment.

Hughes, K.C. and J. W. Manning for the plaintiff.

Younger, K.C. and J. F. Waggett for the defendants.—Even though the acts complained of by the plaintiff would ordinarily constitute a nuisance, such acts are here of a temporary character, and are due to the incompleteness of the works, and accordingly an injunction should not be granted:

Attorney-General v. Sheffield Gas Company, 3 D. G. M. & G. 304, 320, 340;

Harrison v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company, 64 L. T. Rep. 864; (1891) 2 Ch. 409;

Attorney-General v. Preston Corporation, 13 Times L. Rep. 14;

Attorney-General v. Cambridge Consumers' Gas Company, 19 L. T. Rep. 508; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 71, 81.

(a) Reported by STONEY DAVEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Again, there is no proof of injury to the plaintiff's property of a structural character, so that the case does not come within the law as laid down by Lords Westbury and Cranworth in St. Helen's Smelting Company v. Tipping (12 L. T. Rep. 776; 11 H. of L. Cas. 642, 650). They also referred to the cases of

Gaunt v. Fynney, 27 L. T. Rep. 569; L. Rep. 8 Ch. 8, 13;

Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Company, 72 L. T. Rep. 34; (1895) 1 Ch. 287, 310, 313.

Hughes, K.C. in reply.—Although, undoubtedly, occupiers of property must all to some degree suffer slight inconveniences caused by their neighbours in the reasonable and ordinary enjoyment of their property, nevertheless an occupier, as here, is entitled to an injunction when the annoyances arise from an unusual use of property:

Fritz v. Hobson, 42 L. T. Rep. 225; 14 Ch. Div. 542, 556;

Bamford v. Turnley, 3 B. & S. 62;

Fleming v. Hislop, 11 App. Cas. 686, 697;

Ball v. Ray, 28 L. T. Rep. 346; L. Rep. 8 Ch. 467.

Even if it could be shown that the annoyances are only occasional, that is not sufficient:

Lambton v. Mellish, 71 L. T. Rep. 385; (1894) 3 Ch. 163.

Cur. adv. vult.

JOYCE, J.—The plaintiff is the lessee for the residue of a term of twenty-one years from Michaelmas 1900 at a rent of 250*l.* of a house, garden, and grounds in the borough of Ryde, and she carries on there a high-class boarding school for young ladies. In 1899 the corporation of Ryde obtained a provisional order under the Electric Lighting Acts authorising them in the usual way to supply electrical energy for public and private purposes within the area of the borough. By clause 69 of that order it was provided that nothing in the order should exonerate the undertakers from any indictment, action, or other proceedings for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused or permitted by them. This order was duly confirmed by Act of Parliament. The corporation afterwards entered into arrangements with the defendants for the erection, maintaining, and working of a generating station within the borough. In pursuance of such arrangements the defendants, in the early part of 1903, acquired, as a site for the purpose of the proposed works, a piece of land adjoining the garden of the plaintiff's house, and proceeded to erect thereon the requisite engines, dynamos, and other machinery. The engines were driven by gas produced upon the premises by a system of the character known as the Dawson process, for one of the terms under which the defendants held the site precluded them from erecting any tall chimney shaft thereon. The plaintiff's house was upon a higher level than the defendants' generating station, and there were no intervening buildings. The works were opened on the 1st Oct. 1903, and from that date, if not before, they had been supplying the energy for the production of electric light to customers. It was, of course, hoped by the defendants and the corporation, and it was to be expected, that the demand for this supply would constantly and greatly increase, and that consequently from time to time considerable additions and extensions would have to be made to the plant and machinery at present installed upon the premises of the defendants. Before the formal opening of the works the manufacture of gas for working the engines and the machinery generally had been in operation, and in particular upon one occasion in September for a period of ninety hours the engines and dynamos were working without any intermission. The plaintiff, complaining of various annoyances to the inmates of her establishment by noise, vibration, and offensive smells or vapours produced by the operation of the defendants' works, instituted this action on the 29th Sept., claiming an injunction and damages in respect of the alleged nuisance. The action was tried upon several days during the Michaelmas Sittings, and a large body of evidence was adduced upon both sides. Having regard to the positive testimony of the plaintiff and the witnesses called by her, whose veracity and substantial accuracy there is no reason to doubt, and to the acts admitted by some of the defendants' witnesses, I consider it to have been sufficiently proved before me that at various times during September, and for not inconsiderable periods, the works of the defendants were so carried on as by noise, offensive smells, and, in some degree, by vibration to occasion a serious interference with the ordinary comfort of the plaintiff and the inmates of her house, and the carrying on of her school. There was some ground for suspecting that these annoyances, or some of them, were injurious to the health of some of the ladies in the plaintiff's house; but I do not consider that to have been established. Generally the annoyances actually experienced were not, in my opinion, trivial or of a kind to be expected from any ordinary and reasonable use by the defendants of the land they had acquired. Nor were they by any means such as would only be complained of by unreasonable or over-fastidious persons. No doubt since the commencement of the action the defendants have, by the adoption of various expedients known to mechanical engineers and men of science, and, perhaps, under pressure of these proceedings, by exercise of special care in the management, greatly diminished the intensity and frequency of the annoyances complained of. The engines and machinery are not now worked later than 11 p.m., as they were at one time. There is room for further improvement in the works, and the most skilful and careful management will always be necessary to prevent the annoyance complained of from constantly recurring. At times there is no annoyance to complain of. Still, at the date of the trial such annoyance had repeatedly and recently recurred. Even then the works were not in such perfect order, if that perfection were attainable, as to remove altogether the plaintiff's just grounds of complaint. In my opinion, subject to a question to be mentioned presently, the plaintiff had ample justification for the institution of the action, and I hold that the repeated and not merely momentary annoyances occasioned to the plaintiff by the defendants' works amounted to an actionable nuisance, unless the defendants can make out that they were in point of law justified or to be excused. The defendants contended that they were to be so excused, and in support of that contention they relied upon the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J. (then Vaughan Williams, J.) in Harrison v. South-wark and Vauxhall Water Company (64 L. T. Rep. 864; (1891) 2 Ch. 409), where he said: "In the first place, it seems to me that, if the defendants had without statutory authority sunk this shaft and done this pumping for any lawful and ordinary purpose in the exercise of their powers as private owners of the land, they would not have been responsible as for a nuisance. It frequently happens that the owners or occupiers of land cause, in the execution of lawful works in the ordinary user of land, a considerable amount of temporary annoyance to their neighbours, but they are not necessarily on that account held to be guilty of causing an unlawful nuisance. The business of life could not be carried on if it were so. For instance, a man who pulls down his house for the purpose of building a new one no doubt causes a considerable inconvenience to his next-door neighbours during the process of demolition; but he is not responsible as for a nuisance if he uses all reasonable skill and care to avoid annoyance to his neighbour by the works of demolition. Nor is he liable to an action, even though the noise and dust and the consequent annoyance be such as would constitute a nuisance, if the same, instead of being created for the purpose of the demolition of the house, had been created in sheer wantonness or in the execution of works for a purpose involving a permanent continuance of the noise and dust. For the law, in judging what constitutes a nuisance, does take into consideration both the object and duration of that which is said to constitute the nuisance." Now, accepting that statement of the law, it must be observed that the nuisance or annoyances complained of in the present case did not arise from acts of the nature referred to in the passage which I have read. The plaintiff had submitted to any inconvenience that arose from the mere construction of the defendants' works. What she complained of was what she had suffered, and was from time to time still suffering, from the working of the generating station, and the operations carried on, and which would continue to be carried on, there. These I hold to be not an ordinary use of the defendants' property, or in any sense reasonable, if serious annoyance is thereby occasioned to the occupiers of the adjoining house and garden. Another excuse set up was that the annoyances were only temporary and occasional. The judgment of Bramwell, B. in the leading case of Bamford v. Turnley (3 B. & S. 62) furnishes a sufficient answer to that. The defendants do not allege, nor has it been shown, that their works could not have been established and set permanently in operation without occasioning a nuisance if the necessary and reasonable precautions had been carefully taken in the first instance. Further, what is complained of is not by any means what happened in some cases that have been referred to, where, once in a way, for a public purpose, there was a breaking up of a portion of a road for some two or three days, after which there was an end of the matter. Upon the whole, I hold (1) that the acts complained of have from time to time, and frequently, been such as, having regard to the circumstances and surroundings of the defendants' property, are in excess of the natural and ordinary course of enjoyment of that property; and (2) that these acts had up to the trial materially interfered with the ordinary comfort of existence of the plaintiff and her household. Consequently there must be an injunction, during the continuance of the plaintiff's lease, to restrain the defendant company, its directors, servants, and agents, from using or working, or causing or permitting to be used or worked, in or upon their generating station and other works adjacent to the plaintiff's garden, any engines, dynamos, or other machinery, or from there carrying on the manufacture of gas or any other process, in such a manner as by the production of noise, noxious or offensive smells, vibration, or otherwise to be or occasion nuisance or injury to the plaintiff as lessee or occupier of the house, garden, and premises comprised in her lease. There will also be an inquiry as to damages.

Re GLASDIE COPPER MINES LIMITED; ENGLISH ELECTRO-METALLURGICAL COMPANY LIMITED v. GLASDIE COPPER MINES LIMITED. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Tenant's fixtures—Removal by mortgagee after forfeiture of lease.

In June 1896 the defendant company issued debentures charging with the payment of the moneys advanced its undertaking and all its property whatsoever, both present and future.

In July 1896 the defendant company took a lease of certain premises, the lease containing a clause that, if the company should become bankrupt or insolvent or go into liquidation, the term should cease and determine and be void to all intents and purposes; and upon that there was power of re-entry.

On the 8th Feb. 1901, in a debenture-holders' action brought on behalf of the debenture-holders to enforce their charge, a receiver and manager was appointed of the undertaking of the defendant company, and of all the present property whatsoever or wheresoever comprised in or subject to the security.

On the 8th July 1903 an application was made in the debenture-holders' action that certain trade fixtures upon the premises, which were the subject of the lease of July 1896, might be sold by the receiver, and that the receiver might be at liberty to remove the same from the premises of the defendant company; and on the 24th Aug. 1903 an order was made accordingly.

On the 16th Oct. 1903 the defendant company passed an extraordinary resolution for a voluntary winding-up.

On the 13th Nov. 1903 the reversioner of the premises, which were the subject of the lease of July 1896, applied to the receiver for delivery and possession of the same.

Upon an application by the reversioner for an inquiry as to her interest in the premises and the buildings and fixtures thereon, and for delivery of possession of the premises by the receiver to the reversioner :

Held, that the interest of the receiver in the premises was not concluded by the resolution of the 16th Oct. 1903, but that the receiver still retained the right to remove the fixtures during a reasonable time.

Pugh v. Arton (20 L. T. Rep. 865; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 626) distinguished.

MOTION wherein the question was raised and determined as to whether tenant's fixtures are removable by a mortgagee of the lessee after the determination of the lease by forfeiture.

The facts will be found set forth at length in his Lordship's judgment.

A. F. Peterson for the applicant.—Tenant's fixtures must be removed during the continuance of the term, or within such time afterwards as the tenant may properly consider himself the tenant of the landlord :

Weeton v. Woodcock, 7 M. & W. 14;

Pugh v. Arton, 20 L. T. Rep. 865; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 626;

Barff v. Probyn, 73 L. T. Rep. 118.

Frank Wright (Hughes, K.C. with him) for the debenture-holders.—The proviso in the lease, that the term should cease and determine in the event of the company becoming bankrupt, or insolvent, or going into liquidation, only has the effect of rendering the lease void at the option of the lessor; and accordingly, if in fact a reasonable time ought to be allowed the receiver for the removal of the fixtures, that time should be taken to run from the receipt of the letter dated the 13th Nov. 1903. Now, whatever may be the rule as to the removal of tenant's fixtures generally, where there is an agreement in a lease to the effect that the tenant shall be at liberty to remove his fixtures, he will be allowed a reasonable time in which to remove the same :

Fawcett, Landlord and Tenant, p. 493.

And we submit that it is immaterial whether the agreement is in the lease or elsewhere. In this case the order made by the master was equivalent under the circumstances to an agreement by the applicant that the receiver should be at liberty to remove the fixtures. Moreover, the right of the receiver to remove the fixtures could not be prejudiced by the company's voluntarily going into liquidation. A surrender by a lessee cannot affect the rights of a third party; and accordingly a mortgagee of tenants' fixtures still retains the right to remove the same, notwithstanding a surrender, provided that he does so within a reasonable time :

Saint v. Pilley, 33 L. T. Rep. 93; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 137.

See also

Fawcett, Landlord and Tenant, pp. 460, 461.

And we submit that there is no reason why the same principle should not apply to the present case.

A. Adams, for the receiver, adopted the arguments adduced on behalf of the debenture-holders.

Peterson in reply.—The order of the master simply operates as an admission by the applicant that at the date of the order she had no interest in the premises; it cannot be construed as an agreement by the applicant.

JOYCE, J.—The question in this case is with reference to certain fixtures—that is to say, certain articles which, though annexed to the soil, do not thereby become the property of the owner of the freehold, but are removable by the tenant. The question I have to decide is whether these articles may be removed by a purchaser or mortgagee from the lessee after the lease has been determined by forfeiture. In the month of June 1896 the defendant company (then bearing a different title) issued debentures and charged with the payment of the moneys advanced its undertaking and all its property whatsoever and wheresoever both present and future, constituting in point of fact a floating charge. Then in the month of July 1896 the defendant company took a lease from the predecessor of the present applicants; and in that lease is a clause which provides that, "if the company, their successors or lawful assigns, shall become bankrupt or insolvent, or go into liquidation, or shall not truly and faithfully and according to the true intent and meaning of these presents observe, perform, and keep all and singular the covenants," and so on, the term "shall cease, determine, and be void to all intents and purposes, but not as regards the right, power, and authority of the lessor, his heirs or assigns, to enforce the due performance of all the covenants"; and then upon that there is a power to re-enter. Subsequently there was a debenture-holders' action brought on behalf of the debenture-holders to enforce their charge, and in that action, on the 8th Feb. 1901, a receiver and manager was appointed of the undertaking of the defendant company and of all the present property whatsoever and wheresoever comprised in or subject to the security. Thereupon it is quite clear that the debenture-holders, as mortgagees, became entitled to the same rights in respect of any fixtures as the lessee had formerly possessed, and could remove the same in the same manner as the lessee had previously been entitled so to do. On the 20th June 1903 a petition to wind-up was presented; so that, if an order had been made upon that petition, there would have been a forfeiture under the terms of the lease, and the commencement of the winding-up would have been on the presentation of the petition. No order to wind-up has been made, and the petition is either still pending or has been struck out by the judge in chambers. Then on the 8th July an application was made by the plaintiffs in the debenture-holders' action that the trade fixtures in question, the boilers and engines and so on, not including any patented machinery which could only be used by the defendant company under the licence granted to them, might be sold by the receiver, and that the receiver might be at liberty to remove the same from the premises of the defendant company. That summons came before the master on several occasions, and ultimately the landlord or the representative of the landlord—I do not know whether the original landlord was dead then or not—was served; and the landlord or his representative (as the case was) appeared by a solicitor. Unfortunately the order made was not drawn up. I am not sure that it would be necessary to draw this order up, because it is an order with reference to an officer of the court; but in the presence of the solicitor of the landlord

the summons was disposed of, and the note indorsed by the master is in these terms: "Leave to the receiver to sell the plant mentioned in paragraphs 1 (sub-sects. 1 to 6) and 2 of the said affidavit of John Bevan, filed the 20th July 1903. The landlord claims no interest in this plant. Reserves to be fixed by the receiver." That order having been made on the 16th Oct. following—the receiver, of course, being in possession—the company passed an extraordinary resolution for a voluntary winding-up. This did not terminate the lease, because, as I pointed out, or as was pointed out to me in the course of the argument, it is well settled that expressions of the kind such as there are in this lease only mean that the tenancy shall determine at the option of the lessor, that it shall be voidable and not void, and a fortiori, when it is added—as it is in this case—that it shall be lawful for the lessor thereupon to re-enter, it follows, where the proviso makes the lease voidable, the landlord must, in order to take advantage of it, do some unequivocal act notified to the lessee indicating his intention to avail himself of his option. After this the receiver, acting under the order of the 24th Aug., issued advertisements for the sale of the fixtures in question on the 26th Nov. In consequence of this advertisement, and knowing it had been issued, and after money had been expended towards carrying out the order, the landlord formally demanded possession on the 13th Nov., or rather the solicitor or agent wrote to the receiver as follows: "I am instructed by my client, Mrs. Vaughan, to apply to you as receiver for delivery and possession of the premises comprised in and demised by the lease, the reversion of the premises being now vested in Mrs. Vaughan under the will of her husband, the late John Vaughan." That was on the 13th Nov. On the 17th Nov. notice was given in the motion which is now before me. That was on behalf of the representative of the landlord, asking that an inquiry be made whether Mrs. Vaughan has any and what interest in the lands and mines—that is, the lands and mines demised—and the buildings and fixtures thereon taken possession of by the receiver and manager, and that directions may be given to the receiver to deliver up possession to the applicant of the said lands and mines, buildings, and fixtures, or that the applicant may be at liberty to commence proceedings against the said receiver to recover possession in the usual way, and for an injunction to restrain the receiver from going on with the sale or removing the fixtures. Now, the applicant's contention is that—the receiver not now holding the premises under a right still to consider himself as tenant (the words used in Weeton v. Woodcock (7 M. & W. 14) and Mackintosh v. Trotter 3 M. & W. 184)—the landlord was entitled to re-enter, and that the interest of the receiver and debenture-holders is at an end. Upon those two cases and that rule, I observe that Thesiger, L.J. in Ex parte Brook (39 L. T. Rep. 458; 10 Ch. Div. 100) says: "It is not easy to define precisely what was meant by the propositions to which we have just referred, and we observe that, as regards the rule laid down in Weeton v. Woodcock, the difficulty which we feel in understanding its exact meaning was shared in by the Court of Common Pleas, as stated by Willes, J. in delivering the judgment of that court in Leader v. Homewood

(5 C. B. N. S. 546)"; and he goes on to say: "It may be that in cases where a tenant holds over after the expiration of a term certain under a reasonable supposition of consent on the part of his landlord, or in the case where an interest of uncertain duration comes suddenly to an end and the tenant keeps possession for such reasonable time only as would enable him to sever his fixtures and to remove them with his goods and chattels off the demised premises, or even in cases where the landlord exercises a right of forfeiture and the tenant remains on the premises for such reasonable time as last referred to, the law would presume a right to remove tenant's fixtures after the expiration or determination of the tenancy." Then he says the case before them is a different case, and that, at all events, the rule does not apply to that case. Now, for the purpose of determining the question here, it appears to me that I have not to decide whether—as is stated in some of the books, or as suggested by North, J. in Cumberland Union Banking Company v. Maryport Hematite Iron and Steel Company (66 L. T. Rep. 108; (1892) 1 Ch. 415)—no property at all in the fixtures vests in the landlord until the term comes to an end, or whether the property in the fixtures does sub modo vest in the landlord when they are affixed and the tenant retains only a power coupled with an interest. However this may be, it is well settled that where the tenant, the lessee, surrenders his interest to the landlord, that does not deprive the mortgagees or purchasers of the rights they then possessed (the previous purchasers of course) in reference to fixtures situated such as these are, and that they still retain the right to remove them during a reasonable time. The authorities for that are London and Westminster Loan and Discount Company v. Drake (6 C. B. N. S. 798) and Saint v. Pilley (33 L. T. Rep. 93; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 137); and there are also other cases. Here the passing of the extraordinary resolution was a voluntary act on the part of the lessees in which the mortgagees did not concur, and therefore the passing of such resolution, in my opinion, cannot vest the absolute property in chattels belonging to a mortgagee in the reversioner or take away the purchaser's power to remove any more than such power or such right (whatever it may be) would be taken away in the case of the surrender of a lease by the lessee. I was properly pressed with the case of Pugh v. Arton (20 L. T. Rep. 865; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 626), before Malins, V.C., where it was held, according to the marginal note, that "in the absence of special contract, tenants' fixtures cannot be removed after the termination of the lease, and this rule applies whether the lease determines by effluxion of time or by re-entry on forfeiture." In my opinion, that marginal note goes beyond the decision, and is not in accordance with the law. That may be very true so far as concerns a power to remove by the tenant himself, though I trust the Court of Appeal, whenever the case comes to be discussed there, will come to a different conclusion. But, at all events, this only concerns the tenant himself, and has nothing to do with the case of a mortgagee or purchaser from the tenant before the forfeiture accrues; and in this particular case of Pugh v. Arton the person who was claiming the fixtures and whose claim was disallowed was a person whose only claim was as a volunteer, and it was under and by virtue of the assignment from the lessee, which assignment was in itself the act of forfeiture. In my opinion, the authorities enable me to decide this case in a way which is consonant with reason and justice, and I hold that the mortgagees, the debenture-holders, have a reasonable time within which to remove these fixtures.

PARKER v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a)

Public authority—Limitation of action—Tramway acquired and worked by county council under statutory powers—Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1.

The London County Council by two private statutes were empowered to acquire and work a certain tramway.

An accident having happened to a passenger on one of the tramcars owing to the alleged negligence of the council or their servants:

Held, that the action must be commenced within six months, as sect. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 applied.

POINT of law raised on the pleadings.

The action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for personal injuries suffered while he was a passenger on a tramcar, owing, it was alleged, to the negligence of the defendants or their servants.

The accident happened on the 16th June 1902, and the writ in the action was issued on the 12th Jan. 1903.

The tramway upon which the accident occurred was acquired from the London Tramways Company by the London Tramways Company Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. clxxxix.), and power was conferred upon the defendants to work the same by the London County Tramways Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. li.).

For the purpose of the argument it was admitted that the accident happened in the course of the working of the tramway.

It was contended by the defendants that the action was barred by the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), as it was not commenced within six months.

By that statute it is provided by sect. 1:

Where, after the commencement of this Act, any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect: (a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of, or, in case of a continuance of injury or damage, within six months next after the ceasing thereof.

Moses for the plaintiff.—The question raised here is whether the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 will avail the defendants when they are acting in the capacity as carriers of passengers and the proprietors of tramways. I submit that quid carriers of passengers they are not entitled to set up this statute. In Carpue v. London and Brighton Railway Company (5 Q. B. 747; D. & M. 608) the company by their Act, 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. cxix., were empowered to make the railway, to provide accommodation for the conveyance of passengers, and to make charges for such conveyance. It was further provided "that no action, suit, or information, or any other proceeding of what nature soever, shall be brought, commenced, or prosecuted against any person or corporation for anything done or omitted to be done in pursuance of this Act, or in the execution of the powers or authorities or any of the orders made, given, or directed in, by, or under this Act, unless twenty days' previous notice in writing has been given." An accident having happened owing to a carriage having been thrown off the rails and the plaintiff injured, it was held that no notice of action was necessary, the company being sued in their capacity of carriers and not for anything done or omitted under the special authority of the Act. He also referred to Palmer v. Grand Junction Railway Company, 4 M. & W. 749.

[CHANNELL, J. — The point seems to be this, whether when a statute empowers a public body such as this to carry on what is really a trading enterprise, the empowering them to do it thereby preventing it being ultra vires makes what they do things specified to be done in the execution of the Act.]

Doldy for the defendants.—These tramways were acquired by the county council out of the rates. They were equipped out of the rates and any liability for an accident must be met out of the rates. The defendants are, therefore, under a public duty with regard to the management of these tramways. He referred to

Ambler and Sons v. Bradford Corporation, 87 L. T. Rep. 217; (1902) 2 Ch. 585;

Chamberlain and Hookham Limited v. Bradford Corporation, 83 L. T. Rep. 518.

These cases show that if the work done by the public authority was the execution of a public duty or authority, negligence in carrying out that work would be within the protection afforded by the statute. He referred to

The Tramways Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 43;

London County Council Tramways Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. li.);

London Tramways Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. clxxxix.).

Under those Acts the defendants have power both to purchase and work these tramways. He referred to

Attorney-General v. Margate Pier and Harbour Company, 82 L. T. Rep. 448; (1900) 1 Ch. 749;

The Ydon, 81 L. T. Rep. 10; (1899) P. 236;

Markey v. Tolworth Isolation Hospital, 83 L. T. Rep. 28; (1900) 2 Q. B. 454.

There is a case in which the London County Council in exercising their tramway powers were PARKER v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

[K.B. Div.]

treated as being within the protection of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893. It is the case of North Metropolitan Tramway Company v. London County Council (78 L. T. Rep. 711; (1898) 2 Ch. 145). It was there held that the London County Council acting under their tramways Acts were entitled to have their costs taxed as between solicitor and client because they came within the statute. He also referred to

Smith v. Northleach Rural District Council, 85 L. T. Rep. 449; (1902) 1 Ch. 197;

Edwards v. St. Mary, Islington, 60 L. T. Rep. 725; 22 Q. B. Div. 338;

Carey v. Bermondsey Borough Council, 67 J. P. 447.

The defendants here in working these tramways, having regard to the private Acts to which I have referred, are under a public duty and are exercising a public authority. This failure—though it be a failure on the part of the driver of the tram—is just as much a neglect or default in the execution of such duty or authority as if the defendants had themselves neglected to provide a competent driver to drive the tram.

Moses in reply.

CHANNELL, J.—For a considerable portion of this argument I was inclined to think that there were grounds upon which I could decide this point in favour of the plaintiff; but I have now come to the conclusion that the matter is really concluded by authority, and that, whatever my opinion upon it may be, I am bound on the point that has been argued before me to give judgment for the defendants. Now, the facts are these: The London County Council have obtained under the combined operations of, I think I may say, several Acts of Parliament the power to acquire, and when acquired to work, certain tramways, and in particular a tramway somewhere in Tooting upon which this accident occurred, and the plaintiff brings his action in respect of an accident happening to him when a passenger upon the tramway. I think the negligence is alleged against the drivers of two tramcars. Now, the question is whether that is an action to which the protection of the Public Authorities Protection Act applies. The case of Attorney-General v. Margate Pier and Harbour Company (sup.), before Kekewich, J., shows, if it were necessary, and I think there are many other authorities which will show it also, that a tramway company would have no such protection; they would be a commercial carrying company just as a railway company does a business in which in one sense the public are to a certain extent interested in, because it is a public business. But it does not make them persons acting in the execution of statutory or other public duties when they are carrying on that business, although the public are interested in it. Here it is what I may call a municipal body that is carrying it on and the general principle in reference to matters that have to be paid for out of the rates is that each body of ratepayers for the time being should bear its own burdens, and that they should not be borrowing money without authority and putting the burden unfairly on posterity, nor should they leave their own things unpaid for in their own time in order that they might be paid for in after years. That is the reason why the Legislature may have given this sort of protection to anybody administering the rate; but I do not find anything of that sort in the words of the Act of Parliament, and although that may be a very good and practical reason why it should have been done, I myself do not go on that. In point of fact I think the Legislature, when they passed this Act of Parliament, was not contemplating the case of a municipal body carrying on a commercial enterprise at all. The question is, What is the effect of the words that they have used? Now, here the complaint is negligence in the course of working the tramway. I should have been inclined myself, but I think now I should have been wrong, no doubt, because I find that the contrary has been laid down by other learned judges, to have said that, although the municipal body might have the protection of this Act of Parliament in reference to matters which they did in the course of the construction of the works of making a tramway, or of laying down pipes, or interfering with the road for the purpose of doing either of those things, they would not have the protection of the Act merely in carrying on the work itself afterwards. It would not have been within these words "neglect or default in the execution of such duty or authority" merely because the act which they were doing was an act which would have been ultra vires unless there had been statutory authority for that body to do it. As I have said, I thought there was a great deal in that argument myself, but when I looked into the cases, a good many of which have a more or less indirect bearing upon it, to which I have been referred by Mr. Daldy, there is this particular case of The Ydon (81 L. T. Rep. 10; (1899) P. 236). It was an Admiralty case, and the municipal corporation had become a harbour authority, and had acquired the statutory power to take tolls, and their harbour master had been negligent, and his negligence had caused damage to a ship. The exact point that I have been considering was argued there, and the President in giving judgment said: "I cannot doubt that the corporation of Preston in carrying out under statutory authority its enterprise of the Ribble navigation, a water highway to Preston, acts as a public authority exercising a public duty as much as when it makes or maintains the land highways within the ambit of the municipality. I think, further, that the point is covered by authority." Then he refers to Harrop v. Mayor of Ossett (78 L. T. Rep. 387; (1898) 1 Ch. 525), North Metropolitan Tramways Company v. London County Council (78 L. T. Rep. 711; (1898) 2 Ch. 145), and Fielding v. Morley Corporation (79 L. T. Rep. 231; (1899) 1 Ch. 1), which he says "are instances in which this Act was held to apply to municipal corporations carrying out works outside the scope of strictly municipal duties. An endeavour was made before me to distinguish those decisions on the ground that they apply to the construction of works and not to the carrying out of a business by contract with private individuals. But I see no ground for this distinction. Whether a corporation is constructing a work or using it, whether, for example, it is building an aqueduct and laying pipes from it or supplying a consumer from the aqueduct by means of the piping, it appears to me to be equally engaged in executing the duties imposed upon it by Act of Parliament, and, though it may be asked why a corporation so acting should receive privileged advantages in litigation, I cannot doubt that the Act in question has conferred them." Now, that is the exact point in this case, and it was so held by the President of the Admiralty Division in that case. The case went to the Court of Appeal, and in that court the same arguments were addressed to the court by Mr. Robson, K.C., Mr. Carver, K.C. and Mr. Stokes, the counsel for the plaintiffs, and their argument was repeated to the effect that there was a distinction between the carrying on of works and the construction of them, but the Court of Appeal decided against them. Their Lordships do not in their judgment go fully into that particular distinction that was taken, but it must have been present to their minds, because it is put forward clearly in the arguments, and they decided that in a proceeding to recover damages for the negligence of the harbour master in admitting the ship into the harbour when there was not sufficient water for her, that that was a matter in which the municipal corporation were entitled to the protection of the statute, and it seems to me that that is a decision on the only point in regard to the matter on which I had any real doubt. The authorities to which Mr. Moyses has referred me are rather old. There are, of course, some points of law with regard to which the older the authority is the better, but in regard to some other points that is not so, and, with regard to these points about notice of action, statute of limitations, and public duties, and so on the law has been considerably altered within the last sixty years, I do not think anyone can doubt that, and, consequently an authority sixty years old is not so reliable as one in 1899. In that case there was an action brought against what was undoubtedly a trading company, and, according to the modern decisions, that would not have brought them within the protection of this Act of Parliament any more than if it came within the protection of the old Act of Parliament which was in existence at that time. I think, therefore, that I cannot regard that as an authority which prevents my acting on, or justifies me in not acting on, the recent authority in the Court of Appeal. On these grounds I think that I must hold that the defendants are entitled to the protection of this statute.

Judgment for the defendants.

JACKSON (app.) v. WIMBLEDON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (resps.). (a)

Public health—Drain on private ground—Draining several houses—Drain or sewer—"Single private drain"—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) s. 41—Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59) s. 19.

J. was the owner of twelve houses, at the rear of which runs a main or common drain with which each of the houses connects.

The sewage is conveyed from the main or common drain through a branch drain into the public sewer.

The sewage of four other houses, belonging to two other owners, is conveyed by the main or common drain, which also runs at the rear of those four houses, into the said branch drain.

Both the main or common drain and the branch drain are constructed wholly on private property, and it was admitted that the branch drain was a "single private drain" within the meaning of sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890.

Held, that the main or common drain running at the rear of J.'s houses was a sewer and was not a "single private drain" within sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act of 1890.

CASE stated on the hearing of a summons preferred by the respondents against the appellant for that he, the appellant, did on the 29th April 1903, or on some day or days within six months then last past, make default in payment of the sum of 35*l.* 1*s.* due and owing from the appellant to the respondents, being the amount of expenses incurred by the respondents in the execution of certain works in relaying the main drain at the rear of Nos. 51 to 73 (odd numbers), Hartfield-crescent, Wimbledon, and also did make default in payment of 13*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.*, being a proportion of the expenses incurred by the respondents in the execution of certain works in re-laying a single private drain, connecting No. 73, Hartfield-crescent and a certain other house, No. 75, Hartfield-crescent, belonging to a different owner, with a certain public sewer.

On the north side of Hartfield-crescent, in the respondents' district, are sixteen houses, numbered with odd numbers from 51 to 81, both inclusive. The appellant is the owner of twelve of the houses—namely, the houses numbered 51 to 73 inclusive. One Holliday is owner of the house No. 75, and a Mrs. Eysoldt is the owner of the three houses Nos. 77, 79, and 81.

At the rear of the sixteen houses runs a main or common drain, which is connected with the public sewer in Hartfield-crescent by a branch drain, which runs between the house numbered 73 and the house numbered 75 at about right angles to the road, under a narrow piece of land between the two houses, which is unbuilt upon. Each of the sixteen houses connects with the main drain or common drain by means of branch drains, which convey the sewage from each of the houses to the main or common drain, and thence through the branch drain into the public sewer in the Hartfield-crescent.

The plan set out below formed part of the case.

The main or common drain, from D to C, and the branch drain, B to A, are constructed wholly upon private property.

Part 3 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, which includes sect. 19 of the Act, has been adopted in the respondents' district.

On the 26th Nov. 1902 a written application was made by certain persons to the respondents acting as the local authority under the Public Health Act 1875, stating that the drains on or belonging to the premises Nos. 77 to 85 (odd numbers) inclusive, Hartfield-crescent, were a nuisance and injurious to health, and requesting the respondents,

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

in pursuance of the provisions of the Act, to empower their surveyor or inspector of nuisances to enter the premises with or without assistants, and cause the ground to be opened and examined after due notice to the occupiers of such premises.

Acting in pursuance of sect. 41 of the Act, the respondents, as such local authority, did, on the 10th Dec. 1902, by writing, empower their inspector of nuisances, after twenty-four hours' written notice to the occupiers of the premises, and such other premises as might be by him found necessary, to enter such premises with or without assistants and cause the ground to be opened and examine such drains.

In pursuance of such authority, the inspector of nuisances did open up the drains—namely, the drains at the rear of Nos. 77 to 85 (odd numbers) inclusive, Hartfield-crescent—after giving twenty-four hours' due notice to the occupiers of such premises, and upon such examination found that it was necessary for the drain at the rear of Nos. 75 and 51 to 73 (odd numbers) inclusive, Hartfield-crescent, to be also opened up and examined. Being empowered by the respondents to open up such other drains, the inspector, after due notice to the occupiers of Nos. 75 and 51 to 73 (odd numbers) inclusive, Hartfield-crescent aforesaid, did enter such premises and open up such drains.

The whole of the main or common drain appeared to be in a bad condition and to require alteration and amendment, and the inspector duly represented such fact to the respondents. The respondents, acting upon such representation, forthwith caused notice in writing to be given to the owners or occupiers of the sixteen houses, requiring them forthwith or within a reasonable time therein specified to do the necessary works.

The owners of the premises Nos. 75, 77, 79, and 81, Hartfield-crescent duly executed the works required by the respondents to their satisfaction so far as such works affected the main or common drain at the rear of their premises, but made default in executing the works required to the branch drain between the points A and B on the plan.

The appellant, as the owner of the houses Nos. 51 to 73 (odd numbers) inclusive, Hartfield-crescent, did not comply with such notice, but made default in executing the works so required to be done to the branch drain A and B, and the main or common drain between the points B and C, and the respondents duly executed such works, and their surveyor duly made an apportionment of the expenses of such works by apportioning the expense of the branch drain A and B amongst the owners of the sixteen houses—namely, upon the appellant in respect of his ownership of the houses Nos. 51 to 73 (odd numbers) inclusive, upon Holliday in respect of the ownership of the house No. 75, and upon Mrs. Eysoldt in respect of her ownership of the houses Nos. 77, 79, and 81, and also apportioned the cost of the works executed to the main or common drain at the rear of 51 to 73 (odd numbers) inclusive upon the appellant.

The appellant did not, within the required statutory period of three months, dispute such apportionment, and the same has now become binding and conclusive.

Formal demand was duly made by the respondents acting as the local authority on the appellant for payment of the sum of 35*l.* 1*s.*, being the amount of the apportionment in respect of the works executed to the main or common drain at the rear of 51 to 73 (odd numbers) inclusive, Hartfield-crescent, shown as between the point marked B and C on the plan, and the sum of 13*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.* as his proportion of the expenses of the works executed to the branch drain shown as between the points A and B on the plan.

The appellant made default in complying with such demand, and the respondents, on the 8th Aug. 1903, duly laid their complaint.

There was no dispute between the parties as to the amounts claimed by the respondents, and for the purpose of this case they were to be taken as agreed.

By sect. 41 of the Public Health Act 1875 it is provided that:

On the written application of any person to a local authority stating that any drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ash-pit, or cesspool, on or belonging to any premises within the district, is a nuisance or injurious to health (but not otherwise), the local authority may by writing empower their surveyor or inspector of nuisances, after twenty-four hours' written notice to the occupier of such premises, or in case of emergency without notice, to enter such premises with or without assistants, and cause the ground to be opened and examine such drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ash-pit, or cesspool. If the drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ash-pit, or cesspool on examination is found to be in proper condition, he shall cause the ground to be closed and any damage done to be made good as soon as can be, and the expenses of the works shall be defrayed by the local authority. If the drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ash-pit, or cesspool on examination shall appear to be in bad condition or to require alteration or amendment, the local authority shall forthwith cause notice in writing to be given to the owner or occupier of the premises requiring to forthwith or within a reasonable time therein specified to do the necessary works, and if such notice is not complied with the person to whom it is given shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 10*s.* for every day during which he continues to make default, and the local authority may, if they think fit, execute such works, and may recover in a summary manner from the owner the expenses incurred by them in so doing, or may by order declare the same to be private improvement expenses.

By sect. 4 of the Public Health Act 1875:

"Drain" means any drain of and used for drainage of one building only or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating therefrom with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed.

"Sewer" includes sewers and drains of every description except drains to which the word "drain" interpreted as aforesaid applies, and except drains vested in or under the control of any authority having the management of roads and not being a local authority under this Act.

By sect. 19, sub-sect. 1 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 it is provided that:

Where two or more houses belonging to different owners are connected to a public sewer by a single private drain an application may be made under sect. 41 of the Public Health Act 1875 (relating to complaints as to nuisances from drains), and the local authority may recover any expenses incurred by them in executing any works under the powers conferred on them by that section from the owners of the houses in such shares and proportions as shall be settled by their surveyor or in case of dispute by a court of summary jurisdiction.

K.B. DIV.] JACKSON (app.) v. WIMBLEDON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (resps.). [K.B. DIV.]

And by sub-sect. 3 it is provided that:

For the purposes of this section the expression "drain" includes a drain used for the drainage of more than one building.

The question for decision was whether, having regard to all the facts, the main or common drain, B to C, used for the drainage of houses Nos. 51 to 73 (odd numbers) inclusive, all of which houses belonged to the appellant, was a single private drain within the meaning of sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890.

At the hearing it was admitted on behalf of the appellant that the branch drain, A to B, was a "single" private drain within the meaning of sect. 19 of the Act of 1890, but it was contended on his behalf that the main or common drain, B to C, was a sewer within the meaning of sect. 4 of the Public Health Act 1875, and not a single private drain connecting two or more houses belonging to different owners with a public sewer within the meaning of sect. 19 of the Act of 1890.

The following cases were cited in support of these contentions:

Travis v. Uttley, 70 L.T. Rep. 242; (1894) 1 Q. B. 233;

A to B.—Branch drain from houses belonging to Mrs. Eysoldt (77 to 81), Mr. Holliday (75), and Mr. Jackson (51 to 73).

B to C.—Drain from Mr. Jackson's houses.

B to D.—Drain from Mrs. Eysoldt's and Mr. Holliday's houses.

Sylvain Mayer for the appellant.—It is contended by the respondents that B to C is a single private drain within sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890. It is really a sewer, for, so far as this portion of the main or common drain is concerned, it does not connect two or more houses belonging to different owners with the public sewer. It is not, therefore, a single private drain within the meaning of that section. Sect. 4 of the Public Health Act 1875 is also in my favour. If the contention of the respondents is correct there would be no sewers left. He referred to

Bradford v. Mayor of Eastbourne, 74 L.T. Rep. 762; (1896) 2 Q. B. 205;

Reg. v. Mayor of Hastings, 75 L.T. Rep. 377; (1897) 1 Q. B. 46.

Macmorran, K.C. (George Humphreys with him) for the respondents.—Apart from the Public

Self v. Hove Commissioners, 72 L.T. Rep. 234; (1895) 1 Q. B. 685;

Bradford v. Mayor of Eastbourne, 74 L.T. Rep. 762; (1896) 2 Q. B. 205;

Kershaw v. Taylor, 73 L.T. Rep. 274; (1895) 2 Q. B. 471;

Holland v. Lazarus, 66 L.J. 285, Q. B.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that it was necessary to have regard to the entire system of drainage discharging into the public sewer at the end of the branch drain nearest the public sewer, marked A, and that such system of drainage comprehends the drainage of the whole of the sixteen houses, Nos. 51 to 81 (odd numbers) inclusive, Hartfield-crescent, which houses belong to different owners, and form, in fact, one entire drain connecting the whole of the sixteen houses with the public sewer, and that, therefore, the main or common drain, D to C, behind all the sixteen houses, and the branch drain, B to A, are capable of being dealt with under sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 as a single private drain within the meaning of that section. Seal v. Merthyr Tydfil Urban District Council (77 L.T. Rep. 303; (1897) 2 Q. B. 543) was cited on behalf of the respondents.

The justices decided in favour of the contention of the respondents.

Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, the entire system is a system of sewers. That statute did not alter what was a drain or a sewer, but merely made the owners liable for the repairs to a "single private drain" which connected two or more houses belonging to different owners with a public sewer. For the purposes of sect. 19 of the Act of 1890 a "drain" includes a drain used for the drainage of more than one building, and so for that purpose a sewer may be a "drain." He referred to Bradford v. Mayor of Eastbourne (sup.), judgment of Wille, J., at p. 215.

The facts of this case would lead to an absurdity unless the contention of the respondents is the right one. There cannot be a sewer leading into a single private drain and then into a sewer. These drains are made by the statute single private drains because they are on private ground, and the public authority cannot get at them. The case of Reg. v. Mayor of Hastings (sup.) is not in point, and the decision there does not affect this case.

Mayer in reply referred to

Seal v. Merthyr Tydfil Urban District Council, 77 L. T. Rep. 303; (1897) 2 Q. B. 543.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I hope that the day will arrive when no question can arise as to what is a sewer and what is a drain. Really, the difficulty of dealing with these questions is such, and the courts have had such difficulty that one does hope that something may be done in the way of a declaratory Act or an amending Act to put these questions beyond the range of discussion. The difficulty probably arises, and the difficulty in legislating probably arose, from the fact that here you are applying modern provisions as to sanitation and repairs of drains to old methods of drainage that have been built up under all kinds of systems. Now, the main proposition for which Mr. Macmorran contends is this: Once get sect. 19 of the Act of 1890 to apply, you are entitled to go back to the end of all the drains and sewers—for this purpose I will call them drains so as not to beg the question—that connect with your private drains, and to bring them all within the purview of sect. 41 of the Act of 1875. I think stated in that way the proposition goes too far. I have had a great deal of trouble in this case by reason of the fact that it is admitted that from A to B is a single private drain within sect. 19, and therefore in respect to that part of it, at any rate, proceedings could be taken under sect. 41. But I think that the main contention of Mr. Macmorran goes too far. It does not follow that you can be entitled to go to the end of every pipe and say that they are all of them private drains because they happen to connect. One can put a number of cases, although I do not know that very much light is thrown by trying to put cases. But it does seem to me, to take one case, that if that were so, a person who was in possession of an undoubted sewer, or through whose land there went a sewer, the obligation of repairing such sewer having fallen upon the local authority, might be deprived of those rights by the action of third persons without his consent at all. Therefore I think the proposition is too wide. Under these circumstances what is the real question we have to decide? From C to B, it is admitted, would be a sewer within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1875 if it had discharged into a sewer at the point B, or if it had been connected by a pipe (which was not a single private drain) which ran from the point B into the sewer. At first I was inclined to think it was difficult to contend that a sewer could communicate with a single private drain, but, after the consideration this case undergone and the argument that has been addressed to us, I think that that view of mine was not well founded and went too far. The scheme, as far as one can see there is a scheme of legislation, originally provided that where there was a drain which drained more than two houses or more than two buildings within the definition (sect. 4 of the Public Health Act 1875) it became a sewer because it was not a drain. I can well imagine that there may be a structure, as in this case, dealing with a long row of houses as to which it could not be denied that they would be sewers. They do in fact empty on both sides in this case into that which, for this purpose, must be taken as being a single private drain. I do not think that the admission of a single private drain ought to be construed as being an admission that the whole of it is a single private drain, because whatever may have been the reasons for the admission, or however it came to be made, the point was distinctly raised that from C to B was a sewer. Does sect. 19 of the Act of 1890, which enables the local authority to apply sect. 41 of the Act of 1875, involve the proposition and enable one to say that, because that you find that there is a single private drain, the connections with that must be part of the single private drain, and are to be so regarded? As I have already pointed out, that might involve the loss of rights and the change of obligations which undoubtedly existed prior to the Act of 1890, and it would require clear and distinct words in order to bring about that result. The words of sect. 19 are: "Where two or more houses, belonging to different owners, are connected with a public sewer by a single private drain." I am fully conscious of the difficulty of understanding what was meant by a single private drain, having regard to the fact that if a drain does drain two houses it would become a sewer by virtue of the Public Health Act 1875. But at the same time the Legislature, I think, certainly did not mean to sweep away the distinction between a drain and a sewer for all purposes in that particular case, nor does Mr. Macmorran contend that. He says that for some purposes the distinction will remain. If it deals with nuisance and repair, I do not know what there is substantial left beyond ventilation, which Mr. Macmorran referred to. At any rate, it seems to me that the purview of the section is to confine the operation of sect. 41 to that which is a single private drain, and I point out that in the case which has been of great assistance to us and which certainly discussed the matter more carefully than any other case that I know—I mean the case of Bradford v. Mayor of Eastbourne (74 L. T. Rep. 762; (1896) 2 Q. B. 295)—it was not contended in the case, nor was it any part of the decision, that the obligations and rights extended to more than that it was a single private drain in fact. It was not any part of that decision to decide that that which was connected with a single private drain must of necessity have been a single private drain itself, or part of it. I cannot help thinking that the language of the most careful judgment (if he will permit me to say so) of my brother Wills rather excludes the idea that the matter was in any way considered by the court beyond the particular question as to what was the meaning of "a single private drain" under sect. 19 of the Act of 1890. Therefore I think that we are entitled, notwithstanding the admission, to say that that which was a sewer may still remain to be a sewer, and that the fact that it connects with a single private drain does not make a difference. It would have been a sewer had it connected with the main sewer by means of that which was itself a sewer, or by a continuation of its own pipe. I do not think the fact that it does happen to pour out into a single private drain between the points A B, and thereby gets to the sewer, makes any difference for the purpose of deciding what is the character of the pipe which runs from C to B. Of course, in this case Mr. Macmorran says you find a private drain; you find the different owners, and therefore a case under sect. 19 arises. I think that is perfectly true so far as the portion of the pipe or conduit is concerned which is found to be a single private drain into which the other drains or sewers may connect; but I can see no reason why a sewer should not connect with the single private drain and then with another sewer. For these reasons, which I admit are difficult to express clearly, having regard to the difficulty of the subject, I have come to the conclusion that the magistrates were wrong in coming to the conclusion that the portion of the drain or conduit between C and B was a drain within the meaning of the Public Health Act and not a sewer; and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I have come to the same conclusion, though with considerable difficulty, because it seems to me that to reconcile sect. 19 of the Act of 1890 with the general legislation on this subject is a work of extreme difficulty. The court of which I was a member attempted to do it in the Eastbourne case, and I think, so far as the Eastbourne case was concerned, the attempt was not altogether unsuccessful. But now it comes to be applied to a different set of circumstances, and that brings one to a fresh difficulty and one as to which the considerations of policy appear to me to be pretty evenly balanced; so there is a very great difficulty in saying that there is any particular reason why one should incline to one class of construction rather than another for reasons of public convenience or general policy. What appears to me to be the determining factor really is that when you come to look at sect. 19 and suppose that it does apply to what has happened in this case, the facts which are disclosed in this case would seem to, prima facie, bring us to say that this was a case in which—under certain circumstances, at all events—sect. 19 might apply, because there are two or more houses which belong to different owners—namely, those on the right-hand side and those on the left-hand side of the passage-way through which A to B is carried. They are connected with the public sewer by that single private drain A B, and then one has got to see when that is granted what the consequences are those being the facts. The consequences are that application may be made under sect. 41 of the principal Act, and, when you return to sect. 41, I think it is very clear that the drain in respect of which complaint is to be made and the drain in respect of which the local authority has the power of calling upon the owner to do the work, and may do it themselves if the owner does not do it, is the same in each case. If that is the case, then, inasmuch as the obstruction did not lie between A and B, sect. 41 would not apply. There seems to be a certain sort of intelligent groundwork for such a view in this consideration, that if the obstruction does arise between A and B, generally speaking, it is almost impossible to say which of the various effluents which meet in A and B is the one that does the mischief, and therefore it is reasonable enough that the expense of putting things right should be shared amongst all the people who use A and B. That, of course, does not apply when you are dealing with B to C, because from B to C the other houses which are necessary to bring in the operation of sect. 19 of the Act of 1890 do not come in at all, and because, excepting for the purposes of sect. 19, from B to C is undoubtedly a sewer. I do not say that these reasons are satisfactory. I very much doubt whether completely satisfactory reasons could be given for any decision any way upon any question almost of those which have come under my notice under this sect. 19; but I think, upon the whole, for the reasons which I have mentioned, that the decision which my Lord has announced is the correct one.

KENNEDY, J.—I think so too. I quite agree that it is very difficult to come to any satisfactory solution of the difficulties which are presented on one side or the other in connection with this case; but it seems to me that the least difficult is the one which my Lord has presented. I will only add just this: The section which is invoked by the respondents here is sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890. To what does that relate? To put it shortly, it relates to the rights or duties of repairing and of bearing expense connected with a single private drain which connects two or more houses belonging to different owners with a sewer. Does any portion of B to C—that is what we have got to deal with—fulfil that condition? Clearly not. B to C is a complete length, which would be a sewer and repairable by the public authority for the whole distance, because it is a length of conveyance of sewage—to avoid the words “drain” and “sewer”—not from different owners but from the same owner. Does A to B satisfy it? I think myself it does, and no question arises as to A to B. There from B to A you have got the different owners; you have got them connected by what certainly may be described as a single private drain. Does the fact then that A to B may be a single private drain and does collect from houses owned by different persons, carry with it, so to speak, the right to treat as a single private drain within the section a tract, I will call it, or a range of drainage which clearly does satisfy it, and the connection of which at B is one of the elements, but one which by itself would be insufficient to make A B a single private drain. A B only becomes a single private drain because of the connection with different houses which is involved in the connection of B not only with B C, but with B D. It seems to me that that is the most simple because the most natural explanation of the words, and also the one which on the whole least conflicts with the consideration that arises from the fact that this is an amending Act, and has to be read with the provisions of the earlier legislation, which undoubtedly did protect the private owner in respect of these things.

Appeal allowed.

REID v. MACBETH AND GRAY.

House of Lords.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury), Lords MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, and LINDLEY.)

REID v. MACBETH AND GRAY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE FIRST DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND.

Sale of goods—Materials for ship in course of construction—Bankruptcy of shipbuilder—Property in goods.

A firm of shipbuilders contracted to build a ship for the respondents, to be classed 100 A 1 at Lloyd's, and built under their superintendence. The contract contained a clause to the effect that "The vessel as she is constructed, and all her engines, boilers, and machinery, and all materials from time to time intended for her or them, whether in the building yard, workshop, river, or elsewhere, shall immediately as the same proceeds become the property of the purchasers, and shall not be within the ownership, control, or disposition of the builders, but the builders shall at all times have a lien thereon for their unpaid purchase money." The contract further provided that in default of delivery it should be competent for the owners to take possession of the vessel, and of all materials intended for her, and to complete her themselves. Before the vessel was completed the shipbuilders became bankrupt. At the date of the bankruptcy there was in the shipbuilding yard a quantity of plates intended for use in the construction of the ship. They had been passed by Lloyd's surveyor at the makers' works, and had been marked with the number of the ship for which they were intended, and with the position which they were to occupy in her. They had been seen in the shipbuilding yard by the shipowners so marked, but had not been specially inspected or approved by them.

Held, that the case was governed by the decision in Seath v. Moore (54 L. T. Rep. 690; 11 App. Cas. 350), and was not affected by the Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), and that the trustees in the bankruptcy was entitled to the plates as against the shipowners.

Judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland reversed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland (the Lord President (Balfour) and Lords Adam, McLaren, and Kinnear), reported 41 Sc. L. Rep. 369, who had reversed a judgment of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Low), considering themselves bound by a decision of the Second Division of the court in an action between the same parties, reported 4 F. 345; 39 Sc. L. Rep. 188.

The question was whether Robert Reid, trustee of the sequestrated estate of Carmichael, Maclean, and Co., shipbuilders, Greenock, or Macbeth and Gray, shipowners, Glasgow, were entitled to a sum of 1957*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* being the value of certain materials purchased by Carmichael, Maclean, and Co., from Young and Alexander, iron merchants, Glasgow, to be used in the construction of a steamship, which Carmichael, Maclean, and Co. had contracted to build for Macbeth and Gray.

Young and Alexander also claimed the sum in question on the ground that the materials, of which the price had not been paid, had been stopped by them in transitu, but that claim was repelled by the Lord Ordinary, and was not now insisted on.

The sole question, therefore, was whether the trustee of the sequestrated estate of the builders, or the shipowners for whom the ship was being built, had right to the sum in question.

By art. 4 of the agreement for the building of the ship, entered into between Carmichael, Maclean, and Co. and Macbeth and Gray, dated the 27th Oct. 1898, it was provided that:

The vessel, as she is constructed, and all her engines, boilers, and machinery, and all materials from time to time intended for her or them, whether in the building yard, workshop, river, or elsewhere, shall immediately as the same proceeds become the property of the purchasers, and shall not be within the ownership, control, or disposition of the builders, but the builders shall at all times have a lien thereon for their unpaid purchase money.

And by art. 5 it was declared that:

In the event of the builders making default in the prosecution of the construction of the vessel, engines, boilers, and machinery, or making default in her delivery by the date stipulated, it shall be competent for (but not incumbent upon) the purchasers to take possession of the vessel in her then state, and of all her engines, boilers, and machinery, and all materials intended for her or them as before mentioned, and to complete the vessel.

To enable them to build the steamship in question, Carmichael, Maclean, and Co. entered into a contract with Young and Alexander for the requisite quantities of iron or steel materials. By this contract the place of delivery was stated to be "free on trucks, Greenock," and the materials were sent to Greenock by railway, intimation of their arrival being made to Carmichael, Maclean, and Co., whose storekeeper went to the station and selected the portions which were immediately required. These were sent on to the shipbuilding yard, and the remainder were allowed to remain in the station yard until they were needed.

The superintendent engineer in the employment of Macbeth and Gray visited Carmichael, Maclean, and Co.'s yard and saw the materials there. It was his custom to go round the yard from time to time for this purpose.

He stated that when he was shown the materials he saw that No. 29 (the number of the steamship) was painted or otherwise marked upon them, and that the places which they were to occupy in the ship were also so marked, and that he also saw the materials which were lying at the station.

It further appeared that the materials were examined and passed by Lloyd's surveyor before they came to the shipbuilders' yard or the station, having been tested by him at the mills at which they were made before being sent out.

In his judgment the Lord Ordinary said that it was admitted that the question raised in the present appeal would be ruled by the ultimate decision in another case then pending, in which the question was whether the property in the materials which had been taken into the shipbuilding yard had passed to Macbeth and Gray under the same contract as that under which the present question was raised, and this question was decided in the affirmative by the Second Division of the court.

Ure, K.C. (of the Scotch Bar) and Loehnis appeared for the appellant, and contended that, though the court below had considered themselves bound to follow the judgment of the Second Division, the case was really indistinguishable from that of Seath v. Moore (54 L. T. Rep. 690; 11 App. Cas. 350). The contract was for the sale of a completed ship. They also referred to

The Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71) does not affect the case.

The Lord Advocate (Scott Dickson, K.C. of the Scotch Bar) and Muir Mackenzie, for the respondents, argued that Seath v. Moore and the other cases cited were distinguishable. Here the course of business implies that the property passed to the respondents when the materials were passed by Lloyd's surveyor, which brings the case within the Sale of Goods Act 1893. Ure, K.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case I think that I might say that the question is covered by authority for a reason which I will give in a moment, but, looking at it as if it were res integra, I think that the difficulty in the way of the Lord Advocate is that in my view there is no sale at all in this contract except the sale of a complete ship. I think that the observations made by the learned counsel for the appellant are very cogent, that those articles upon which reliance has been placed—namely, arts. 4 and 5—lack every element of sale of these things. What they do I will say a word upon in a moment, but there is no sale of these things. It is an abuse of language to speak of these sections as a sale of things to which they refer. My own view of those sections is that they were intended by the parties to form a security. I daresay it was an ineffectual attempt by the parties to form a security, but that which is sold is a complete ship. The whole foundation of the judgment at which I invite your Lordships to arrive is that there is no sale of these things at all; the only thing sold is the ship. It seems to me rather an extraordinary, and I think I may say an incomprehensible, view that the inspection by Lloyd's of the materials is an acceptance by the buyer of the ship of those particular things which are to form portions of the ship when sold. There is no such provision in the contract; there is nothing in the relation of the parties which to my mind suggests the agency of Lloyd's as taking the place of the person who is to act on behalf of the purchaser. It is said that, simply because Lloyd's in the management of their business think it right to say that they will not give a certificate that a ship is A 1 at Lloyd's without themselves having an opportunity of inspecting and passing materials of which the ship is to consist, therefore the person who contracts that he will supply a ship A 1 at Lloyd's thereby places Lloyd's in the position of a person who is entitled to act on the purchaser's behalf as inspector and ascertainer, if I may so describe him, of those goods which are to form the ship in the ultimate result. It appears to me to be a most monstrous proposition, and, if there were nothing more, I should say that it was a proposition for which no authority is to be found. But further than that, in the very contract in which the ship, being A 1 at Lloyd's, is the thing sold by one party and accepted by the other, other persons representing the purchaser are to have rights inconsistent with the idea that Lloyd's certificate of these different plates would be a conclusive acceptance on the part of the purchaser of the ship of the goodness of the quality of the material. I think that of itself would be sufficient to dispose of the case, but, as I said just now, I think that the matter is really concluded by authority, because your Lordships' House has had before it in the case of Seath v. Moore (54 L. T. Rep. 690; 11 App. Cas. 350) a contract which it would be vain to attempt to distinguish from that in the present case. The only distinction, as I understand it, which is insisted upon is this, that what was there in five contracts is here in one. It is said that a different view would have been taken by the noble and learned Lords who decided that case if, instead of being in five different contracts, it had all been on the same piece of paper. I cannot find the least foundation for that in any part of the judgments delivered by their Lordships in that case; and what seems to me to be absolutely conclusive, and to cover the case now before your Lordships, is what Lord Watson said in Seath v. Moore: "There is another principle which appears to me to be deducible from these authorities, and to be in itself sound, and that is that materials provided by the builder, and portions of the fabric, whether wholly or partially finished, although intended to be used in the execution of the contract, cannot be regarded as appropriated to the contract, or as 'sold,' unless they have been affixed to, or in a reasonable sense made part of, the corpus." It seems to me, considering that Lord Watson was dealing with a contract substantially the same as that which we are considering, that it would be an extraordinary thing if your Lordships were to depart from the principles there laid down. Accordingly, as I am of opinion that there was no sale here at all of these materials as distinguished from a contract of sale of the ship, and that there was no acceptance of these materials in any sense which can be relied upon, except in a sense which, as I have said, is inapplicable to the purpose—namely, the certificate of Lloyd's as to the goodness of the materials—it seems to me, with all respect to the learned judges who have decided the case in the court below, that their decision was wrong, and ought to be reversed, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

REID v. MACBETH AND GRAY.

[H. OF L.]

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I think that the case is governed by the decision in Seath v. Moore, and, so far as it may not be governed by that case, I entirely agree with the reasons which have been given by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: I put the same construction upon the contract which is before your Lordships as the Lord Chancellor has put upon it, and I need not repeat what he has said upon that head. I will only add this to what he has said with regard to art. 4, as to the expression about which we heard so much in the course of the argument, "as the same proceeds." I think that "the same" must mean either "as the ship proceeds," or "as the construction of the ship proceeds"; but, whether you put the one or the other of these meanings upon the words, it is clear that, whatever else may be obscure in this 4th article, the goods in question are not to become the property of the purchaser except as the construction of the ship proceeds. From that I should certainly understand, as I think was the view of the Lord Ordinary, that, according to the true construction of the article, it was only when the chattels in question were applied for the use of the ship, and became part of the structure of the ship, that it was intended that those words vesting the property should operate. But, quite independently of that question, supposing that the construction contended for by the Lord Advocate were correct, I still think that it would be impossible to uphold the judgment. I entirely agree with what has been said as to the decision in Seath v. Moore, and upon that I would merely add that the only suggestion which I heard by which an attempt was made in any way to get rid of the authority of that case was that at that time the Sale of Goods Act 1893 had not been passed. I am unable to see in that any solid ground for distinguishing the case. At the time, as was pointed out in the judgments, although a contract of sale created, according to the law of Scotland, only a jus ad rem against the goods until delivery, still, having regard to the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which was then in force, the distinction was only a question of words, and not of substance. But I turn to the Sale of Goods Act, and I find that the material sections are those referred to by the learned judges of the Second Division—namely, sects. 16, 17, and 18. I will read only sect. 16, which seems to me to be the material one: "Where there is a contract for the sale of unascertained goods, no property in the goods is transferred to the buyer unless and until the goods are ascertained"; and then in rule 5 of sect. 18 it says, "Where there is a contract for the sale of unascertained or future goods by description," and so forth, the property in the goods passes to the buyer on ascertainment by the buyer and the seller. It appears to me that those sections have no application whatever to the case before your Lordships, for the simple reason which was mentioned by the Lord Chancellor, that here there was no contract for the purchase of these materials. The learned counsel, and also the learned judges in the court below, seem to me to have proceeded on the supposition or hypothesis that this contract contained not only a contract for the purchase of the ship, but a separate contract for the purchase of the materials also; and that seems to me to be a complete fallacy. There is only one contract, a contract for the purchase of the ship. There is no contract for the sale or purchase of these materials, and, unless you can find a contract for the sale of these chattels within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act, it appears to me that the sections of that Act have no application whatever to the case. I think, therefore, that the case is exactly covered by the decision given by your Lordships' House in the case of Seath v. Moore, and I will only express my entire concurrence in the judgments given in that case by those very learned Lords, Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson.

LORD ROBERTSON.—My Lords: I have only to add that I cannot find in this contract any contract to buy materials, or to buy anything except a completed ship. Art. 4 seems to me to fall exactly within sect. 61, sub-sect. 4, of the Sale of Goods Act 1893—that is to say, it "is intended to operate by way of mortgage, pledge, charge, or other security." The circumstance that it is inserted in what is a sale of a completed ship will not avail to make it a sale in the sense of the Sale of Goods Act 1893. In fact art. 4 does not even purport to express a sale. It merely asserts that to be the property of the purchaser of the ship which has no more relation to it than that it was intended by the builder for the ship. That as it stands is impossibly wide, and I agree with your Lordships that the respondents' attempt to make those materials "specific" in the sense of the Sale of Goods Act, by saying that they had been passed by Lloyd's surveyor, is not warranted by the terms of the contract. The reference to Lloyd's in the first article cannot be strained to this extent. The truth is that art. 4 is simply a bold attempt to sweep into the net the whole of the materials required for the ship. The judgments of this House in Seath v. Moore negative the possibility of that being legally done.

LORD LINDLEY.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion, and cannot usefully add anything.

MOORE v. BISHOP OF OXFORD. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE CONSISTORY COURT OF THE DIOCESE OF OXFORD.

Ecclesiastical law—Clergy Discipline Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 32)—Immoral habit of swearing and ribaldry.

The occasional use of objectionable language by a clergyman, under circumstances of great provocation, upon rare occasions extending over a period of three years :

Held, not to amount to an immoral habit "of swearing and ribaldry" within the meaning of the Clergy Discipline Act 1892.

Judgment of the court below reversed.

APPEAL by a beneficed clergyman in the Diocese of Oxford from a decision of the Consistory Court of the diocese convicting him under the Clergy Discipline Act 1892 in respect of alleged immoral intercourse with a woman of the name of Johnson, and of an immoral habit of swearing and ribaldry.

Duke, K.C. and Cecil Walsh appeared for the appellant.

Acland, K.C. and Snagge for the respondent.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—Their Lordships are of opinion that the main charge in this case has broken down. The statements of the only witness who is relied upon for the purpose of proving the charge are, in the opinion of their Lordships, uncorroborated by any conduct, act, or proof, and their Lordships are unable to concur with the Consistory Court in thinking that there is any corroboration by the correspondence or otherwise in favour of the accusation which has been made. Apart from any technical rule upon the subject, it would be a most dangerous thing for any court to allow an accusation of this sort to prevail when there is no corroboration; and probably no court would be induced to do so. In those circumstances their Lordships think it impossible to confirm the finding that the evidence of the witness, uncorroborated as it is, and discredited by her own version of the transaction, can be accepted as conclusive against the clergyman whom she accuses. With regard to the other charge, of having been "habitually guilty of swearing and ribaldry," there is a body of evidence relating to three or four occasions, which undoubtedly establishes (as the court below has found) that on those occasions language was used which certainly could not be defended, the use of which would be disgraceful to anybody, whether clergyman or layman. But the question upon this part of the case is, whether the defendant was, or was not, guilty of the charge made—and properly made—in pursuance of the Clergy Discipline Act 1892, s. 2, which speaks of a clergyman "alleged to have been guilty of any immoral act, immoral conduct, or immoral habit," the words "immoral habit" being the words contained in the charge. Where on occasions of considerable provocation words are used however discreditable and disgraceful to the person who used them—and certainly no words could be too severe in condemnation of language such as that found to have been used by the appellant, even allowing for exaggeration in the views of some of the witnesses who used such words themselves, and attributed them to the appellant—yet the question would still remain whether or not, the clergyman having been proved in circumstances of provocation to have used such words on three or four occasions in the course of three years, it is true to say that he is guilty of the offence contemplated by the statute. The use of language of that sort can hardly be described as an "immoral act" in the sense in which that term is used in the Clergy Discipline Act. Immoral conduct and immoral habit are probably the same thing. What is charged—and in their Lordships' opinion properly charged in accordance with the statute—is that the appellant has "during the past five years been guilty of offences against the laws ecclesiastical (being offences against morality within the meaning of the Clergy Discipline Act 1892) in that he had habitually been guilty of swearing and ribaldry." Their Lordships certainly do not mean to give any countenance to the supposed innocence of the use of such words, even on special occasions of extraordinary provocation. As has been already said, no words are too severe to condemn such language. But the view which their Lordships entertain is that the offence contemplated by the statute—namely, of being habitually guilty of swearing and ribaldry—is not made out. Even although the appellant may have sometimes used such language, it is not established that he has been habitually guilty of such conduct. The evidence is spread over a period of three years, and the suggestion on the appellant's behalf is that objectionable language was only used on rare occasions of great provocation. Under these circumstances their Lordships are of opinion that the appeal ought to be allowed with respect to both charges. It is satisfactory to their Lordships to find that the views which they entertain are shared by the most reverend and right reverend prelates who have been good enough to give them their assistance on this occasion. Their Lordships desire to add that they entirely concur in the observation of the learned counsel for the appellant that, under the circumstances, the Bishop of Oxford could not have taken any other course in this case than that which he has pursued. The result, therefore, is that their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty to allow the appeal, but under the circumstances their Lordships feel that it is not a case in which costs should be given, and there will, therefore, be no order as to costs on either side, either before this board or in the court below.

Re SUSSEX BRICK COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

*Company—Registration of transfer of shares—Unreasonable delay—Reconstruction of company
—Date on which transfer to be treated as registered—Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 35, 161.*

The court has power under sect. 35 of the Companies Act 1862 to rectify the register of members after the liquidation of the company has commenced; and such power is not limited by sect. 98 to rectification for the purpose of settling the list of contributories.

Where there had been unnecessary delay in registering a transfer of shares, and in consequence it had not been registered when the company went into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of reconstruction under sect. 161 of the Companies Act 1862, the court, on the application of the transferee, ordered the transfer to be registered as of a date prior to the winding-up, which rendered valid a notice of dissent given by the transferee under sect. 161 after the date on which the transfer ought to have been, but was not, registered.

Re Joint Stock Discount Company; Nation's case (15 L. T. Rep. 308; L. Rep. 3 Eq. 77) followed.

APPLICATION by the transferor and transferees of certain shares in the Sussex Brick Company to have the register of shareholders rectified by putting the names of the transferees on the register in place of that of the transferor on the ground that the change had not been made in consequence of unnecessary delay on the part of the company.

The facts appear sufficiently in the judgment of Buckley, J., delivered the 30th July 1903.

BUCKLEY, J.—This is an application in which Belcher, the transferor, and Brown and Pollock, the transferees, of two blocks of shares, all concur in seeking, to put it shortly, to obtain a rectification of the register by putting the trans-ferees' names on in lieu of that of the trans-feror. The shares are all fully paid. On the 12th March 1903 there was sent by Brown, one of the transferees, a transfer which is dated the 3rd March for 17,234 shares. He sent the certificate and the transfer, and asked for an acknowledgment and a new certificate. On the 14th March the secretary wrote in reply sending a receipt.
The reply is simply: "Herewith inclosed please find transfer receipt 17,234 shares in the company from Belcher's name to Brown and Pollock."
That was marked in the corner, "One inclosure."
Unfortunately that inclosure is not forthcoming, but it is what is called a transfer receipt. I have the form of it because I have it as regards the other transfer. It bears in print at the foot:

"Certificate in exchange for this receipt will be ready about (blank)." From a subsequent letter it would seem that that must have been so filled in as to read thus: "Certificate in exchange for this receipt will be ready about the 28th inst"—that is, the 28th March. On the 27th March Brown wrote and sent to the secretary a letter inclosing the certificate of 5000 other fully-paid shares, and the transfer of them which had been executed as long ago as Jan. 1901, and asked for a new certificate of those shares. On the 1st April the secretary wrote back saying: "As you are aware the books have been closed until after the meeting to-morrow."
That would be the 2nd, and I infer that means they would be open again on the 3rd April. On the 4th Brown writes again: "As we presume the books of the company are now open, we shall be glad to receive reply to our letter of 27th ult," which was the letter I mentioned before.
On the 4th the secretary writes acknowledging the receipt of the transfer for the 5000 shares, and stating that he would place it before the directors at the next board meeting, "when a certificate will be made out and signed and forwarded to you." On the 4th Brown wrote again acknowledging receipt of that letter, and saying:
"You do not, however, say anything about the 17,234 shares the receipt for which we inclose, and the certificate for which was to have been ready 28th ult. May we take it that this certicate will be sent to us with the others?" On the 7th the secretary writes again: "In reply to yours of the 4th, the transfers of 17,234 shares will be placed before the directors together with the transfer of the 5000 at their next board for registration, and when registered I will forward the certificate to you. Formal receipt for the 5000 shares herewith inclosed." That is the document
I referred to just now, and that has at the foot
"A certificate in exchange for this receipt will be ready about the 27th inst." So that the transaction throughout was this: Fully-paid shares, no possible objection to registering the transfer, and no objection is suggested or raised, but the reply which is always made is, "At our next board meeting the matter will be carried through, and you shall have your certificate back." In fact on the 2nd April the company passed a resolution for voluntary liquidation, and on the 20th it was confirmed. I will take the two transfers separately. The transfer sent in on the 12th March should have been before the board which was held on the 21st March, and it was not brought before that board. Why it was not, I do not know; there was no reason why it should not be. The only reason suggested is that the secretary had resigned, and there had been a new secretary. The new secretary ought to have informed himself of what was going on, and the matter ought to have been brought before the board. The next transfer, which was lodged on the 27th March, was after the date of that board meeting, but according to the letters which passed it would have been in the ordinary course of the company's business to have convened a board which would have passed the transfer and issued a new certificate. Before the 27th April—viz., on the 20th—the company was wound up. I suppose the fact is at that particular time a voluntary liquidation being in contemplation the board was not meeting as regularly as it otherwise would have met, and there was a delay occasioned by that. I do not say an improper delay, but a delay in point of fact, and the transfers ought to have been registered, I think, before the winding-up on the 20th April. However, they have not been registered, and the application now is, the company being in liquidation, to register them notwithstanding the winding-up. Under sect. 131 of the Companies Act 1862 no doubt the sanction of the liquidator is required for the registration of a transfer, but I have power under sect. 198, coupled with 138, to rectify the register, notwithstanding the winding-up, if I think there has been improper delay. It seems to me there has been a delay under sect. 35, and these transfers ought to be registered. I therefore make the order for rectification of the register by substituting the names of the transferees for that of the transferor, and the company must pay the costs.

(a) Reported by W. C. Biss, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

His Lordship, having refused to order the register to be rectified by dating the transfer as of an earlier date than the date of his order, the transferees appealed, asking that the order might be varied by providing that the rectification of the company's register should have effect as regarded the 17,234 shares as at and from the 20th March 1903, and as regarded the 5000 shares as at and from the 4th April 1903.

Muir Mackenzie for the appellants.—The order of Buckley, J. does not go far enough. He orders the register to be rectified as of the date of his order, instead of nunc pro tunc as in Re Joint Stock Discount Company; Nation's case (15 L. T. Rep. 308; L. Rep. 3 Eq. 77). The registration of these transfers ought to date as from the date when they ought to have been registered. The effect on the appellants of the order of Buckley, J. is serious. Under this voluntary winding-up there was a scheme of reconstruction, and the appellants object to that scheme and desire, under sect. 161 of the Companies Act 1862, to give notice dissenting from it, which would give them the right to have their holding in the company valued, and the value paid to them. But not being on the register their notice was ineffectual, and the transferor has given no such notice. Under sect. 161 that notice must be given by a member of the company within seven days after the passing of the resolution. Here, as Buckley, J. held, the appellants ought to have been put on the register on the 21st March and the 4th April 1903 respectively, and, therefore, the registration ought to be ante-dated to those dates, for on the 20th April, when the resolution for a voluntary winding-up was passed, they were the persons in fact entitled to the benefit of the proviso in sect. 161.

Gore-Browne, K.C. and J. E. Harman for the liquidator.—The liquidation of the company having commenced, the appellants are not entitled to have their names put on the register of members on a date anterior to the commencement of the winding-up. The court has no jurisdiction to make the order under sect. 35 of the Companies Act 1862. The case of Re Joint Stock Discount Company; Nation's case (ubi sup.) and other similar cases were decided under sect. 98 of the Companies Act 1862, which links together for this purpose the settling of the list of contributories, and the rectification of the register under sect. 35; and under it, for the purpose of settling the list of contributories, the court has power even after a liquidation to rectify the register of members by taking off the name of a person who ought not to be on, and putting on the name of a person which ought to be on. Before liquidation the court will rectify the register under sect. 35, after liquidation has commenced, it will only do so under sect. 98. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—Sect. 131 seems to contemplate a transfer of shares after a voluntary liquidation, and not merely the settlement of a list of contributories.] Only with the consent of the liquidators. After liquidation the list of contributories is the important list. If a call is made it is not made on those on the register of members of the company, but on those on the list of contributories. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In Buckley on the Companies Acts (8th edit.), pp. 322, 323, in the note to sect. 98, it is stated affirmatively that after a liquidation the power of rectification under sect. 35 is not limited to merely settling a list of contributories, and reference is made to Re Scottish Universal Finance Bank; Breckenridge's case (12 L. T. Rep. 796; 2 H. & M. 642), Reese River Silver Mining Company v. Smith (L. Rep. 4 E. & I. App. 64), and Re London, Hamburg, and Continental Exchange Bank; Ward and Henry's case (16 L. T. Rep. 254; L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 431).] The effect of that passage is that after the liquidation has commenced sect. 35 only applies so far as is provided by sect. 98. If the appellants are to be treated for all purposes as if they had become members before the 2nd April, it involves not only that they are entitled to give notice of dissent under sect. 161, but that they were entitled to have notice of the meetings, and then the special resolutions passed at the meetings would be invalidated as notice was not given to them. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think not. The statute is complied with by the issue of the notice to the shareholders whose names then appear on the register. The validity of the meeting or the validity of any proceedings will not be affected by the order asked for.] Supposing the transferor had given notice of dissent, then he must have been treated as the person entitled to do so.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think this appeal must be allowed. I propose to deal with this case as a case in which there has been an unfortunate accident which resulted in very unnecessary delay in putting the names of these gentlemen, Messrs. Brown and Pollock, upon the register. Sect. 35 of the Companies Act 1862 says: "If the name of any person is, without sufficient cause, entered in or omitted from the register of members of any company under this Act, or if default is made or unnecessary delay takes place in entering on the register the fact of any person having ceased to be a member of the company, the person or member aggrieved, or any member of the company, or the company itself, may, as respects companies registered in England or Ireland, by motion in any of His Majesty's superior courts of law or equity, or by application to a judge sitting in chambers, or to the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries in the case of companies subject to his jurisdiction, and as respects companies registered in Scotland by summary petition to the Court of Session, or in such other manner as the said courts may direct, apply for an order of the court that the register may be rectified, and the court may either refuse such application, with or without costs, to be paid by the applicant, or it may, if satisfied of the justice of the case, make an order for the rectification of the register, and may direct the company to pay all the costs of such motion, application, or petition, and any damages the party aggrieved may have sustained." Now, there can be no doubt but that the names of these gentlemen ought to have been on the register at an earlier date; and, so far as this case is concerned, at a date earlier than the time of the holding of the meetings with regard to the reconstruction of this company. Under those circumstances there can be no doubt that the case of Re Joint Stock Discount Company; Nation's case (ubi sup.) is an authority for the proposition that when it is right that an order for rectification should be made (and Lord Romilly there draws no distinction between an order for rectification by taking the name off, or by putting a name on, the register), the court may make an order not only that the right name shall be put on or taken off the register as the case may be, but that the register shall be treated as if the name had been on or off the register when it ought to have been on or off the register. But it has been argued here that it is quite true that may be done in the exercise of the powers given by sect. 35 of the Act of 1862; but the power which was actually exercised by Lord Romilly in that case was a power exercised in respect of a list of contributories, and after the commencement of this liquidation the only power under which the register can be modified is under the 98th section, and the 35th section no longer applies. The 98th section says: "As soon as may be after making an order for winding-up the company the court shall settle a list of contributories, with power to rectify the register of members in all cases where such rectification is required in pursuance of this Act, and shall cause the assets of the company to be collected and applied in discharge of its liabilities." It is said that after the liquidation rectification is not ordered under sect. 35, but under sect. 98; and that under these circumstances this rectification ought not to be made nunc pro tunc. On that point there is a decision of Wood, V.C. in the case of Re Scottish Universal Finance Bank; Breckenridge's case (ubi sup.), and it is clear that this particular point was raised there. Counsel is there reported to have said in argument: "The 98th section of the Act is a positive direction as to the course which is to be pursued. The court is to settle a list of contributories with power to rectify the register for that purpose, and is bound to rectify the register so far as may be necessary." When the learned Vice-Chancellor gave judgment he said: "It is said in opposition to the motion that it is irregular after a winding-up order has been made, because the whole matter is then in the hands of the court, and I am referred to the 98th section of the Act to show that the rectification of the register is after such an order a matter merely auxiliary to the settlement of the list of contributories. But there is nothing in that section to prohibit the court from acting in respect of the share register of the company in any manner in which it might have acted had that section not existed, and I cannot, therefore, hold that the hands of the court are in any manner tied by that section." That decision of Wood, V.C. seems to me to be exactly in point, and to negative the argument which counsel for the liquidator submitted to us. I see that view is taken in Buckley on the Companies Acts, 8th edit., at p. 322, where several other authorities besides Breckenridge's case (ubi sup.) are referred to; and it is said there: "After a winding-up order has been made the power of rectification given to the court by sect. 35 is not cut down and reduced to a mere power of rectification in the settling of the list of contributories. It is open to a contributory, after the order has been made and before the list of contributories has been settled to move for rectification under this section and the 35th section." I have only to add this, that I do not mean for a moment to suggest that anyone is entitled to such an order ex debito justitiæ; it is a matter in the discretion of the judge, and there might be cases in which the learned judge, although he considered it essential to completely putting in order the rights of the applicant, might refuse to do so because he thought it would work injustice in respect of other people. If I thought here that it would work injustice to other people, and especially if I thought it would work injustice to persons who are not in any way bound to bear the mistakes of the company, I should have carefully considered the matter before I made this order. But in the present case there is no evidence that any injustice will be caused at all. It has been suggested that if we make this order we shall invalidate the resolutions because the meetings will not have been properly called; and a variety of other suggestions of that sort were made in the course of the argument. As the matter stands, we can do justice and prevent any wrong accruing to those two gentlemen, Mr. Brown and Mr. Pollock, without doing any injustice to anyone else. Under these circumstances I think that the order for rectification ought to be treated as an order of some date immediately before the holding of the meeting.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first objection raised in this case to the exercise of the jurisdiction which is conferred on the court by sect. 35 of the Companies Act 1862, is an argument that the court is deprived of the power of exercising that jurisdiction, except for the purpose of settling the list of contributories. That objection is based on the wording of of sect. 98. [His Lordship read the section and continued:] It is said that the power of rectification which is derived under sect. 35 is confined to the settlement of the list of contributories. I think that is entirely contrary to previous decisions. There is not only the case to which my Lord has referred—namely, Breckenridge's case (ubi sup.)—but I observe, on looking at another case which is cited in Buckley on the Companies Acts—namely, Reese River Silver Mining Company v. Smith (ubi sup.)—there is the high authority of Lord Cairns for the proposition which was laid down by Sir William Page-Wood in the case which has already been cited. Lord Cairns says: "Notwithstanding the winding-up, the court under the 98th section is to rectify the register of members in all cases where such rectification is required in pursuance of the Act—that is to say, at all events in those cases pointed out by the 35th section.” Now the present case falls within the 35th section, because as the learned judge has found, and the finding of fact is really not disputed, in the language of the Act “unnecessary delay” has taken place in the entering on the register the fact of a person having ceased to be a member of the company, and he has also found that the names of the applicants Brown and Pollock have been omitted without sufficient cause from the register. That being so, the jurisdiction to make such an order as Buckley, J. has made exists, and the order, therefore, must be sustained as far as it goes. But the object of this appeal is to fix the date at which the change on the register is to be operative; and it is contended on behalf of the liquidator that the court under sect. 35 has no power to do that. There again, it seems to me we have the guidance of authority so old as the decision of Lord Romilly in Re Joint Stock Discount Company; Nation's case (ubi sup.) which was decided in 1866. That order was made by the Master of the Rolls, no doubt having regard to sect. 98, in the exercise of the powers conferred by sect. 35. It is therefore an authority that in a proper case the court has power to fix a date at which the change in the register is to be made. But then after that there comes, no doubt, a serious question. The application of the appellant is in substance that the registration be made nunc pro tunc. Now, when an application of that sort is made, the court ought to be very careful to see that it does no injustice by making the registration retrospective. I may point out that the power which is conferred by sect. 35 is not inoperative. All that it provides is that the court may, in a proper case, make an order for rectification. Therefore the court has full discretion to deal with every particular case which comes before it in such a way as may produce complete justice; but in the present case I fail to see that any injustice is to be done if the alteration is made as is asked. These gentlemen, the present applicants, pressing to have their transfers registered, and seeking their certificates as early as possible, get answers from the secretary of the company which led them to believe that by the date of the last meeting the register would be altered, and they would appear as members. Supposing this had been done, although they had not received their certificates, they sent in notices of dissent from the special resolution in the way prescribed by sect. 161 of the Companies Act 1862. That gave the liquidator full notice of the position that they took in the matter, and he chose to disregard it. Then this application is made to Buckley, J. with the result that the register is altered in favour of the applicants. There is no evidence before us to satisfy me in any way that any injustice is likely to accrue from the alteration of the register being dated so as to cover the notice which was given by the present appellants in the exercise of the rights which they had as members under sect. 161. I think, therefore, that the order ought to be made.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me that the argument for the respondent is really based on this hypothesis; that the register of members is a thing which ceases to have any real operation or existence after the winding-up order; that the only right which can be dealt with after a winding-up order is to be given effect to by making some change in the list of contributories. But, if the scheme and method of the Act is looked at, the register of members is one thing, and the list of contributories is an entirely different thing. The list of contributories, to mention one distinction, what is known as list A and list B is something larger than and different from the register of members, and the Act itself, as it seems to me, indicates in no doubtful manner that, notwithstanding a winding-up, the register of members and the status of members may be altered. Now, sect. 131, the very section under which Buckley, J. has acted, or under which he has partly acted, says this: “Whenever a company is wound-up voluntarily the company shall, from the date of the commencement of such winding-up, cease to carry on its business except in so far as may be required for the beneficial winding-up thereof, and all transfers of shares, except transfers made to or with the sanction of the liquidators, or alteration in the status of the members of the company, taking place after the commencement of such winding-up, shall be void.” That section asserts that there may be after a winding-up transfers of shares with the sanction of the liquidators. That being so, it seems to me that, quite apart from any list of contributories, there is a register of members to which all the provisions of sect. 35 of the Act of 1862 ought to be applied. The authority to which my Lord has called attention, and also the authority to which Stirling, L.J. has called attention, seem to me conclusively to show that the power given by sect. 35 is independent of that which is found by reference under sect. 98. I, therefore, cannot doubt that the court has the right to exercise every power which is conferred by sect. 35 where there has been an undue delay in registering a transfer. That there has been undue delay here is found as a fact by the learned judge, and the accuracy of that finding is really not disputed. Then we have authority going back to the very early days of the Companies Act 1862 that under sect. 35 in a proper case an order having a retrospective effect may be made—may be made not must be made—and may be made imposing such conditions as the court thinks necessary to protect the rights of any third persons; but in a case like this, where there has been no really serious suggestion of any ill result or any unjust consequence which would follow from dating the transfers as of the date when they ought to have been made, I can see no ground for imposing any condition whatever. I think, therefore, the order proposed by my Lord is quite right.

Muir Mackenzie.—It will be sufficient for the appellants if the registration of each transfer is carried back to the 4th April 1903.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Then let that be the date.

Harman.—The notice of the confirmation meeting of the 20th April will not be invalidated in consequence.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—It will not affect that notice at all. The notice was in accordance with the register as it then stood.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Thursday, Jan. 21.

(Before RIDLEY, J.)

SKINNER v. HUNT AND OTHERS. (a)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant by tenant to pay all charges—Paving expenses—Notice to tenant to pay—Payment by tenant—Deduction of amount paid from rent—Landlord's right to distrain for amount deducted—Metropolis Management (Amendment) Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 96.

The lease of a house contained a covenant on the part of the tenant to pay the rent free of all deductions except landlord's property tax, and to pay all rates, taxes, and assessments whatsoever, and all charges imposed by any local authority upon the frontagers in respect of the taking over and the making and repair of the roads abutting on the premises. The local authority, having incurred expenses in paving the road and having apportioned the expenses among the frontagers, gave the tenant notice, under sect. 96 of the Metropolis Management (Amendment) Act 1862, not to pay his rent without first deducting the amount of the paving expenses due to the local authority from the landlord as owner of the house. The amount of the expenses so claimed from the tenant exceeded the whole sum which he owed to his landlord as rent, and the tenant paid to the local authority the whole rent then due, in accordance with the notice. The landlord then demanded the rent from the tenant, which the tenant refused to pay, and thereupon the landlord distrained upon the tenant for the rent, the whole amount of which the tenant had paid to the local authority.

Held, that the tenant having paid the whole amount of the rent to the local authority, as he was bound under the section to do, that payment was, under the section, to be taken as a payment of the rent, and that therefore the rent was gone and the landlord had no right to distrain for the same, though by the proviso at the end of the section the landlord's rights under the tenant's covenant to pay all such charges remained.

ACTION tried before Ridley, J. with a common jury.

The action was brought to recover damages for an alleged wrongful distress, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 50*l.* damages.

Upon the admitted facts the case was argued upon the points of law arising under sect. 96 of the Metropolis Management Act 1862. The facts were as follows:

The plaintiff was tenant and occupier of a shop under a lease from one Jacob Budd, for a term of twenty-one years, at a rent of 40*l.* a year, payable quarterly free of all deductions except landlord's property tax.

The lease contained a covenant on the part of the plaintiff to pay all rates, taxes, and assessments whatsoever, and all charges imposed by any local authority upon the frontagers in respect of the taking over the roads and footpaths abutting upon the said premises, or the making or repair thereof.

On the 22nd Feb. 1903 the plaintiff had received notice that the defendants had been appointed receivers of the rents of the plaintiff's premises, and they gave notice to the plaintiff to pay his rent to them.

On the 18th Dec. 1902 the plaintiff received a notice from the Wandsworth Borough Council not to pay his rent without first deducting the sum of 34*l.* 19*s.* 2*d.*, due to the council under an apportionment of the estimated cost of paving the road and footpaths.

On the 20th Jan. 1903 the plaintiff paid the borough council 10*l.*, being one quarter's rent, due on the 25th Dec. 1902, and he informed the defendants that he had done so.

On the 22nd Jan. 1903 the defendants demanded payment of the rent due on the 25th Dec. 1902, which was not paid, and on the 12th Feb. 1903 they put in a distress upon the plaintiff's premises for that rent.

The present action was then brought by the plaintiff, alleging that the distress was a wrongful distress.

The defendants counterclaimed for the rent.

Sect. 96 of the Metropolis Management (Amendment) Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) provides:

The two hundred and seventeenth, two hundred and eighteenth, and two hundred and nineteenth sections of the firstly recited Act—that is, the Metropolis Management Act 1855—are hereby repealed; and in lieu thereof be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for any vestry or district board, at their discretion, to require the payment of any costs or expenses which the owner of any premises may be liable to pay under the said recited Act or this Act, either from the owner or from any person who then or at any time thereafter occupies such premises, and such owner or occupier shall be liable to pay the same, and the same shall be recovered in manner authorised by the recited Act and this Act; and the owner shall allow such occupier to deduct the sums of money which he so pays out of the rent from time to time becoming due in respect of the said premises as if the same had been actually paid to such owner as part of such rent: Provided always, that no such occupier shall be required to pay any further sum than the amount of rent for the time being due from him, or which, after such demand of such costs or expenses from such occupier, and after notice not to pay his landlord any rent without first deducting the amount of such costs or expenses, becomes payable by such occupier, unless he refuse, on application being made to him for that purpose by or on behalf of the vestry or district board, truly to disclose the amount of his rent, and the name and address of the person to whom such rent is payable, but the burden of proof that the sum demanded from any such occupier is greater than the rent due by him at the time of such notice, or which has since accrued, shall lie upon such occupier: Provided also, that nothing herein contained shall be taken to affect any contract made or to be made between any owner and occupier of any house, building, or other property whereof it is or may be agreed that the occupier shall pay and discharge all rates, dues, and sums of money payable in respect of such house, building, or other property, or to affect any contract whatsoever between landlord and tenant.

Hawke for the defendants.—The plaintiff is not entitled to maintain the action, as the distress was a lawful distress for the rent due. The lease under which the plaintiff held contained a covenant on the plaintiff's part that he would pay all charges imposed by any local authority in respect of the making up or repair of the roads. The tenant was bound by his covenant to pay these charges, and, that being so, he was not entitled to deduct them from the rent. He was bound to pay the rent to the landlord free of all these charges, and that, when taken in conjunction with the covenant to pay all charges imposed by the local authority for the making up of the roads, amounted to a contract on his part that he would not deduct the amount of the charges from the rent. Having no power to deduct the charges, the rent was due, and the distress was consequently lawful.

S. G. Lushington for the plaintiff.—By sect. 105 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 the liability to the expenses of paving new streets is cast upon the owners of the houses forming such street; and by sect. 77 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862, that liability is extended to “the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street.” So that by these two sections the liability to the charges incurred in this case by the local authority in paving the roads is cast upon the defendants as the owners of the land bounding or abutting on the road. It is a charge upon the owner and not a charge upon the occupier. Then sect. 96 of the Act of 1862 enables the local authority to recover this charge, which is the landlord’s charge, from the occupier or tenant, by requiring such tenant to pay the charge out of the rent. The local authority are enabled to go to the tenant and demand payment from him of these expenses out of the rent, and the tenant is liable to pay, but only to the extent of the rent which he then owes to his landlord. There was the same procedure adopted under the Income Tax Act 1842, which provided that if the tenant had to pay a landlord’s tax he was enabled to deduct it from the rent, and the payment operated as a payment pro tanto of the rent, and could be pleaded as such. The same principle applies wherever the amount of the rent is claimed from the tenant by a right paramount to that of the landlord. When the tenant paid the amount to the local authority the payment was the same as if he had paid the rent to the landlord. The rent was gone and with it the right of the defendants to distrain. The distress was therefore wrongful, as there was no rent due. [He was stopped.] He referred to

RIDLEY, J.—I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. I think that the section which has to be applied in this case is one which requires a little consideration. The question raised is whether, where the local authority, under sect. 96 of the Metropolis Management (Amendment) Act 1862, have taken steps to recover from the tenant or occupier the amount of the expenses due in respect of the making and repair of roads, there still remains to the landlord the right to distrain for the rent, in respect of which the local authority have made their demands. Sect. 96 itself is a replacement of sects. 217, 218, and 219 of the Metropolis Management Act of 1855, under which there had been a decision nearly in point with the present case which was cited by counsel for the defendants. But before I refer to that I ought to say in a few words the way in which I read the effect of this enactment. The Act of 1862 itself contains other provisions in an earlier section—sect. 77—by which there is given to the local authority a right to recover from the owner these expenses, which are matters wholly for the owner. The local authority may recover them in the County Court, or by proceeding in a summary manner before a justice of the peace; but sect. 96 proceeds to give them a further power, and it is a power which gives them a right to go to the owner or to the occupier in enforcement, in point of fact, of their right to get back from not only the owner, whose liability it is, but also from the occupier, who is only interested in the matter as tenant of such owner, the expenses to which they have been put. [His Lordship read sect. 96, including the proviso at the end, and proceeded.] It is upon the words of the section that I have read that the main argument arises. Counsel for the plaintiff says that the rent is gone; that it is enacted that the money which is demanded from the tenant, and which he pays, shall be actually paid as part of such rent; that, therefore, it is gone as rent, and with it the right of distraining for it; and, further, that the proviso at the end of the section only keeps alive such contracts as may exist between the landlord and the tenant, chiefly, according to the words of the statute, in respect of the payment of such rates, and that the words “any contract whatsoever” would have relation to a contract of a similar nature to those already specified—namely, an agreement “that the occupier shall pay and discharge all rates, dues, and sums of money payable in respect of such house.” Counsel for the defendants, on the other hand, contends that that is not so, and that the tenant has no such right as is contended for. It is said that the tenant has a right to deduct the expenses paid by him unless there is an agreement to the contrary, and that here there is an agreement to the contrary, because there is an agreement to this effect that the sum of money due in respect of the roads shall be paid by him. It is said, therefore, that there exists an agreement to the contrary, or an agreement which is in effect to the contrary, because there is an agreement which says that the tenant is to pay all charges imposed by the local authority in respect of the taking over and paving the roads and footpaths abutting upon the premises, and that therefore he loses his right of deducting these charges from the rent; and that he can only deduct these charges from the rent if the burden of paying for those roads falls upon the landlord only, and not upon the tenant himself. Therefore counsel for the defendants has contended that, according to the proper meaning of this section and the authorities which he has cited, there is an agreement here to the contrary under the closing proviso, and that, consequently, the occupier has not the right to deduct what he has paid from the rent. That is the difference between the contentions on either side as to the meaning of this section. When I come to look at

SKINNER v. HUNT AND OTHERS.

[K.B. Div.]

the section I think the words are too strong with regard to the payment off the amount of rent to admit of the defendants' construction. The section says that the payment by the tenant to the local authority is to be taken "as if the same had been actually paid to such owner as part of such rent." Now, if it had been paid to the owner as part of such rent, and if the whole amount of the rent had been thereby paid, then the rent would be gone, and if the rent is gone the landlord cannot distrain in respect of it. It was not necessary for the purposes of the statute that the words should have been so precise. They might have been enacted in a much less specific way, but when we see that a payment when made shall be taken to have been actually paid on account of that rent, it appears to me that, prima facie, the rent is gone. It may not have been within the idea or purview of those who drew the statute that it should be so, but I think the proper effect to be given to those words is what I have stated, that the rent is, prima facie, gone. That being so, is there anything in the proviso to show that the contrary was the meaning of the Legislature? I think not. If we look at the section it appears to me that the intention of the Legislature was this: The Legislature gave the local authority a remedy for this purpose against both owner and occupier; the remedy against the occupier was a remedy against him in respect of the rent which he held in his hands and which he owed to the owner; they gave the right to take that rent out of the hands of the occupier and away from the owner, and they took from the owner, therefore, the right to the rent. The right to the rent, therefore—that is, so much of the rent as the tenant had had to pay to the local authority—was gone. But then the Legislature, having done that, thought that they must make some provision as to what might be the state of things between the landlord and the tenant according to the lease or the agreement of tenancy which existed between them. Therefore they put in a proviso at the end of the section which had this effect: If it be the fact that the tenant is bound to his landlord either by lease or by some covenant or agreement to pay these expenses, that right of the landlord is still to survive. Therefore the Legislature put in the proviso that nothing therein contained should "affect any contract whatsoever between landlord and tenant"—any contract, I mean, relating to matters of this kind. It might possibly be argued by an astute tenant that if this sum of money had once been paid by the tenant in respect of the demand made upon him for the rent by the local authority it had been paid already; and if the landlord were to come to the tenant and say: "Pay me that which is due under your covenant for the expenses of these roads," the tenant, if he were astute, might say, "I have paid it. You may call it rent, but I have paid it already as the amount of my rent." Therefore it was necessary to put in some provision to the effect that the tenant should still remain liable to perform, as regards his landlord, that burden which the lease cast upon him. The tenant has relieved himself of the duty of paying the rent to the landlord. He has been ordered to pay it to somebody else, and as rent it is gone, but the landlord has left to him the right to say: "You have paid the rent and no doubt you have got rid of that, but you are still liable to me to pay that which under your covenant you have got to pay: therefore under the proviso in the section, which is put in for that purpose, I have got a right to say to you, pay me the expenses which have been laid upon my shoulders by the authorities." I think that satisfies the meaning of the section, and is more in accordance with it than to say, as counsel for the defendants argued, that the tenant has not a right, where this proceeding has been put in force, to come and say that the rent has been paid. He contends that any agreement of the kind which I have referred to takes away from the tenant the right to say that he has so far paid the amount of the rent. It seems to me that if we give that construction to the proviso we should be violating the actual and natural meaning of the words in the earlier part of the section; whereas, if we take the other meaning, it is more consonant with the section, and it is completely as just; for I cannot quite see that there is any greater reason for preserving to the landlord a right to distrain for that which is gone than there is for the other view, which, as it seems to me, would be an equally just provision. The landlord has lost his rent because it has had to be paid to somebody else, but the rest of the burden which fell upon the tenant the landlord has still got the right to enforce. I cannot see any objection to that interpretation of the section. There is another part of the section which I have left out for the time. I must, however, refer to it with the view to discussing the decision which was cited for the defendants, the case of Sweet v. Seager (ubi sup.), which is the nearest in point of any of the cases which have been cited, although decided upon the earlier statute of 1855. It appears to me, in the first instance, that that case was not argued upon this point. That gives rise to a suspicion in my mind that the point did not arise, because, whichever way it is decided, it is certainly a point worth arguing. Yet, if that is so, it is singular that neither of the learned counsel engaged in the case dealt with the matter, nor did the court. When I look at the facts of that case I see that, according to those facts, it was not a proceeding similar to this at all, but it was some other proceeding. The facts there were these: "On the 16th Dec. 1856 the plaintiff was required by the board to pay and did pay to the board the sum of 27*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, being the amount of the expenses paid by the board for the works. On the 25th Dec. 1856 the sum of 22*l.* 10*s.* became due from the plaintiff to the defendant for a quarter's rent for the house and premises reserved by the underlease. The plaintiff claimed to retain the said sum of 22*l.* 10*s.* in part satisfaction of the sum of 27*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* paid to the board of works. On the 22nd Jan. 1857 the defendant distrained the goods of the plaintiff on the demised premises for the said sum of 22*l.* 10*s.*" Therefore I do not understand how that could have been in respect of a similar proceeding to this. As to the amount due, in dealing with the amount which the tenant has got to pay—and this is the part of the section which I left out at first—the section says this: "Provided always, that no such occupier shall be required to pay any further sum than the amount of the rent for the time being due from him." That is the main provision and effect of the section. It would not be right that the occupier should be ordered to pay more than

BLAKE v. MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.

[K.B. Div.]

is actually due from him to the owner; but there is another consideration which comes in and which made it necessary to add a few words to meet this contingency. The notice is given first of all, but some rent may become due between the time when the notice is given and the time when the payment is made. Then the proviso says that for such rent which may accrue due during those few days, there still shall be the right and the authority to proceed under the section as far as that amount of rent may go. I think the words of the proviso clearly mean that. The proviso says: "Rent which is for the time being due, or which, after such demand . . . and after notice not to pay his landlord . . . becomes payable by such occupier"—that is to say, which may accrue due in that interval. Further on the section says: "But the burden of proof that the sum demanded from any such occupier is greater than the rent due by him at the time of such notice, or which has since accrued, shall lie upon such occupier." I think, therefore, that that is the meaning of those words. That being so, I cannot see how Sweet v. Seager (ubi sup.) could really have been decided upon this point, though it may be so. I think it must have been otherwise, and that my reading of those words is according to the natural sense, which, as it appears to me, is the sense I have indicated. There was one other decision cited for the defendants, the case of Thompson v. Lapworth (ubi sup.). The point of that case, as counsel for the defendants said, is not immediately this point, but incidentally the subject was discussed by Willes, J., who says: "The effect, therefore, of the 96th section is to give a remedy against the tenant, who is to be allowed to recoup himself out of the rent due from him unless there be some agreement between himself and his landlord to the contrary." There seems to me nothing in those words which is contrary to what I have said. The learned judge is there dealing generally with the effect of the section, and it cannot be suggested that he was thinking of the question whether or not the landlord still had a right to distrain. What he says is that there is a remedy against the tenant, that is true; that the tenant has a right to recoup himself out of the rent due from him, and that is also true in a general sense, in accordance with what I have said in this case, unless there be some agreement between himself and his landlord to the contrary. In that case he could not recoup himself because he still would remain liable to the covenant by which he is compellable to pay the expenses. The case is one which is capable of argument, but I have come to the conclusion that in this case the right of distraint is gone. Therefore there will be judgment for the plaintiff for 50*l.*, the amount found by the jury; and also, the defendants will fail to recover the 20*l.* which they claim to be due for rent.

BLAKE v. MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY. (a)

Employer and workman—Injuries by accident—Compensation—Agreement for payment of weekly sum—Subsequent acceptance of work at reduced wages—Application by workman to have memorandum of agreement registered—"Genuineness" of memorandum—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), sched. 2, clause 8.

A workman received injuries by accident which rendered him for a time totally incapable of work. He agreed to accept compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and an agreement was duly entered into between him and his employers, by which he was to receive half his average weekly earnings at the time of the accident. He partially recovered, and was offered and accepted from his employers lighter work at reduced wages. On his resumption of work at the reduced wages, he admitted that he was no longer entitled to the former weekly sum as compensation, and negotiations took place, but no new agreement was come to as to the weekly amount of compensation he was to receive in addition to his reduced wages. The workman subsequently applied to a County Court to have the memorandum of the agreement registered under sched. 2, clause 8, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, but the County Court judge refused to register the memorandum of the agreement upon the ground that the memorandum was not then applicable to the facts of the case, and that therefore the agreement was not then "genuine" within the meaning of the rules.

Held, that the word "genuineness" in clause 8 refers to the memorandum and not to the agreement, and that, as the memorandum accurately represented the agreement which had been come to, it was a "genuine" memorandum within the meaning of the clause, and ought to have been registered, although the agreement itself was no longer applicable to the altered circumstances of the case.

APPEAL from the decision of the judge Derby County Court, upon an application made by the applicant Blake to have a certain memorandum of agreement registered under the provisions of sched. 2, clause 8, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

The applicant was a workman employed by the respondents, the Midland Railway Company, and was engaged as a shunter. While in the service of the respondents, on the 24th Jan. 1902 he met with a serious accident to his foot, in consequence of which he was taken to a hospital, and he lost his leg below the right knee. He was about thirty-nine years of age, and had a wife and two children.

The accident was admitted, and at the time of the accident on the 24th Jan. 1902 his average weekly earnings before the accident were admitted to be 25*s.* 1*d.*

In consequence of the accident he was totally incapacitated from work up to the 23rd Feb. 1903, and this total incapacity up to that date was admitted, and during that period he received

[K.B. Div.]

12s. 7d. a week up to Saturday, the 21st Feb. 1903, being the maximum amount of compensation under the scale of compensation in the 1st schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act. Partial incapacity was admitted still to continue.

On the 23rd Feb. 1903 the applicant, having partially recovered from the effects of the accident, was given light work, and started to work again with the railway company, at 18s. a week, as signalman at Burton.

On the 7th May 1902 the applicant signed the following:

Kettering Station.—7th May 1902.—I hereby elect to accept from the Midland Railway Company compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, for the injuries received by me at Kettering on the 24th Jan. 1902, and abandon any other claim, if any, that I may have against the company in respect of such injuries.

On the same day the appellant and the railway company had come to an agreement whereby the company agreed to pay 12s. 7d. a week as compensation during the total or partial incapacity of the appellant, and the appellant made and signed the memorandum to that effect.

In July 1903 the applicant sent the memorandum to the County Court for the purpose of having it registered, according to the provisions contained in sched. 2, clause 8, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

On the hearing of this application, it was admitted on behalf of the railway company that there was an agreement to the effect of this memorandum so long as the total incapacity lasted, but objection was taken on their behalf to this agreement being filed, as, since the applicant's resumption of work in Feb. 1903 he was only entitled at the most to 7s. a week, and that therefore the memorandum in its present form was inapplicable, and should not be filed.

The applicant admitted in his evidence that he asked for 6s. 10d. a week when he got wages at 18s. a week, and he said that negotiations had passed between them for the payment of a lump sum.

The learned judge gave judgment as follows:

I find as a fact that on Blake's resumption of work in Feb. 1903 he admitted that he was no longer entitled to 12s. 7d. mentioned in this proposed application, and claimed as compensation 6s. 10d. a week in addition to his wages of 18s., and opened negotiations with the company on that basis; I therefore dismiss the application on the ground that this memorandum at the present time is not applicable to the facts of the case, and that no agreement had been come to between the parties which is applicable to the present circumstances, and that therefore this agreement is not now genuine, within the meaning of these rules. Applicant to pay costs of application on scale B. Stay of execution for twenty-one days, and leave to appeal, if necessary.

The applicant appealed.

Clause 8 of sched. 2 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37) provides:

Where the amount of compensation under this Act shall have been ascertained, or any weekly payment varied, or any other matter decided under this Act, either by a committee or by an arbitrator or by agreement, a memorandum thereof shall be sent, in manner prescribed by rules of court, by the said committee or arbitrator, or by any party interested, to the registrar of the County Court for the district in which any person entitled to such compensation resides, who shall, subject to such rules, on being satisfied as to its genuineness, record such memorandum in a special register without fee, and thereupon the said memorandum shall for all purposes be enforceable as a County Court judgment. Provided that the County Court judge may at any time rectify such register.

S. T. Evans, K.C. (C. Edwards with him) for the applicant.—The County Court judge was wrong in not registering the memorandum. The application to register a memorandum of an agreement settling the amount of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act is made under clause 8 of sched. 2 of the Act. Under that clause the County Court registrar or judge is bound to register the memorandum "on being satisfied as to its genuineness." The learned judge placed a wrong meaning on the word "genuineness." He says that he dismissed the application on the ground that the memorandum at the time was not applicable to the facts of the case, and that no agreement had been come to which was applicable to the present circumstances of the case. He seems to have been of opinion that the word "genuineness" referred to the agreement, and not to the memorandum; but in the clause the word "genuineness" refers clearly to the memorandum and not to the agreement. The clause says that the memorandum is to be sent, and that the registrar is to register it, on being satisfied of "its"—that is, the memorandum's—"genuineness." The memorandum in this case was a genuine memorandum within the meaning of the rules; it was the memorandum of the actual agreement that had been made, and it was admitted to be a genuine memorandum, and ought to have been registered. It was wholly immaterial that the circumstances may have changed. The change of circumstances did not in the least affect the memorandum of the former agreement, or the genuineness of such memorandum. No injustice could be done by registering the memorandum as it stood, because there is a power to review the weekly payments on the request of either party. There is no decision in this country directly in point. In Field v. Longden and Sons (85 L. T. Rep. 571, at p. 573; (1902) 1 K. B. 47, at p. 53), Collins, M.R., dealing with this very clause—clause 8 of sched. 2—says that that clause is an important provision as showing the scheme of the Act to be that the workman is to get compensation with as little expense as possible. There is no limitation of time within which this memorandum under clause 8 is to be registered:

Cochrane v. Traill and Sons, 3 Fraser, 27:

Cam Mick v. Glasgow Iron and Steam Company, 4 Fraser, 198.

The judgment of the Lord Justice-Clerk, in the latter case, shows that "the placing of a memorandum of an agreement on the register is of the nature of a ministerial and administrative act, and that it in no way prejudices the rights of the parties, for a party can at once apply to have the arrangement made by it modified or put an end to if grounds can be stated for so doing." That is a decision exactly in point here.

J. D. Craeford for the respondents.—The learned County Court judge was right in refusing to register the memorandum of the agreement. The judge has found as a fact that on the workman's resumption of work in Feb. 1903 he admitted that he was no longer entitled to the whole 12s. 7d. a week, and claimed only 6s. 10d. in addition to his wages of 18s. a week, and that he opened negotiations with the company on that basis. So that at the time when the application to register was made the applicant himself admitted that the agreement which he sought to register was no longer applicable to the circumstances of the case. That is a finding of fact which is binding upon the court, and, if there is any evidence on which the County Court judge could come to that conclusion, then this court will not interfere. The County Court judge was right in finding that the original agreement had, by the course which this workman had adopted, come to an end between the parties. Before the memorandum can be registered under clause 8, the judge has to be satisfied as to its "genuineness." Here there was no "genuineness" within the meaning of this clause. The memorandum was the memorandum of an agreement which had entirely ceased to be applicable to the circumstances of the case. What the judge is to register is an agreement which is in existence, not only as to liability, but also as to amount at the time when the application to register is made. That is what is meant by "genuineness" in the clause, and the judge can only register "on being satisfied as to its genuineness," and the clause goes on to say: "And thereupon"—that is, after registration—"the said memorandum shall for all purposes be enforceable as a County Court judgment." If the judge had registered the memorandum in the present case, inasmuch as the agreement showed that the weekly payments were 12s. 7d. a week, then upon registration the original agreement as to the 12s. 7d. would have been enforceable as a County Court judgment, which would have been a great injustice to the railway company, as all the workman himself asked for was 6s. 10d. a week in addition to his new wages. That alone shows that it could not have been intended to register a memorandum of an agreement which has in fact ceased to exist. The agreement to be registered must show two things, an agreement as to liability and as to liability for so much per week (per Collins, M.R. in Field v. Longden and Sons, ubi sup.), or, as put by Mathew, L.J. in the same case, it must show three things—liability to pay, the amount of compensation, and the duration of the compensation.

WILLS, J.—I do not think that there is any doubt on this point, and the case seems to me to be entirely free from all practical difficulties. Every description of practical difficulty has been suggested by counsel for the railway company, but in point of fact I think there is none. The Act of Parliament is as clear as can be. There is an agreement which has been come to with reference to compensation. The workman is entitled by the compensation rules of the Act to have that agreement registered, and I think it has been held that there is no limit of length of time within which it is to be registered. The workman in this case has applied to have the agreement registered, and the answer to that is that the agreement, which was come to in 1902, is no longer applicable to the present circumstances of the case. So far that is conceded. It is conceded that in its entirety the agreement is not applicable to the present circumstances; but is that any reason why it should not be recorded as having been the agreement come to at the time between the parties? It is very important that it should be recorded, because it prevents the necessity of beginning proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act de novo, and applying for either a fresh agreement or an arbitration and taking proceedings which are more or less cumbrous and expensive, when the greater part of them has been rendered unnecessary by the agreement which has been already come to. It is to be observed that all the rules require to be ascertained is not whether the agreement is in force at the time of the application, but whether the record of the memorandum, which is to be registered, is genuine—that is to say, whether it honestly or truthfully represents the agreement which was then come to between the parties. There is no question about it in the present case, that what is sought to be registered did so represent the agreement which was come to between the parties; and therefore, looking merely at the words of the Act, I cannot see what obstacle there is to the agreement being recorded. But counsel for the respondents says that it would work injustice, and if he could have satisfied me that to allow the agreement to be registered would necessarily work injustice, I should have been very much inclined to say that I do not believe that the Act ever meant to do injustice, or to do anything except what is right, and if he could satisfy me that it necessarily would work injustice, then I should try all I could to find some other explanation of the meaning of these sections. But I cannot myself see that there is the least fear of its doing injustice. It is quite true that the Act says in sched. 2, clause 8, that the agreement, when once recorded, shall operate as a County Court judgment—that is to say, that when it is recorded as to 12s. 7d. a week, it gives the workman a prima facie right to go to the court to take out execution for 12s. 7d., or for whatever sum may be due on the basis of 12s. 7d. a week. But the proceedings of all courts, and the application of their judgments, are always subject to the control of the court, and if the court sees that its process is sought to be made use of for what would be scarcely less than a dishonest purpose, under the circumstances of this case, the court always has an inherent jurisdiction to prevent anything of that kind from being done, and an application to the County Court judge on the ground that to enforce this equivalent to a judgment for a sum based on 12s. 7d. a week would be inequitable between the parties, and would be contrary to good faith and justice, would succeed. The judge might have some little trouble in saying whether it should be 6s. 10d., or 6s. 9d., or 5s. 6d. a week; but that is a matter which we constantly have to deal with in cases of this kind, and there does not seem to be anything in that objection founded upon such a difficulty as that against allowing this to be recorded. If the respondents in the present case had come to a fresh agreement with the workman, they might have registered that agreement, and there would have been an end of it. But they have not done so, and it would be unjust to leave the workman without remedy, so that he would have nothing upon which he could issue execution without going through a fresh, elaborate and expensive process; and inasmuch as the question of quantum, upon proper application to the judge, is always subject to review, I do not see the difficulty or the injustice. Let me point out what was pointed out to me by my brother Kennedy in the course of the argument, an observation exceedingly to the point on this part of the case, that if the agreement had been recorded in the first instance, when there was no doubt about its being operative, it would have had precisely the same effect, and upon the return of the workman to work and his getting his 18s. a week, exactly the same difficulty would have arisen. There being no fresh agreement, the agreement recorded would have been enforceable for 12s. 7d. a week, or a sum based upon that, without interference; but interference would have taken place because justice required it, and inasmuch as nothing except putting an end to the agreement by a fresh agreement could have prevented, or ought to prevent, the workman from having the benefit of the judgment of some sort or other, enforceable for a proper amount, the difficulty which seemed to counsel for the respondents insuperable under the present circumstances, would have been exactly the same if the agreement had been registered in the first instance, when nobody could have doubted about the propriety of its registration. But where the learned County Court judge made a mistake was, in my opinion, in confounding the registration of the memorandum with the registration of the agreement. What the County Court judge has to be satisfied of is, not that the agreement is applicable to the present circumstances, but that it was come to, and that the record of it in the memorandum proposed to be registered is correct. When those two elements are present, it seems to me that the workman is entitled as a matter of right under the Act of Parliament to have the agreement registered.

KENNEDY, J.—As we are reversing the decision of the learned County Court judge, I think out of respect for him I should add a few words, though I say generally that I quite agree with what my learned brother has said. With great respect to the learned judge and the counsel who argued in support of his judgment, I do not think it is really a difficult case. The Workmen's Compensation Act provides for an agreement between the parties which shall save procedure under the other methods which the Act gives the workman in order to obtain compensation. The Act not only sanctions such an agreement, but it provides for an official record of the agreement, and there is in that part of the Act which provides for such a record no stipulation as to the time within which a record of the agreement shall be applied for. Further, it provides for no objection being permissible before the learned County Court judge, except one, that the memorandum which it is proposed to place on record is not genuine. That is provided for in terms in the schedule in this sense that the only objection contemplated is an objection to its genuineness, and the learned County Court judge here is obliged to find, in order to justify his judgment, that the document was not then genuine within the meaning of the clause. With great respect to the learned judge I have never heard the word "genuine" so used. A judgment is not the less genuine as a transaction if it was genuine when made, say, five years ago, though something else has been substituted for it in the meantime, which may be an answer to any proceedings under the judgment; but the judgment is genuine all the same. The question of genuineness means that the parties who appear to be parties made the agreement which is described in the document. That is all it means; and it seems to me that it would be using the word "genuine" in a sense for which, in my opinion, there is no sort of justification to say—which is the reason given by the learned judge—that he holds that "this agreement is not now genuine within the meaning of these rules," when the reason given is that in fact there has been a change of circumstances which would make the carrying out of these terms now no longer fair. When we come to look at the form of record, which is form 16 in the Workmen's Compensation Rules 1898, we see how carefully any mistake is guarded against by their recording—for that is the form of the record—the memorandum. First of all, it has to give the date of injury; and, secondly, "that on the day of the following agreement was come to by and between the said A. B. and the said C. D. and Co. Limited, that is to say:" If that is so, then it seems to me that what was sought to be done here is a matter against which time had no effect, and that, it being admitted that the document was genuine, the learned judge had nothing else to inquire into or to do. What the effect of recording the agreement is on the enforceability of it is, as my brother has pointed out, a matter on which proceedings could be taken, and they could be taken as regards the future immediately, if circumstances had changed, by the employer taking steps to review. The change of circumstances can be availed of, if it is sought to enforce the agreement as a County Court judgment, by proceedings before the learned County Court judge to stay the proceedings on the judgment except on terms. Speaking for myself, I would seek to give an interpretation to statutes in order to avoid any possible injustice, but I am also bound to say that I think, having regard to the relations of workmen with employers, if the employers find that the workman is getting better, and if they are able to give him, and he is able to do for them, other work, which shows that the scheme of the agreement is no longer applicable, it is not unreasonable, and not too much for the workman to ask the employers to say, record the agreement now, and at once apply for a review. Times have changed, and why should it not lie on them to do it. In this case it is not pretended that any other agreement was ever come to, or that there was any answer in law to the agreement which was, in fact, come to, had it stood outside the statute, simply as an agreement enforceable in law between the parties. Terms were offered, and the workman who had lost one leg and had got better and was able to do some work, was very properly willing to accept work, and the only question was some difference between 2s. and 3s. as to the amount of the wages, but no new agreement was come to. If it had happened that by reason of the record of this agreement it could be only in the future that the pay could be reviewed, I do not really think that any great injustice, or any injustice, would have fallen on the railway company if they had chosen, on this agreement being recorded, not to apply for any review, but to pass months in paying this workman in some employment, not giving him another agreement and disputing with him simply as to whether they were to pay 6s. or 4s. They had it in their own hands in a moment to give him that which, either by agreement or by proceedings for review under the Act, would have been the proper amount, and, therefore, the diminished amount of compensation. For these reasons it appears to me that there was really no answer to this application. I should personally be very sorry in these cases, in which the great object is to do justice and at the same time to save expense, to have to come to the result, which counsel for the railway company asks us to come to—namely, that this man should have to start expensive proceedings to obtain compensation now under the Act, when the only difference between the parties is some 2s. a week, though, of course, if the law obliged us to come to that conclusion we should be bound loyally to do it.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to the County Court judge with a direction that the memorandum of agreement should be recorded. Leave to appeal refused.

Public health (London)—By-laws—Lodging-house—Cleansing at stated times—Liability of "landlord"—No provision in by-law for notice to landlord—Validity of by-law—Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 94.

Under the provisions of sect. 94 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, by which sanitary authorities are enjoined to make by-laws for (amongst other things) "the cleansing and lime-washing at stated times of the premises"—that is, "of a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family"—a metropolitan borough council made by-laws wherein "lodging-house" was defined as "a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family." One of these by-laws provided that "the landlord of a lodging-house shall in the first week of the month of April in every year cause every part of the premises to be cleansed." The by-law contained no provision as to the giving of notice to the "landlord," who was defined as including the person who received or was entitled to receive the rack rent of the lodging-house or the profits arising from the letting.

Held, that the by-law was unreasonable and bad, in that it did not provide for notice of the state of the premises to be given to the landlord, who was thereby made responsible, before making him liable for a breach of the by-law.

Held, further, by Wills, J., that the by-law was also bad upon the ground that the work was required to be done in the first week in April, which frequently included the Easter holidays, when there would be a great difficulty in getting sufficient labour to do work which might require several days.

Two cases stated by metropolitan police magistrates and heard together.

STILES (app.) v. GALINSKI (resp.).

Case stated by the metropolitan police magistrate sitting at the Thames Police-court

At the Thames Police-court on the 23rd June 1903 an information was preferred by the appellant against the respondent for that the respondent, being the landlord of a lodging-house, No. 166, Stepney-green, did not, in the first week of the month of April last, cause every part of the premises to be cleansed, contrary to the by-laws in such case made and provided. This information was heard on the 30th June, when the magistrate dismissed the summons, subject to this case.

The appellant was a sanitary inspector and inspector of lodging-houses under the council of the borough of Stepney.

The respondent was the landlord, within the meaning of the by-laws hereinafter referred to, of the lodging-house in question, which was within the borough of Stepney, and was registered under the by-laws.

Evidence was given that on the 18th March 1903 the appellant visited the house and found the rooms and staircases dirty. He again visited the house on the 14th April, and he found the same state of dirt, so that it was clear that no cleansing had been done during the first week of April.

On the 11th June 1902 the council of the borough of Stepney, under sect. 94 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, made by-laws which had been duly allowed by the Local Government Board with respect to houses let in lodgings.

The Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76) provides:

Sect. 94 (1). Every sanitary authority shall make and enforce such by-laws as are requisite for the following matters; (that is to say), (a) for fixing the number of persons who may occupy a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, and for the separation of the sexes in a house so let or occupied; (b) for the registration of houses so let or occupied; (c) for the inspection of such houses; (d) for enforcing drainage for such houses, and for promoting cleanliness and ventilation in such houses; (e) for the cleansing and lime-washing at stated times of the premises; (f) for the taking of precautions in case of any infectious disease. (2) This section shall not apply to common lodging-houses within the Common Lodging-houses Act 1851, or any Act amending the same.

Sect. 114. All by-laws made by the county council or by any sanitary authority under this Act shall be made subject and according to the provisions with respect to by-laws contained in sections one hundred and eighty-two to one hundred and eighty-six of the Public Health Act 1875, and set forth in the first schedule to this Act; and those sections shall apply in like manner as if the county council or sanitary authority were a local authority. . . .

K.B. Div.] STILES v. GALINSKI; NOKES & NOKES v. MAYOR, &C, OF ISLINGTON. [K.B. Div.]

Sect. 182 of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), provides:

All by-laws made by a local authority under and for the purposes of this Act shall be under their common seal; and any such by-law may be altered or repealed by a subsequent by-law made pursuant to the provisions of this Act: Provided that no by-law made under this Act by a local authority shall be of any effect if repugnant to the laws of England or to the provisions of this Act.

Sect. 184. By-laws made by a local authority under this Act shall not take effect unless and until they have been submitted to and confirmed by the Local Government Board, which board is hereby empowered to allow or disallow the same as it may think proper; . . .

The by-laws in question were by-laws "made by the council of the metropolitan borough of Stepney with respect to houses let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, in the metropolitan borough of Stepney," and they purported to be made under the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

The by-laws provided:

By-law 1. In these by-laws, unless the context otherwise requires, the following words and expressions have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them: that is to say: "Lodging-house" means a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family. "Landlord," in relation to a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, means the person (whatever may be the nature or extent of his interest in the premises, and whether he resides on the premises or not) who receives or is entitled to receive the rack rent of a lodging-house. "Keeper," in relation to a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, means the person (whatever may be the nature or extent of his interest in the premises) by whom or on whose behalf such house or part of a house is let in lodgings, or for occupation by members of more than one family, or for the time being receives or is entitled to receive the profits arising from such letting, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such house or part of a house were let at a rent. "Lodger," in relation to a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, means a person to whom any room or rooms in such house or part of a house may have been let as a lodging or for his use and occupation, or who, not being a member of the family of such person, may occupy or use any such room or rooms by permission of the person to whom the same may be let.

By-law 10. Every lodger in a lodging-house shall cause all solid or liquid filth or refuse to be removed once at least in every day from every room which has been let to him, and shall once at least in every day cause every vessel, utensil, or other receptacle for such filth or refuse, to be thoroughly cleansed.

By-law 11. In every case where a lodger in a lodging-house is entitled to the exclusive use of any staircase, landing, or passage in such house, such lodger shall cause every part of such staircase, landing, or passage to be thoroughly cleansed from time to time as often as may be requisite.

By-law 14 [the one now in question]. The landlord of a lodging-house shall, in the first week in the month of April in every year, and at such other times as the condition thereof may render it necessary, cause every part of the premises to be cleansed. He shall at the same time, except in such cases as are hereinafter specified, cause every area, the interior surface of every ceiling and wall of every water-closet belonging to the premises, and the interior surface of every ceiling and wall of every room, staircase, and passage in the house to be thoroughly lime-washed. Provided that the foregoing requirement with respect to the lime-washing of the internal surface of the walls of rooms, staircases, and passages shall not apply in any case where the internal surface of any such wall is painted, or where the material of or with which such surface is constructed or covered is such as to render the lime-washing thereof unsuitable or inexpedient, and where such surface is thoroughly cleansed and the paint or other covering is renewed, if the renewal thereof be necessary for the purpose of keeping the premises in a cleanly and wholesome condition.

By-law 19. Every person who shall offend against any of the foregoing by-laws shall be liable for every such offence to a penalty of five pounds, and in the case of a continuing offence to a further penalty of forty shillings for each day after written notice of the offence from the council, with the proviso that a less penalty may be imposed.

The above by-laws applied equally whether the lodging-houses were registered or not.

The magistrate was of opinion that so much of the first clause of by-law 14 as required the annual cleansing by the landlord was invalid on the following grounds: (a) Being ultra vires; (b) being repugnant to the laws of England; (c) being repugnant to the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act 1891; (d) being unreasonable. He therefore dismissed the summons.

He considered: (a) That sect. 94 (d) and (e) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 did not empower the borough council to cast an obligation upon a "landlord" which did not already exist at common law or by statute, but merely entitled them to regulate the duties of persons already responsible by requiring—for example, periodical performances; (b) that the by-law is repugnant to the laws of England, because in the absence of express covenants there is no obligation upon a reversioner even to repair, much less to cleanse, any premises which have been let to a tenant for any term, at any rate unless the state of the premises, in consequence of dirt or non-repair, is a nuisance of which he has notice, and it was in his power to abate the nuisance by putting an end to the tenancy. None of these conditions are appended to the by-law; (c) that under the Public Health (London) Act 1891, and the Public Health Act 1875, the following state of things must exist before any obligation additional to the common law can be cast upon the owner (the equivalent to the "landlord" under the by-laws): (1) A nuisance injurious to health, and (2) inability to find the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance exists, or structural defect the cause of the nuisance; (d) that even if the by-law would be otherwise good in making the landlord responsible, it is unreasonable, because it does not cast a primary, or at least a concurrent, liability upon the lodger to cleanse his rooms, and also relieves the keeper, who has more immediate control of the premises than the landlord, from all liability in the matter, either concurrent or prior, so far as the rooms and exclusive staircases, &c., are concerned.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the determination of the magistrate was right in law, and if not what should be done in the premises.

K.B. Div.] STILES v. GALINSKI; NOKES & NOKES v. MAYOR, &C., OF ISLINGTON. [K.B. Div.]

George Elliott for the appellant.—The first point is whether the magistrate was right when he said that he considered that sect. 94 of the Act of 1891 did not empower the borough council to cast an obligation on a "landlord" which did not already exist at common law or by statute. It is submitted that on that point the magistrate is inaccurate in supposing that this by-law imposed upon the "landlord" any obligation which is inconsistent with the statute; and his suggestion that it imposes a greater obligation than is imposed at common law is not well founded. The Act of 1891 itself imposed obligations which did not exist at common law—for instance, the requisite that a house shall be habitable or sanitary. Sect. 4 (1) of the Act has the provision that the sanitary authority may serve notice of a nuisance on the person by whose act or default the nuisance arose, or, if such person cannot be found, "on the occupier or owner" of the premises. Those words "occupier or owner" are very wide, and the word "owner" there would be wide enough to include the "landlord" in this case—namely, the respondent. So that this by-law is merely carrying into effect what the Act provides for where a nuisance exists—namely, the throwing the onus of cleaning a lodging-house on the person who can easily be found. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The real point here is that in sect. 4 (1) the statute implies that in the absence of the occupier you may go against the owner. This by-law seems to give the right to go against the landlord as being under a primary liability. Does the statute contemplate a primary liability being placed on the owner?] This London Act of 1891 does not, but every landlord could make an express covenant in a case of this kind as a condition of his letting, that the letting should be forfeited if the tenant did not do the requisite things. The contention of the magistrate that this by-law imposes obligations more than are imposed at common law, is clearly answered by the fact that the Act does the same in sect. 94, where the sanitary authority are required to make by-laws to do certain things, as, for instance, in (a) and (d), and in the latter sub-section there is an obligation as to drainage which is wider than that at common law. The Legislature would know that in the condition of things existing in the East-end of London, the person who in the case of these houses would be more easily got at would be the landlord, as the tenant might be a very transitory person. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—If the landlord can say that this by-law makes every landlord liable, whatever the circumstances are, it is a question whether that does not go too far.] The by-law says that the landlord shall "cause" every part of the premises to be cleansed—that is, shall cause it to be done either by himself or through his lodger or keeper, if there is one. That is a perfectly reasonable provision. Then, as to the limit as to this being done in the first week in April, there is no difficulty in the work being done in the first seven days of April, and it is a perfectly reasonable provision. The section (sub-sect. (e)) says that the cleansing is to be "at stated times," and therefore it would not satisfy the section to say that the work should be done "by" a stated time. The balance of convenience is to have the work done at the particular stated time that is specified in the by-law. The by-law is not invalid upon any of the grounds set out by the magistrate, but is a valid by-law, going no further than carrying out the objects of the section.

R. Cunningham Glen (Clavell Salter with him) for the respondent.—The magistrate was right. The question really is whether the council have in this by-law been carrying out the Act or going beyond it. It is submitted that they have been going beyond the Act and have been attempting to legislate. It is necessary to look at the definition of "lodging-house," and by that definition it includes any house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by more than one family. It is not confined to houses which are registered, but it includes houses of any rent which happen to be let in lodgings or to be occupied by more than one family; and it applies to part of a house. There is no saving clause or reservation whatever in these by-laws as to existing leases or in any other way. This by-law imposes as to existing leases these penal obligations on landlords of all premises which are out of their control and in respect of which they would be trespassers if they interfered. It applies to all lodging-houses whether there is a keeper or not, and there is no reservation in it confining it to those houses where there is a keeper. In Nokes v. Islington Borough Council (90 L. T. Rep. 22; (1904) 1 K. B. 610) it was held that a by-law which required the landlord to do work without first having been given notice of the necessity of doing it was a bad by-law. The by-law is unjust and unreasonable, and comes within what was said by Hawkins, J. in Wallen v. Lister (70 L. T. Rep. 348; (1894) 1 Q. B. 312) that it enabled proceedings to be taken against a person who had ceased to have any interest in the property. A by-law which imposes on a person the obligation of doing that which he cannot do is bad (Ibid.), and it is invalid as being unreasonable: (Kruse v. Johnson, 78 L. T. Rep. 647; (1898) 2 Q. B. 91). [WILLS, J.—There may be some force in that observation with regard to tenancies existing at the time the by-laws were passed, but very little with regard to tenancies created after. Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—There is nothing unusual or unreasonable in the landlord reserving the right to go in to inspect the premises, and saying to the tenant, "You must clean the premises and I am to have the right to go in and see that you have done it."] It is unreasonable to place the primary liability on the landlord; it has never yet been done by statute. Statutory provisions place the primary liability on the occupier, and in no case on the owner in the first instance. They only place a secondary obligation on the owner in default of other persons failing to perform their duty: (sect. 4 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891). Under that section the primary liability is placed, first, on the person whose act or default causes the nuisance then on the occupier, and lastly on the owner. Here it was the act or default of the lodger that was in question. Again, the by-law is not confined to a cleaning of the premises in the first week in April, but such cleaning is to be done at such other times as may be necessary. That is most unreasonable, and contrary to the enactment. To provide that if lodging-houses are not cleansed at any time of the year the landlord is liable to a penalty is really legislating, and the council cannot legislate by by-laws. The provision of the statute that the cleansing is to be done "at stated times" is not complied with by a by-law which fixes one particular week, and it would be an unreasonable interpretation to place upon the statute to hold that a by-law is good which requires the cleaning to be done in one week and that week generally occurring in the Easter holidays.

Elliott, in reply, referred to the provision in sect. 116 of the Act of 1891 to the effect that the occupier of premises cannot prevent the owner from obeying or carrying into effect any provision of the Act, and to the cases of Parker v. Inge (55 L. T. Rep. 300; 17 Q. B. Div. 584, per Pollock, B.) and Lancaster v. Barnes District Council (78 L. T. Rep. 355; (1898) 1 Q. B. 855) as showing that an owner upon whom a notice to abate a nuisance has been served may be liable, although he has not the immediate possession of the premises.

NOKES AND NOKES (apps.) v. MAYOR, &C., OF ISLINGTON (resps.).

Case stated by the metropolitan police magistrate sitting at Clerkenwell Police-court.

A complaint was preferred by the sanitary inspector, acting on behalf of the mayor, aldermen, and councillors of the metropolitan borough of Islington, against Walter Nokes and George Nokes (the appellants) for that they being the landlords as defined by the by-laws of the mayor, aldermen, and councillors, made under the Public Health (London) Act 1891, with respect to houses let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, of a lodging-house, as defined by the by-laws, at 9, St. Clement-street, Barnsbury, within the borough, did not in the first week of the month of April 1903 cause every part of the premises to be cleansed, contrary to the by-laws.

After hearing the parties and the evidence adduced by them on the 17th and 24th June 1903 the magistrate thereupon convicted the appellants, and fined them in the sum of 10s., and ordered them to pay a further sum of 2l. 2s. for costs.

At the hearing of the complaint the following facts were admitted or proved:

The appellants were auctioneers and house agents, and were the landlords within the meaning of the by-laws of the premises referred to in the complaint, and did not in the first week of the month of April in the year 1903 cause every part of the premises to be cleansed, as required by the by-laws.

The house in question contained ten rooms, and was not cleansed in the first week of April according to the by-law. Some of the rooms were whitewashed and papered in Dec. 1902, and the rest of the cleansing was not carried out till May 1903.

It would take two men from a week to a fortnight to cleanse such a house in accordance with the by-law.

The builder who was employed by the appellants had orders to cleanse fifteen other registered lodging-houses at the same time as these premises, and five other houses belonging to the appellants, and stated that he was of opinion that he could not have carried out the cleansing of all these houses during the first week of April. He did not, however, receive his orders to cleanse these premises until some time in April, and did not commence until the beginning of May.

Other evidence was given to the effect that with one or two weeks notice an almost unlimited supply of such labour as was necessary for complying with the by-law could be obtained during the first week of April.

Upon the evidence before him the magistrate came to the conclusion that if it was necessary that the cleansing should be carried out in any one week, the first week in April was the most suitable, having regard to the condition of the labour market and all other matters. There were about 530 registered houses let in lodgings in the borough of Islington and coming under this by-law. The appellants owned a considerable number of such houses. There were in the whole of London 16,000 such houses.

There were 11,446 men in the borough of Islington engaged in the house-building trade, of whom 3936 were painters, and 3452 labourers, which formed a larger proportion to the whole population than the same class formed in the neighbouring boroughs.

The cleansing required by the by-law in these houses could to a very large extent be carried out by unskilled labour.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the by-law was unreasonable and ultra vires, and therefore invalid, in that it was practically impossible that all such houses could be cleansed in the space of one week.

The magistrate was of opinion that although there might be some difficulty in complying with the by-law, yet as there was no impossibility in so doing, the by-law was not so unreasonable as to be invalid in law, and he so determined accordingly, and fined the appellants as aforesaid.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the determination of the magistrate was right; and if the court should be of opinion that his determination was right the conviction was to stand; but if the court should be of the contrary opinion, then the conviction was to be set aside.

The by-laws in question were "By-laws made by the vestry of the parish of St. Mary, Islington, in the county of London, being the sanitary authority for the said parish, with respect to houses let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family," and they purported to be made under the Public Health (London) Act 1891. The by-laws provided:

By-law 1. In these by-laws, unless the context otherwise requires, the following words and expressions have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them—that is to say: "Sanitary authority" means the vestry of the parish of St. Mary, Islington. "Lodging-house" means a house or part of a house in the parish of St. Mary, Islington, which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family. "Landlord," in relation to a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, means the person (whatever may be the nature or extent of his interest in the premises) by whom or on whose behalf such house or part of a house is let in lodgings, or for occupation by members of more than one family, or who for the time being receives or is entitled to receive the profits arising from such letting, whether on his own account, or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such house or part of a house were let at a rent. "Lodger," in relation to a house or part of a house which is let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, means a person to whom any room or rooms in such house or part of a house may have been let as a lodging or for his use and occupation.

By-law 14. In every case where a lodger in a lodging-house is entitled to the exclusive use of any staircase, landing, or passage in such house, such lodger shall cause every part of such staircase, landing, or passage to be thoroughly cleansed from time to time as often as may be requisite.

By-law 16. The landlord of a lodging-house shall cause every common passage or staircase in such house to be thoroughly cleansed from time to time as often as may be requisite.

By-law 17 [the by-law now in question]. The landlord of a lodging-house shall, in the first week of the month of April in every year, cause every part of the premises to be cleansed. He shall, at the same time, except in such cases as are hereinafter specified, cause every area, the interior surface of every ceiling and wall of every water-closet belonging to the premises, and the interior surface of every ceiling and wall of every room, staircase, and passage in the house to be thoroughly lime-washed. Provided that the foregoing requirement with respect to the lime-washing of the internal surface of the walls of rooms, staircases, and passages shall not apply in any case where the internal surface of any such wall is painted, or where the material of or with which such surface is constructed or covered is such as to render the lime-whiting thereof unsuitable or inexpedient, and where such surface is thoroughly cleansed and the paint or other covering is renewed, if the renewal thereof be necessary for the purpose of keeping the premises in a cleanly and wholesome condition.

By-law 21. Every person who shall offend against any of the foregoing by-laws shall be liable for every such offence to a penalty of five pounds, and in the case of a continuing offence to a further penalty of forty shillings for each day after written notice of the offence from the sanitary authority.

Clarke-Williams for the appellants. — The magistrate was wrong in holding that the by-law was not unreasonable. The by-law is bad. It is repugnant to the Act of 1891 itself, and goes beyond that Act. In both the Public Health Act of 1875 and in this Act of 1891, it is provided that the person offending against the by-law must have notice. Here there is no provision in the by-law that the landlord who is to be made liable under it should have notice. The by-law is bad upon that ground. Moreover, there is no finding that there was any offence committed against the Act; the only offence alleged is against the by-law. There is another objection to the by-law. It provides for the doing of this work in the first week in April. That week generally occurs in the Easter holidays, when it would be difficult to get persons to clean these places. It is unreasonable to require that all the work should be done in one week, and that, too, Easter week. Upon every possible ground the by-law is unreasonable and bad.

Courthope-Munroe for the respondents. — [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. — The question is whether this by-law can be good, having regard to the fact that it does not provide for notice to be given.] No notice in such a case is necessary. The "landlord" in this case is, as we see by the definition of the terms, the same as "keeper" in the previous case. The appellants here are really the "keepers" of this lodging-house; and the by-law cannot be bad merely upon the ground that it does not provide for the giving of a notice. Then, with regard to the time within which this work has to be done, the Act itself, in sect. 94, says that the cleansing is to be done "at stated times." The by-law in providing that it is to be done during the first week of April, conforms to the Act in that respect. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. — We all think that there may be a stated time for carrying out the work; the only point is as to whether the particular time chosen—namely, the first week in April—is reasonable.] As to that, it must be supposed that the public authorities will carry out their by-law in a reasonable way, and will do what is reasonable. This provision in sect. 94 of the Act of 1891 is not new. There was exactly the same provision in sect. 35 (5) of the Sanitary Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 90), which sub-section empowered the public authority to make regulations "for the cleansing and lime-washing at stated times of such premises"—that is, of lodging-houses. Pursuant to that provision by-laws have been made which have not been held to be unreasonable. The case of Nokes v. Islington Borough Council (90 L. T. Rep. 22), which has been referred to, does not really touch this case at all.

Clarke-Williams in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. — Nobody can have listened to this argument without being struck with the extreme importance of the point that has been raised, and I am very glad (although we have had two cases) that we have had the advantage of having had it thoroughly argued by two counsel on each side. In consequence of some observations that have been made, holding, as I do hold, that the by-laws in both these cases must be held to be unreasonable, I desire expressly to point out that we are not interfering with the discretion of the local authorities to the extent to which it has been suggested by counsel who supported the by-laws. In the first place, I recognise that on practical questions, where a power is given to a public authority to make by-laws within the ambitus of the power that is given to them, as, for instance, in this case, for cleansing and lime-washing at stated times of the premises, their discretion ought not to be lightly interfered with, especially where by-laws have been sanctioned by a public department and particular duties and times and periods have been enforced. It is only where we see that some legal principle is interfered with that we ought to hold that by-laws are unreasonable, and, therefore, I am not quite sure that we are all agreed as to all the grounds upon which we think that these by-laws are unreasonable. I also agree, as Lord Russell, C.J. pointed out in Kruse v. Johnson (ubi sup.), that by-laws, such as these made by public authorities, are not to be set aside except upon strong grounds; and it is not to be assumed against them that they would be construed or administered unreasonably. On the other hand, as we pointed out in the case of Nokes v. Islington Borough Council (ubi sup.), if they necessarily involved that which is unreasonable, it is our duty to set them aside. There can, in my opinion, be no difficulty in properly framing by-laws which can really get rid of all the objections which have been taken in these cases, and I think, although possibly it may be a difficult task to perform, the matter has not been quite sufficiently considered by the framers of these by-laws. They may have followed, as has been suggested, some model by-laws, and those model by-laws may not have sufficiently considered the points which have been developed in this case. The benefit of the arguments in such a case as this is that it does point to objections that may be raised, and so enables local authorities to meet them in their future by-laws. Taking the Stepney case first, the objection that I take to this by-law 14 and the ground upon which I think it is unreasonable is that it includes, or may include, a class of people who are not legally responsible, and not morally responsible, without properly safeguarding them before they can be made liable for a criminal offence. The words are: "The landlord of a lodging-house shall in the first week of the month of April in every year cause every part of the premises to be cleansed"; and by-law 19 imposes a penalty of 5*l.* upon every person who shall offend against any of the by-laws for every such offence. Now, the word "cause" is the word that gives rise to the difficulty. If "cause" could be construed to mean "take reasonable steps"—such as by making a contract with his tenants, or something of that kind—the same difficulty would not have arisen; but I think very properly in the interest of sanitation and of the good working of Acts of Parliament of this kind, "cause" does not mean merely "take steps," but does mean "shall see that the thing is done." Therefore we have the by-law providing that the person upon whom under the by-law the duty is cast, was to see that the thing is done. Now I turn to "landlord," and I find that "landlord" in these by-laws includes [His Lordship read the definition of "landlord"]. I do not for the moment read the definition of "keeper" from these by-laws, because I quite agree that there would be less objection to the by-law if it were confined to a person who really had what I may call the personal management of the house. I think this view again is confirmed by analogy by the same kind of argument that I pointed out with reference to the by-law in Nokes v. Islington Borough Council (ubi sup.), where the question was as to the supply of water-closet accommodation. The Act, by sect. 4, sub-sect. 3 (a) and (b) makes provision that where the nuisance arises from any want or defect of a structural character, or where the premises are unoccupied, then the notice shall be served upon the owner, and where the person causing the nuisance cannot be found, and it is clear that the nuisance does not arise from the act or sufferance of the occupier or owner of the premises, the sanitary authority may themselves abate the nuisance, and may themselves do the necessary work. Only by way of analogy, I point out that the Act seems at places to draw a distinction between the occupier who would be responsible, or who ought to look after these matters, and the owner. It seems to me that the objection to this by-law—which is not any objection to the local authority making a proper by-law dealing with the matter—is that a person, who may have taken an agreement from a responsible agent and who is going to let the house in lodgings, would be held to be liable on the ground that he was entitled to receive the rack rent, and he had not caused the cleansing to be done. I ought to say that I attach no importance to the objections taken by some of the counsel in this argument—namely, the suggestion that the landlord would not have a right of entry on the premises. I think it perfectly obvious that under an ordinary agreement rights of entry would be reserved, or ought to be reserved, in order to justify a landlord in interfering and enable him to see that the law is obeyed. I wish further to say this: I see no objection to a by-law which puts the responsibility upon the landlord, even though he may be the person who is merely entitled to receive the rent. But, in my opinion, any such by-law ought to be made with reference to such a person's position, and ought in fact to provide that in the case in which there is some person who is liable or may be liable to the landlord to fulfil the obligation of the statute, the landlord himself should not be subjected to a criminal charge without notice being given to him. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that the by-law in both these cases is bad, because it does not provide for the person, who is going to be made subject to the charge, receiving notice in cases in which, under many circumstances, he may not, so to speak, have what I may call the ordinary means of knowing whether or not the law has been fulfilled. With regard to the second case, counsel for the respondents—the borough of Islington—raised a point, which, if he could have made it good, would have differentiated his case from the decision which I am now giving. He said that under the by-law in the parish of St. Mary, Islington, the definition of "landlord" is narrower and corresponds with the definition of "keeper" in the Stepney case, and to a certain extent I agree with him; but I still think, even if we take the definition of "landlord" in the Islington case, it is not sufficiently precise to exclude the case to which I have already referred. It seems to me that it does still render it possible that the by-law might be construed without putting an unreasonable construction upon it to include the person who gets the profit—that is to say, receives the ultimate money—though he may not be in fact in touch with the lodging-house in the same way as the ordinary keeper is. I certainly think that it is not possible to hold, as counsel for the Islington council contended in the second case, that there is no liability until the house is registered, because I think that by-law 2 brings this by-law into force as soon as the person is required to give the particulars, and the subsequent particulars about continuance of the liability do not in any way confer an exemption from or removal of that liability. These by-laws which, no doubt, were designed with the very best intention, and which ought to be supported unless they are shown to give rise to a serious objection, require re-modelling from the point of view, not of preventing the landlord from being responsible if he does not see that the work is done, but of giving him reasonable and proper notice before he can be charged with the breach of the by-law, as he was in these cases, simply because the house had not been cleansed, or had not been cleansed by the given day. I now come to that part of the case which has given me more difficulty, and upon which I am not quite sure that we are all agreed. Speaking for myself only, I should not have been disposed to interfere with this finding that the by-law was valid, merely on the ground that the period adopted in the by-law for carrying out the work was the end of the first week in April. The statute in sect. 94 says that the sanitary authority are to make by-laws for the cleansing and lime-washing at stated times, of the premises. Undoubtedly, in my opinion, that does mean fixed dates about the time when it should be done, or by which day it should be done. I trust that if these by-laws come to be reconsidered, the objection, which seems to me to be a very strong objection, to the taking of this particular period, which my brother Wills has pointed out during the argument, will be considered. I can well imagine that a week or fortnight at the end of April or at the beginning of May, or any period of that kind, would remove all the objections that may be taken upon that ground. But why I should not have been disposed to interfere on that ground is that that does seem to me exactly one of the things in which the knowledge and experience of the local authority, who have to fix a stated time, ought to prevail, unless some grave objection, so serious as to amount to an objection in law, or some strong unreasonableness in fact prevails. While I have been very much impressed by the suggestion that the end of the first week in April will very often be a difficult time for the work to be done, there may be other considerations in connection with the class of lodging-houses or the class of people who inhabit these lodging-houses, of which I do not know, which may counterbalance the inconvenience arising from those former considerations. Had the matter rested with me, I should not have been disposed to hold, and I do not hold, that the by-law is bad because of that particular week being taken; but, for the reasons which I have stated, which are, in my opinion, more substantial with regard to the question of no notice being given to an absent landlord, who may be under no legal or moral responsibility to see the Act carried out as between himself and the real person who is in occupation as tenant of the premises, I think this by-law must be held to be unreasonable. That being so, the appeal in the first case must be dismissed, and the appeal in the second case must be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I desire to adopt as part of my judgment everything which my Lord has said, except with regard to the matter about the selection of the first week in the month of April for the doing of the work. There are, however, a few observations which I should like to add. It seems to me that an initial mistake has been made in these by-laws by trying to make the same hard and fast rule apply to two perfectly different classes of tenements. The lodging-house proper, which is something in the character of a common lodging-house, may perfectly well be dealt with by a series of regulations which are really quite inapplicable to the very large class of houses which are brought under the common operation of these by-laws under the words "houses occupied by members of more than one family." Take the West End of London, where we are told the same sort of by-laws apply; it is not too much to say that there are very large areas in some of the best parts of London where two-thirds or three-fourths of the houses are so occupied that they would come under this definition. One cannot pass through a great number of streets without finding half a dozen doctors' names upon the same door; it is the commonest thing in the world for a medical man, who has an extremely good house very highly rented, to let off one or two rooms as consulting rooms to somebody else. That immediately brings this house within the definition of a lodging-house and makes all these by-laws applicable to it, and when we come to such a case as that, the application of this by-law seems to me to be unreasonable to the last extent. Moreover, the definition of "landlord" embraces the person who receives the rack rent of the house. To test that, take, for example, the very large area which is owned by some large owner of property in London. Probably there are five hundred to a thousand houses on that area of which the owner receives the rack rent, and for every one of these houses, if occupied in the way I have described, the owner would be liable as for a lodging-house within the meaning of these by-laws. To hold that he was liable because every one of these houses was not thoroughly cleansed, or was not lime-washed from top to bottom during the first week in April, would impose upon the landlord in such a case as that an absolutely intolerable burden, and one against which all common sense and all instincts of fair play rebel. I only give that instance because it is quite within the extreme instances which may be given of the operation of these by-laws. If the cases are fairly within the scope of the by-laws, as undoubtedly the case I have given would be, it is only by pointing out the circumstances of the by-laws as applied in such cases that one sees whether or not, taken as a whole and as applicable all round, the by-laws are reasonable. If they were confined to the class of houses of the same sort and occupied in the same sort of way as common lodging-houses, then of course there would be very much more to be said in their favour. But, even in that case, I agree with my Lord that, unless the person who is struck at is a person who, from his position and his relation to the property, ought to know exactly what his tenants are doing and in what state they are keeping the house, and so on, it would be quite unfair to render him liable without his having had notice of what is taking place. Counsel for the Islington Borough Council defends a good deal of this—and it is part of his argument that I do not like, and that I feel bound to protest against on important public principles—by saying: "These by-laws might be harsh and improper and unjust if they were applied all round, but the borough council or the local authority must be trusted only to put the law in motion in such cases as those in which it would be reasonable to do so." To begin with, the borough council are not the only persons who are entitled to put the law in motion; every subject of the Crown is entitled to do so. And, further, I do not like legislation which is felt to be so unfair, applying it all round, that it requires to be justified by saying that in particular cases it will not be enforced. I think that is as bad a ground upon which to defend legislation as one could very well have. I pass from that part of the case to say a few words about this provision as to the first week in April, as to which I feel fully the force of a great deal my Lord has said. One constantly knows the principles to be applied; but it is the application of principles which raises the difficulty. In this particular case I feel that it is hardly right to say that

No money must be received by any carter or other persons taking or receiving orders (except at the shop or stores) until the goods ordered have been delivered. (3) The full name and postal address of all persons ordering must be entered in the books provided for that purpose and sent in to the office the day before the orders are to be delivered.

The existence of the rules and their purport and effect were not communicated to or known by John Plant hereinafter mentioned, or any other customer; nor was any limitation of Cooper's authority to make sales of or to take orders for beer or stout on behalf of the appellant communicated to or known by John Plant or any other customer, the general course of dealing being that when Cooper accepted orders from customers they expected them to be and they were in fact executed.

The appellant supplied to Cooper certain postcards for the use of customers, containing a price list, a notice that travellers would wait upon them, that orders by post would receive prompt attention, a space for particulars of orders, and a space for the name and address of the persons giving such orders. Cooper occasionally, but not invariably, took out such postcards and gave them to persons on whom he called for orders.

Previously to the 5th Nov. 1902, one John Plant, of No. 4, Walmsley-street, Rishton, had from time to time ordered certain stout from the appellant by letter addressed to the appellant at his licensed premises at Nelson, and on one occasion by an order given to Cooper verbally. On the 5th Nov. 1902 Cooper called on Plant at his house and obtained from him there an order for a two-gallon jar of stout for the price of 2s. 4d. Cooper thereupon entered that order in his order-book, and on the following day he posted to the appellant such order-book, together with a summary which he made out of all the orders obtained by him in the Rishton district, including that of John Plant. He also posted to the appellant a number of gummed labels containing the names of the persons who had given the orders. Those labels were to be affixed to the vessels in which the goods ordered were to be delivered.

At the time when the order was given Cooper handed to Plant a postcard, but did not inform him that it was to be used as hereinbefore mentioned or otherwise, and it was not used, but was destroyed by his wife within a short time afterwards.

On receipt by the appellant at his licensed premises of the order-book, summary, and labels on the 7th Nov. 1902, his servants at his licensed premises selected and appropriated a two-gallon jar belonging to the appellant, filled with stout, in fulfilment of Plant's order, and affixed thereto a label bearing Plant's name.

The two-gallon jar, together with other vessels filled pursuant to other orders, was thereupon placed on a cart of the appellant to be delivered in the Rishton district to John Plant and the appellant's other customers by Cooper and one Boyle, a carter of the appellant, and only liquors in accordance with such order-book and summary were placed on the cart, all being labelled with the names of the respective customers.

Cooper and Boyle did not deliver to Plant the stout as ordered by him, but they delivered to him a two-gallon jar of strong ale, of which the price was 2s. 8d., and which had affixed to it a label bearing the name Lancaster, a customer of the appellant, who had on the 5th Nov. given to Cooper an order for such a jar of strong ale. Plant's wife accepted the jar of ale and paid Cooper 2s. 4d. for it, but she was not, nor were Cooper or Boyle at the time of such delivery, aware of the mistake which had occurred in regard to it.

Plant kept and consumed the strong ale delivered as above-mentioned, and afterwards, on the 18th Nov., offered to Cooper 4d. in addition to the sum already paid for the same, but that offer was not accepted by Cooper or the appellant on the ground that the mistake was that of Cooper and not that of Plant.

It was contended for the appellant that there was no evidence of any holding out that Cooper had authority to accept orders, and that he had no such authority; in fact that (subject to the Court of Quarter Sessions being bound by the authority hereinafter referred to) an executory contract was not sufficient in law to bring the case within the provisions of the Act, and that an executory contract was not complete till accepted at the licensed premises, and that if an executory contract was sufficient it was made on such licensed premises.

It was further contended that though the jar of stout was delivered in pursuance of the order given by Plant to Cooper on the 5th Nov. 1902, there was no contract until Cooper's order-book was received by post at Nelson and accepted by the appellant; that the jar of stout had been appropriated and set apart by the appellant at Nelson, and that the sale thereupon took place at the licensed premises at Nelson and not at Rishton. It was further contended that if no appropriation took place on the licensed premises, then that the order given by Plant had never been executed by the appellant, because stout had never been delivered to Plant or paid for by him, and that the parties were never ad idem as to the ale delivered to Plant, and that there was no evidence of any new contract for the sale of the ale.

It was contended for the respondent that the sale, or the contract for the sale, of the stout was completed at Plant's house at Rishton on the 5th and 7th Nov.; that on the facts proved Cooper was the agent of the appellant to sell to Plant and to make a contract with him for the sale of the stout, and that he had been held out as such agent to Plant by the appellant. It was further and alternatively contended that by reason of Plant's acceptance of the strong ale on the 7th Nov. 1902, and of the appellant's assent thereto, signified by his foregoing the additional price to which he was thereby entitled, a new contract was entered into and executed between Plant and the appellant for the sale of the strong ale by the appellant to Plant on the 7th Nov. 1902.

The Court of Quarter Sessions were of opinion that on the facts proved an executory contract for the sale of the stout was made at Plant's house at Rishton, and that therefore the court were bound by the authority of the judgments in the case of Stephenson v. Rogers (80 L. T. Rep. at p. 195) to hold that an offence had been committed within the meaning of the Licensing Act 1872, s. 3, and the court dismissed the appeal, but reduced the fine of 50*l.* imposed by the petty sessions to 20*l.*

The question for the opinion of the court was whether or not the decision of the Court of Quarter Sessions was right.

If the court should be of opinion that it was right, then the order of quarter sessions dismissing the appeal was to be confirmed.

If the court should be of opinion that it was not right, then the order of quarter sessions was to be quashed.

Sect. 3 of the Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94) provides :

No person shall sell or expose for sale by retail any intoxicating liquor without being duly licensed to sell the same, or at any place where he is not authorised by his licence to sell the same. Any person selling or exposing for sale by retail any intoxicating liquor which he is not licensed to sell by retail, or selling or exposing for sale any intoxicating liquor at any place where he is not authorised by his licence to sell the same, shall be subject to the following penalties. . . .

Roskill, K.C. (William Mackenzie with him) for the appellant.—The facts in the present case are absolutely identical with the facts in the recent case of Walker v. Walker (67 J. P. 452), in which this court decided that there was no sale off the licensed premises and that no offence under sect. 3 had been committed. The authorities show that to constitute a sale at the licensed premises two things are necessary, the order must be accepted at the licensed premises and the goods must be appropriated on the licensed premises. If both those things concur, then the sale is a sale at the licensed premises and not elsewhere. In the present case both those things concurred at the licensed premises; there was the acceptance of the order there and the goods were set aside and appropriated there, so that there was a binding contract only at the licensed premises. It is immaterial that the delivery was at Plant's house. In Pletts v. Beattie (74 L. T. Rep. 148; (1896) 1 Q. B. 519) Wills, J. points out the distinction between a sale and a delivery, and he says: "I think that it is clear that although the delivery of the beer was to be at Accrington, the sale was at Burnley. Sale and delivery are two distinct elements in a contract for the sale of goods. . . . Those provisions"—that is, the provisions of the Licensing Act—"are satisfied if the substantial elements of a sale take place on the licensed premises, though the beer is consumed or delivered off them." Wright, J. in the same case points out that the fact of the order being taken at the customer's door does not prevent the sale from being a sale at the licensed premises; and in Pletts v. Campbell (73 L. T. Rep. 344; (1895) 2 Q. B. 229, at p. 233) he points out that if the jars were addressed or otherwise appropriated to the customer before leaving the licensed premises, it would necessarily make a difference in the licence-holder's liability, in favour of the licence-holder. That is what took place here, as the jar in this case was addressed and appropriated to Plant before it left the licensed premises. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In any of these cases was the beer to be paid for on delivery? Yes, in Walker v. Walker (ubi sup.), where the facts are the same as the present. When the order is accepted—which it was in this case at the licensed premises—then there is a contract. He also referred to Hewitt v. Jervis, 38 L. J. 365, July 18, 1903.

E. Bankes, K.C. (W. Whately with him) for the respondent.—The question is entirely one of fact, and the justices here so dealt with it, and convicted the appellant. The substance of the transaction was that already a completed contract for sale was made at the customer's house, although the traveller went through the form of giving the postcard to the customer. If that be so, then the fact that the appellant's servants selected and appropriated the beer at the licensed premises makes no difference, and the justices upon these facts have found—and they were right in so finding—that there was an executory contract for sale at Plant's house. With regard to the cases, Pletts v. Beattie (ubi sup.) does not apply, as all the court there held was that under the particular circumstances of that case all the essential elements of the contract of sale were made at the licensed premises. It was never decided in terms that in these cases an executory contract of sale was enough until Channell, J. decided it in Stephenson v. Rogers (80 L. T. Rep. 193, at p. 196). Channell, J. there clearly decides that an executory contract of sale is enough to bring the case within the statute. He says: "On the whole, therefore, the authorities seem to me to be fairly clear to show that an executory contract is within the section, and that it is not necessary, in order to make the transaction an offence, that property should have passed." Walker v. Walker (ubi sup.) is distinguishable in this, that the licence-holder did exercise his own judgment as to whether he would execute the order or not. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I am not quite satisfied that an executory contract of sale off the licensed premises is sufficient; I think you must argue the main question whether what was said by Channell, J. that an executory contract would do is right.] Sect. 3 says "no person shall 'sell,'" and the word "sell" includes an agreement to sell (sect. 1 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893). In dealing with an executory contract of sale it is sufficient if there be a completed agreement to sell and to buy, and the executory contract of sale, plus delivery, or completed by delivery, makes a complete sale, or a completed contract of sale. The intention was that the sale of intoxicating liquors should only take place at certain places which could be controlled. [KENNEDY, J.—Has it ever been held that a mere agreement for the sale brings the case within the section? Sect. 62 of the Act, where wide words are used as to what is necessary in proving a sale, and the judgment of Channell, J. in Stephenson v. Rogers (ubi sup.) show that. The distinction is between the case where a person acts as a mere conduit-pipe to convey the order, as in Pletts v. Beattie (ubi sup.), in which case the sale would not be at the unlicensed place, and the case where the person goes and accepts and has power to accept the order at the customer's house, in which there would be a sale at that house. In Guild v. Freeman (36 Sc. L. Rep. 6) it was held under similar circumstances that the sale took place at the unlicensed premises. The whole question really turns on the view as to what took place at the customer's house. There is no suggestion here that the purchaser assented to an appropriation of the goods at the vendor's place of business. On the facts the justices were abundantly justified in coming to the conclusion to which they came. It is submitted, first, that there was an executory contract of sale at the customer's house, and next, that an executory contract of sale, even without delivery, but, at any rate, if followed by delivery, is sufficient to bring the case within the section. There is no decision to the contrary, and there is authority, especially the judgment of Channell, J., in support of that view. [He also referred to Pletts v. Campbell (ubi sup.).]

STRICKLAND (app.) v. WHITTAKER (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

Roskill, K.C. in reply.—By sect. 2 (2) of the Judicature Act 1894, this court can draw inferences of fact on appeals from quarter sessions. There is no statement in the case that Cooper had authority to accept orders; there is a clear statement that he had no such authority. As to the question of executory contract, there are only two cases which deal with it: Stallard v. Marks (38 L. T. Rep. 566, 3 Q. B. Div. 412) and Guild v. Freeman (ubi sup.); the dictum of Channell, J. on that point is merely obiter. There was here no contract at all at Plant's house. It was, both to the knowledge of the purchaser and of the traveller, a mere traveller's order to transmit.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In these licensing cases it is extremely important, when principles have been laid down in deciding them, that those principles should be applied in subsequent cases where there is really no substantial difference in the facts. The case of Walker v. Walker (ubi sup.) has been relied on by counsel for the appellant as an authority in his favour on all the points which have been raised. I do not, however, think he was quite entitled to use it in that way. It is quite true that it is very difficult to find any substantial difference in the facts of the two cases; but, on the other hand, it is quite plain from the report that the argument that has been addressed to us with reference to an executory contract being sufficient to bring a case within the section was not presented to the court in that case, and was not the point on which the decision was based. There having been a contention there that there was no appropriation of the goods on the licensed premises and that the property in the goods did not pass until actual delivery, the facts were that the order was taken to the licensed premises and accepted there by the licensee, and that there was a setting aside of the goods and their subsequent delivery. The court there thought, on the authorities, that those facts did not show a sale off the licensed premises, but that the contract, if any, was made on the licensed premises. That short statement of the effect of the judgment showed that the court there were not applying their minds to the point, which does not seem to have been raised there, as to whether or not an executory contract by the agent of the licensed person would be sufficient to constitute an offence within sect. 3 of the Act. I may also remark that Channell, J. was also a party to that judgment, and in all probability, if any question had been raised on that point, he would have directed attention to the case of Stephenson v. Rogers (ubi sup.). That being so, it will probably have to be decided some day or other whether an executory contract made by the traveller with the authority of the licensed person brings the licensed person within the Act. Speaking for myself, after having heard the point argued on both sides, the inclination of my mind at present is that it would do so. I am inclined to the opinion indicated by Channell, J. in Stephenson v. Rogers (ubi sup.), and probably intimated by Wright, J. in the case of Pletts v. Campbell (ubi sup.), and to a certain extent supported by the case of Stallard v. Marks (ubi sup.), and by the Scotch case of Guild v. Freeman (ubi sup.), which has been referred to. But as I do not think that the point really arises in this case, I must not be supposed to express a definite opinion upon the point. It is a very important question which may some day arise, and it is better to reserve any decision upon it until it does arise. With regard to the particular facts of this case, I have come to the conclusion that in this case as stated there was no evidence on which the magistrates ought to have found that there was an executory contract entered into by Cooper on the occasion of his interview with Plant. There was at the most evidence of the acceptance of an order to be transmitted to his principal, who might himself act upon it. Referring to the earlier transactions between the appellant and Plant, Plant or Mrs. Plant had from time to time ordered stout from the appellant by letter addressed to the appellant, and on one occasion had given a verbal order through Cooper. On this particular occasion Mrs. Plant did not think it necessary to use the postcard which was left with her in order that she might order goods on that or on some future occasion. I do not find anything in what passed between Plant and Cooper to show an acceptance of a contract of sale. What are the other facts in the case? As I have said, I do not think it necessary to draw fine distinctions in these licensing matters. Travellers canvassing for orders are undoubtedly common incidents in the wine and spirit trade as in many other trades, and I think it would be a startling proposition to say that the mere forwarding an order was sufficient evidence of the acceptance of a contract. It seems to me that the course of business here prescribed, that no order was to be accepted in the sense of a contract, nor goods delivered, until the orders were first handed into the office and entered in the order-book, and that any person infringing that rule would be instantly dismissed, did point to the fact that it was not intended that the taking of an order to be afterwards transmitted should be the acceptance of a contract. I think that the magistrates meant to say that Cooper was a person who was to canvas for orders, and they set out the restrictions or rules under which he was to do so, and then they found that Plant had not any notice of those restrictions, or of any limitation on Cooper's authority. Looking at these facts, and comparing them with the facts in Walker v. Walker (ubi sup.), in my opinion there was no evidence on which the magistrates ought to have come to the conclusion that there was an executory contract made at Plant's house for the sale of the beer. So far as the written rules went, there was no evidence of Cooper's authority, in fact, to accept contracts; and, so far as the previous practice went, there was no evidence that the appellant had authorised him to accept contracts. It seems to me that the only inference that the magistrates ought to have drawn was that Cooper was there to take orders and transmit them to headquarters, where they might be accepted or not, as the appellant liked. I do not know that much is to be gained by referring to the authorities beyond saying that in the case of Pletts v. Campbell (ubi sup.) the court, on the facts there stated, came to the conclusion that the substantial part of the transaction took place at the customer's place of business, or, at any rate, not on the licensed premises. In Pletts v. Beattie (ubi sup.), where a postcard had been sent, the court came to the conclusion that there had been no sale off the licensed premises. In Stephenson v. Rogers (ubi sup.), the court came to the same conclusion, and they came to the same result in Walker v. Walker (ubi sup.). The setting aside and appropriation of the goods at the licensed premises where the order was received was also a matter to be taken into consideration. Looking at all the facts fairly, I can see no evidence of anything more than an acceptance of an order, the forwarding of that order to headquarters, and the dealing with that order by the principal, so as to show that the contract—even the executory contract—was not made until the order had been entered and the authority of Cooper to make it ratified. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the principle acted upon in the case of Walker v. Walker (ubi sup.) applies to this case, and that there was no sufficient evidence of an executory contract for sale by Cooper, so as to raise the point as to the sufficiency of an executory contract, which was discussed by Channell, J. in Stephenson v. Rogers (ubi sup.). I therefore think that this appeal should be allowed.

[K.B. Div.]

KINGSLAND (app.) v. HABEN (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

WILLS, J. concurred, being of opinion that the facts showed that there was no executory contract made at Plant's house, and added: With regard to the question whether an executory contract made at the purchaser's house does bring a case within the words of the section constituting the offence, I would rather reserve anything in the nature of a judgment. The impression, however, left on my mind by the arguments which have been addressed to us, is rather in favour of the view that an executory contract is sufficient; but I still emphatically desire to keep an open mind on the question, in case it should come up before us on a future occasion, because it is impossible for any mind, however experienced in judicial matters, to approach a question which it was not necessary to decide in the same spirit as as if it had to be decided. On the question whether there was really any evidence of a completed sale at Plant's house at Rishton, my opinion had somewhat fluctuated during the course of the argument, but I have ultimately come to the conclusion that the view expressed by the Lord Chief Justice is correct.

KENNEDY, J. concurred.—As to the point whether an executory contract would be sufficient without more to constitute a violation of the section in question, as I desire entirely to reserve it for careful consideration, I do not wish to say, and in fact it would be quite useless to say, what the inclination of my mind is on that point.

Appeal allowed. Order of quarter sessions quashed.

KINGSLAND (app.) v. HABEN (resp.). (a)

Metropolis management — Drains — By-laws — Reconstruction of drain of old building — Necessity of intercepting trap — Work "in any building" — Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 202.

By a by-law made under the powers of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 it was provided that every person who should construct or reconstruct any pipe or drain, or other means of communicating with sewers, so far as he should effect any such works "in any building" erected before the confirmation of the by-laws, should provide in such drain a suitable and efficient intercepting trap.

Held, that the word "in"—in the words "in any building"—meant, not "inside the building," but "in connection with the building," and that consequently the by-law applied to the reconstruction of a drain in connection with an old building erected before the confirmation of the by-laws, as the reconstruction of the drain was a work "in" such building, although such drain was outside the building, and that such drain ought to be reconstructed with an efficient intercepting trap, as required by the by-law.

CASE stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

The appellant was a builder carrying on business at Upper Clapton, in the county of London, and the respondent was a sanitary inspector of the metropolitan borough of Hackney.

The appellant was employed by the owner of the messuage and premises No. 181, High-street, Homerton, within the borough, to carry out certain repairs to the premises, and in the exercise of such employment reconstructed a drain upon the premises. The messuage, premises, and the drain so reconstructed were shown upon a plan annexed to the case.

The drain commenced in a water-closet constituting an outbuilding or back addition to the messuage, passed through the back yard of the messuage into the adjoining premises No. 183, High-street, where, uniting with a drain of the last-mentioned premises, it became a sewer within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts, and of the by-laws hereinafter mentioned. The messuage and water-closet were erected before the confirmation of the by-laws.

By by-laws under sect. 202 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, made by the London County Council on the 13th Oct. 1900, confirmed at a subsequent meeting of that council on the 6th Nov. 1900, and approved by the Local Government Board on the 14th June 1901, it was provided as follows:

By-law 5. Every person who shall erect a new building shall provide in every main drain or other drain of such building which may immediately communicate with any sewer, a suitable and efficient intercepting trap at a point as distant as may be practicable from such building, and as near as may be practicable to the point at which such drain may be in connection with the sewer. He shall, except in cases where the means of access to be provided in compliance with the preceding by-law, give adequate means of access to such trap, and provide a separate manhole or other separate means of access to such trap for the purpose of cleansing it.

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[K.B. Div.]

By-law 21. These by-laws shall, so far as practicable, apply to any person who shall construct or reconstruct any pipe or drain, or other means of communication with sewers, or any trap or apparatus connected therewith, so far as he shall effect any such works in any building erected before the confirmation of these by-laws, as if the same were being constructed in a building newly erected.

The appellant did not provide in the drain a suitable and efficient or any intercepting trap, and an information was accordingly laid by the respondent before the magistrate that he had reconstructed the drain without providing therein an intercepting trap and a separate manhole or other separate means of access to the trap for the purpose of cleansing it in accordance with the by-laws. Apart from the providing of the intercepting trap and manhole or other means of access thereto, the drain was laid by the appellant in a satisfactory manner.

The magistrate was of opinion that the water-closet being a building erected before the confirmation of the by-laws, the reconstruction of the drain was a work "in" such building within the meaning of the foregoing by-law 21, and he convicted the appellant of the offence charged, and adjudged that he should pay a penalty of 20s., and two guineas costs.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate was right in holding that the reconstruction of the drain was a work in a building within the meaning of such by-law as aforesaid.

Sect. 202 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), gave power to make by-laws for (amongst other things) "regulating the dimensions, form, and mode of construction, and the keeping, cleansing, and repairing of the pipes, drains, and other means of communicating with sewers, and the traps and apparatus connected therewith."

Courthope-Munroe for the appellant. — The magistrate was wrong in holding that the reconstruction of the drain was a work "in" the building, within the meaning of by-law 21. By-law 5 deals with new buildings and with persons erecting new buildings, and provides that the person erecting any new building shall provide in every drain of such building, which may immediately communicate with any sewer, an efficient intercepting trap, and so forth. Then by-law 21 deals with old buildings—that is, buildings erected before the confirmation of the by-laws—and provides that the previous by-law is to apply to a person who shall construct or reconstruct any pipe, drain, or other means of communicating with sewers, so far as he shall effect any such works "in any building" erected before the confirmation of the by-laws, as if the same were thereby constructed in a newly-erected building. The word "in" in the expression "in any building" means "inside" the building. By-law 21 does not apply at all in a case of this kind; it applies only to work done "inside" the building. The construction of the two by-laws taken together is this, that if a person is erecting a new building, then (by by-law 5) he is to build it with all modern improvements, and he is to provide all the drains of such building, which may communicate with sewers, with efficient intercepting traps; but if he is merely reconstructing the drains of an old building—as the appellant was in this case—then, if he effects any such works "in" that is, "inside" the building, he is also to provide suitable intercepting traps, but if the works are outside the building, he is under no such obligation. Here the building was an old building, and therefore by-law 5 does not apply; and inasmuch as the reconstruction of the drain was work effected outside the building, by-law 21 does not apply. The magistrate was therefore wrong in his construction of the by-law, and the appellant ought not to have been convicted. He referred to Metropolitan Industrial Dwellings Company v. Long, 68 J. P. 113.

Arory, K.C. (Thomas Bevan with him), for the respondent, was not called upon.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I should be sorry to think that in construing the words "in any building" in by-law 21 we ought to be driven to construe the word "in" literally, as meaning "inside within the walls" when we are applying by-law 5 to that state of things. I am not at all sure that in one sense it would not be correct to say that these are not the drains in the building, but to my mind we do not want to put our decision on that narrow ground. It seems to me that we have got here a by-law which says that when you are making a drain of such building which may immediately communicate with any sewer you are to put in a sufficient, suitable, and efficient intercepting trap, which is, of course, a most desirable thing. This, if it is applicable, is intended to be applied under by-law 21, and it is material to observe that by-law 21 relates directly to the reconstructing of pipes or drains. Every person who shall construct or reconstruct any pipe or drain, or other means of communicating with sewers, or any trap or apparatus connected therewith, so far as he shall effect any such works in any building erected before the confirmation of these by-laws, shall do the same as if it were a new building. I cannot think that that means that the pipes or drains there referred to, which, in the majority of cases so far as this work is concerned, must be outside the actual walls are to be limited to works which are inside the building, and that the word "in" there means "inside." In my opinion, the word "in" does mean "in reference to" or "in connection with," and does not mean "inside," and certainly this is a case in which, as we have to apply the by-law, we ought to apply it in, as it appears to me, the only reasonable way in which it can be applied. Therefore I think the magistrate was perfectly right.

WILLS, J.—I entirely agree.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

NORFOLK COUNTY COUNCIL v. GREEN AND ANOTHER.

[K.B. Div.]

Saturday, March 5.
(Before WALTON, J.)

NORFOLK COUNTY COUNCIL v. GREEN AND ANOTHER. (a)

Highways — Repair — Extraordinary traffic — Extraordinary expenses for repairs — Haulage of timber over roads — Timber the natural produce of land — Period of limitation for recovery of expenses — "Particular work extending over long period" — Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 23 — Locomotives Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 29), s. 12, sub-s. 1 (b).

The defendants for a period extending over two years bought from the owner of an estate a large quantity of timber which was felled on the estate, and the timber was hauled by the defendants to the railway station over two roads for a distance of between two and three miles on each road, the haulage being done partly by horses and partly by a traction engine. The quantity of timber so hauled was about 1500 tons, and the felling and hauling were done under several separate contracts extending over the two years. During this period the traffic of the defendants over the roads was unusual traffic, did unusual damage to the roads, and caused unusual expenses in repairing the roads, which were constructed to bear ordinary country traffic, usually agricultural traffic.

In an action brought by the highway authority to recover the expenses of repairing the roads, as being "extraordinary expenses" incurred by them in consequence of the "extraordinary traffic" within sect. 23 of the Highways and Locomotives Act 1878, the defendants alleged that the timber was the natural produce of the land and that the carting of such produce to the railway station was ordinary traffic and an ordinary user of the road.

Held, that, having regard to the total weight carried, the frequency of the loads and the means by which it was carried, the traffic was "extraordinary traffic" within the meaning of sect. 23, and the fact that the timber was the natural produce of the land did not, under the circumstances, prevent the traffic from being "extraordinary," or the expenses from being "extraordinary expenses," which the highway authority were entitled to recover.

Held, further, that the work was not a "particular work extending over a long period" within the meaning of sect. 12, sub-sect. 1 (b), of the Locomotives Act 1898, and that therefore the sub-section did not give the highway authority the right to bring their action for the recovery of the whole of the expenses within six months after the completion of the work, and consequently that by the sub-section their claim was barred for any expenses incurred more than twelve months before the commencement of the action.

ACTION tried before Walton, J. without a jury.

The plaintiffs, the Norfolk County Council, alleged, in their statement of claim, that they were liable to repair the main roads therein mentioned—namely, the Norwich and Stalham-road and the Barton and Neatishead-road, and a bridge carrying the latter road over a stream, situate in the county of Norfolk—and that they had incurred extraordinary expenses in repairing the same by reason of the damage arising from the excessive weight passed along such roads and the extraordinary traffic conducted thereon, by or in consequence of the orders of the defendants, during the three years ending the 31st March 1902, and the plaintiffs claimed in respect thereof the sum of 677l. 2s. 7d., the action having been commenced on the 4th Aug. 1902.

The defendant Edward Green, in his defence said (inter alia) that on the 20th Oct. 1900 the partnership subsisting between himself and his co-defendant (Edward Harry Green) was duly determined, and that since that date he had no interest in and had taken no part in the management of the business, in respect of which the plaintiffs' claim was alleged to have arisen; and he also relied on the defence of his co-defendant.

The defendant Edward Harry Green, in his defence said (inter alia) that he used the main roads in question, if and when he used the same during such period, properly and with due care, for an ordinary trade of the district—namely, the periodical haulage of timber cut by the defendant from woods adjoining or served by such main roads.

As to the whole of the plaintiffs' claim the defendant relied on the provisions of sect. 12, sub-sect. 1 (b), of the Locomotives Act 1898, and submitted that the plaintiffs could not recover any expenses incurred in respect of damage done to those main roads and bridge more than six months, or alternatively more than twelve months before the commencement of this action.

Alternatively, the defendant, while denying all liability, brought into court the sum of 110l., and said that that sum was sufficient to satisfy the whole of the plaintiffs' claim.

Sect. 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), under the heading "Extraordinary Traffic," provides:

Where by a certificate of their surveyor it appears to the authority which is liable or has undertaken to repair any highway, whether a main road or not, that, having regard to the average expense of repairing highways in the neighbourhood, extraordinary expenses have been incurred by such authority in repairing such highway by reason of the damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same, or extraordinary traffic thereon, such authority may recover in a summary manner from any person by whose order such weight or traffic has been conducted the amount of such expenses as may be proved to the satisfaction of the court having cognisance of the case to have been incurred by such authority by reason of the damage arising from such weight or traffic as aforesaid.

The Locomotives Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 29) provides:

Sect. 12 (1). Section twenty-three of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act 1878 (which relates to the recovery of expenses of extraordinary traffic), shall be amended as follows: (a) Expenses under that section shall cease to be recoverable in a summary manner, but may be recovered if not exceeding two hundred and fifty pounds in the County Court, and if exceeding that sum in the High Court. (b) Proceedings for the recovery of any expenses incurred after the passing of this Act shall be commenced within twelve months of the time at which the damage has been done, or where the damage is the consequence of any par-

Cur. adv. vult.

March 5.—WALTON, J. delivered the following judgment: This is an action by the Norfolk County Council against Edward Green and Edward Harry Green, and the plaintiffs say in their statement of claim that they are liable to repair the main roads which are hereinafter mentioned, and that they have incurred extraordinary expenses in repairing the same by reason of the damage arising from the excessive weight passed along such roads, and the extraordinary traffic conducted thereon, by or in consequence of the orders of the defendants during the three years ending the 31st March 1902, and the roads in respect of which the claim is made are stated to be the Norwich and Stalham-road and the Barton and Neatishead-road. The facts are to a large extent admitted. Between the year 1897 and March 1902—the claim extending up to the 31st March 1902—a considerable quantity of timber was felled on the Beeston estate, which is in the north-eastern part of Norfolk, between Norwich and the sea, Beeston Park lying on the road from Norwich and Wroxham to Stalham. About the year 1894, Sir Philip Preston, the life tenant of the Beeston estate, died, and he was succeeded by Sir Henry, who died four years later, in 1897. The trustees of the estate after Sir Henry's death had heavy expenses to meet. It happened that at this time there was upon the estate a good deal of fallen timber which had been blown down in a gale. The trustees found that they could raise a considerable sum by the sale of this and other timber, and accordingly between 1897 and March 1902, they sold a large quantity of timber. The first sales in 1897, in 1898, and 1899 were made to a timber merchant named Woods, but early in 1900 the trustees found that they could make better terms with the defendants, Messrs. Green, and from that date they dealt with them, making sales to them from time to time during 1900 and 1901. These sales were separate transactions, and the trustees might at any time in 1900 or 1901 have ceased to do business with Messrs. Green, and Messrs. Green might at any time have ceased to buy timber from the trustees. The timber thus bought by the defendants was hauled by them for the most part to Wroxham station and over the roads in respect of which the claim arises—that is to say, the Wroxham and Stalham-road and the Barton and Neatishead-road. The principal claim is in respect of the Wroxham and Stalham-road. The length of the road affected in each case was between two and three miles. In the statement of claim the length of the Stalham-road is described as a little over three miles, but the part really affected was, I think, rather less—something under three miles. The quantity of timber hauled by the defendants between the early part of 1900 and March 1902 was about 1510 tons. The haulage was done partly by horses and partly by traction engines. As I understand, the total quantity of timber sold by the trustees produced a sum of about 5000*l.* The quantity sold to the defendants realised or produced a price of about 4000*l.* These are approximately the figures, although I do not know that they are absolutely accurate. The roads in question were ordinary country roads, constructed to bear ordinary country traffic. The usual traffic over the roads was agricultural traffic, and no doubt the roads were used to some extent by brewers' drays, and occasionally by other traffic of a similar description so far as weight is concerned. I ought to mention here that the defendant Edward Green retired from partnership with his co-defendant Edward Harry Green in Oct. 1900, and is not responsible for what was done after that date. Now, a great deal of evidence was given as to the use of the roads by the defendants, and I have come to the conclusion undoubtedly that during the two years in question—that is, from the early part of 1900 up to the 31st March 1902—the traffic of the defendants over the roads in question was—I use the term advisedly—unusual, and did unusual damage to the roads, so occasioning unusual expense to the plaintiffs. The question which I have to determine is whether the traffic was extraordinary traffic within the meaning of sect. 23 of the Highways and Locomotives Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77). There was evidence that the north-east part of Norfolk is well wooded, and that large quantities of timber are sometimes felled in that district and carried to railway stations, but I am satisfied that the two roads in question have, so far as I have heard, never been used for traffic of the kind which was put upon the roads by the defendants in the years 1900, 1901, and to some extent in the early part of 1902, having regard to the quantity carried, the period within which it was carried, and the means by which it was carried. I do not think that in this district there is anything like a regular system of cultivation of timber for the purpose of sale, such as was proved in the case of Raglan Highway Board v. Monmouth Steam Company (46 J. P. 598). It may be and probably is the fact that in former years, and before the felling of the Beeston estate began, loads of timber passed over these roads; traction engines were sometimes used on the roads before 1900, but in my judgment only occasionally, and never to the extent to which the defendants' traction engine was used during the two years in question. Now, it is said that the timber was the natural produce of the land, just like grain, barley, or wheat, or potatoes or turnips, and that the carting of such produce to the railway station must be the ordinary traffic over the roads, heavier at sometimes than at others, heavier upon particular roads than upon others, but still, speaking broadly, the natural and ordinary use of the roads. I find that that contention was put forward in the case of Williams v. Davies (44 J. P. 347). In the judgment in the Court of Appeal in Hill v. Thomas (69 L. T. Rep. 553; (1893) 2 Q. B. 333), that case was discussed, and I think almost all the other cases of importance, which had been decided before the year 1893, were discussed, and with regard to Williams v. Davies (ubi sup.), what Lord Bowen, who delivered the judgment of the

NORFOLK COUNTY COUNCIL v. GREEN AND ANOTHER.

[K.B. Div.]

Court of Appeal in that case, said was this: "The first case to be noticed is that of Williams v. Davies (ubi sup.). The defendant had bought timber near a railway station which was conveyed in waggons in sixty-seven loads between Christmas and March. The timber was purchased in the ordinary course of business, but the sixty-seven loads of timber were a greater number of timber-loads than usually passed over the roads in question in three consecutive months, and the heavier loads were heavier than the loads of ordinary agricultural produce. The magistrates held that the sixty-seven loads of timber were in the aggregate excessive weight and extraordinary traffic. The Court of Queen's Bench (Lush and Bowen, JJ.) held that the justices were right. 'What the traffic was to be compared with,' said Lush, J. 'was the ordinary traffic along the road,' and the fact that the timber was the natural produce of the land did not prevent the traffic being held as extraordinary." Another way of putting the same contention, or practically the same contention, is that the carting of timber, which is no doubt felled sometimes, and sometimes in large quantities, is just one of the things that the roads were made for. That is a proposition which I think cannot be disputed. Nobody suggests that the use made by the defendants of these roads was not a lawful use. In that sense it was not an abuse of the roads. They had a right to use the roads, and they had a right to use the roads in the way in which they did use them. But the question is, who has got to pay, and, if the defendants used them for the purposes of extraordinary traffic within the meaning of the statute, and caused extraordinary expense, although they were perfectly justified in using the roads, and although, in that sense, the roads were made for such use, still they have got to pay the extraordinary cost of repairing the extraordinary damage which their extraordinary traffic did. I may again refer to what Lord Bowen said in the case of Hill v. Thomas (ubi sup.), at p. 339; (1893) 2 Q. B., at the beginning of his judgment. He there gives that which is, I think, now always recognised to be the true definition, the authoritative definition, of what extraordinary traffic is. He says: "The most important question we have to consider is the true meaning to be placed on the words 'damage caused by extraordinary traffic.' We may begin by observing that the object of the section is not to prohibit extraordinary traffic, but to lay the extra expense of damage done by such traffic to the road on the right shoulders—namely, upon those who caused the damage, and to whose benefit it enured. The section, in the second place, distinguishes between 'excessive weight' and 'extraordinary traffic.' The damage done by 'extraordinary traffic' may, therefore, in the eyes of the Legislature, differ from that done by 'excessive weight.' Traffic, thirdly, is a nomen collectivum—a collective term—a noun of multitude. It does not, like 'excessive weight,' apply merely to the cargo carried by a single vehicle; it is large enough to include the continuous or repeated user of the road by various vehicles belonging to one owner. Finally, extraordinary traffic, according to the plain use of language, is traffic which is not of the common order of traffic. And, taking all these considerations together, and especially when we remember that the object of the section is to provide for the expense of such extraordinary traffic as does damage to a highway, we shall arrive at the following result—namely, that 'extraordinary traffic,' as distinct from 'excessive weight,' will include all such continuous or repeated user of the road by a person's vehicles as is out of the common order of traffic, and as may be calculated to damage the highway and increase the expenditure on its repair." That is the test which I have to apply in this case, and having regard to the weight carried, to the frequency of the loads—that is to say, to the total weight carried during this period, which is a period of two years—and having regard to the means by which it was carried, the vehicles and traction employed, I have come to the conclusion that the defendants' traffic was extraordinary traffic within the definition or description given by the Court of Appeal in the case of Hill v. Thomas (ubi sup.). But that does not dispose of the present case, because the defendants contend that the plaintiffs' claim is to a large extent barred by a limitation which is imposed by sect. 12, sub-sect. 1 (b), of the Locomotives Act 1898. The total claim is for the damage done during the two years which I have mentioned—that is to say, between the early part of 1900 and the 31st March 1902. In saying that the claim was for two years, I am dealing not with the formal claim made in the action, but with the facts as they came out at the trial, and at the trial it was proved that the traffic in question began early in 1900. It is difficult to say exactly when, but still early in 1900, and the claim, of course, extends only to the 31st March 1902, and as the figures worked out at the trial—again I am not giving them as a finding by myself, but merely as I think they were put forward by counsel for the plaintiffs in his reply—the total claim in respect of both roads amounted to something under 450*l.* But now the defendants say that a large part of that claim is barred by the limitation to which I have referred. Sect. 12, sub-sect. 1 (b), of the Locomotives Act 1898 enacts as follows: "Proceedings for the recovery of any expenses incurred after the passing of this Act shall be commenced within twelve months of the time at which the damage has been done, or where the damage is the consequence of any particular building contract, or work extending over a long period, shall be commenced not later than six months after the completion of the contract or work." Now the writ in this action was issued on the 4th Aug. 1902. The defendants contend that the claim, by virtue of sect. 12, sub-sect. 1 (b), must be barred to damage done during the twelve months prior to the 4th Aug. 1902—that is to say, that it must be confined to the expense of repairing damage done after the 4th Aug. 1901—and prima facie that is so, unless the plaintiffs can bring themselves within the second part of the sub-section, because the sub-section says that the proceedings must be commenced within twelve months of the time at which the damage has been done, or, and this is the second part of the sub-section, "where the damage is the consequence of any particular building contract, or work extending over a long period, shall be commenced not later than six months after the completion of the contract or work." The plaintiffs say that this was damage which was the consequence of "particular work extending over a long period," and that they did

[K.B. Div.]

WALKERS, WINSER, AND CO. v. SHAW, SON, AND CO.

[K.B. Div.]

commence their action not later than six months after the completion of such work. That is the contention of the plaintiffs. That depends upon whether the work in question, which I may describe as the felling and haulage of this timber from the Beeston estate was a "particular work" within the meaning of this sub-section. As I have said, the felling and hauling of this 1500 tons of timber was not done under any one single contract to begin with. That may not be a conclusive test; but in fact it was not. It really was the haulage of timber which, as it happened, had been bought from time to time by several separate contracts, contracts made in each of the years in question, and it appears to me clear that when one contract was made and the timber included in that contract was felled and hauled away, it was never certain that there would be another contract or that any more timber would be felled. Nobody could say when this work would be finished, if it was a work within the meaning of the sub-section; so far as I know, I do not know whether it is finished now. It is a mere question for how long it would be convenient and profitable for the defendants to buy timber from the trustees of the Beeston estate, and for how long it might be convenient and profitable for the trustees to sell the timber to the defendants and not to sell to somebody else, or not to sell at all. I think that "particular work" in this sub-section must be construed to some extent with reference to the other words of this part of the sub-section. The words are: "Where the damage is the consequence of any particular building contract or work." I think "particular work" must be particular work, something in the nature of, something similar to, a building contract. I do not think that this was work within the meaning of that sub-section, and, therefore, although this, in my judgment, was extraordinary traffic, I do not think that the plaintiffs can recover for any expense incurred in respect of damage done prior to the 4th Aug. 1901. One of the plaintiffs' witnesses, a man named Bunn, who was in charge of this part of the road up to March 1902, said that he did not remember seeing the traction engine in the latter part of 1901, and, according to the plaintiffs' case, the damage to the roads was mainly due to the use of the traction engine. The expense in respect of which the claim is made for the year 1901-2 was, as appears from the evidence, mainly and substantially incurred before the end of the year 1901. There is other evidence which points to this that after Aug. 1901 there was not a great deal of extraordinary traffic or of expense incurred attributable to the extraordinary traffic. I think there was some. It is extremely difficult for me to say how much, but, as I think there was some, I must give the plaintiffs something, and I must assess it as well as I can, though in making assessments of this kind one is very often obliged to do so by something very like guesswork. Doing the best I can with the materials before me, I believe there was some damage, and some damage after the 4th Aug. 1901, and some expenses incurred in consequence of that, and I think I shall be doing no injustice to the defendants if I assess that at the sum of 75*l*. I have considered, having regard to my judgment, whether I ought to deal with the other question about which there is a very great deal of evidence—namely, as to what expense the plaintiffs were put to during the years 1900 and 1901, and before the 4th Aug. 1901, or in respect of damage done before the 4th Aug. 1901, in repairing the roads and in repairing the extra damage to the roads caused by the extraordinary traffic. I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs can recover this 75*l*. and no more. It is not necessary for me, if I am right, to consider this other question, which is a very troublesome and difficult question. I have thought it better not to deal with it at present, but to leave it over and simply to give judgment upon the points which I was obliged to consider—namely, the question whether there was any extraordinary traffic, or any claim in respect thereof, and, if so, how much. My judgment is that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover 75*l*. and that sum only. If there should be an appeal, and if the Court of Appeal should take a different view of the case from that which I take, and if it should be necessary to assess the amount of expense incurred in 1900 and 1901, I shall be quite prepared, if the parties desire it, to deal with that question upon the evidence which I have got, but for the present I do not deal with it.

WALKERS, WINSER, AND CO. v. SHAW, SON, AND CO. (a)

Custom—Sale of goods—Right to reject—Custom limiting right—Validity—Custom incorporated in contracts—Powers of trade arbitrators.

By a custom a buyer of barley was not entitled to reject for difference or variation in quality unless the same was excessive or unreasonable and was so found by arbitration under the contract.

Held, that the custom was good.

Semble, that where a custom applicable to contracts in a certain trade comes to be incorporated as an express term in the contracts of that trade, the proper inference to be drawn is that it destroys that custom as a custom.

Apart from custom or contract, an arbitrator has no jurisdiction to award a money compensation instead of rejection, where such right to reject exists.

AWARD in the form of a special case.

The sellers, Walkers, Winsor, and Co., are grain merchants carrying on business in London, and the buyers, Shaw, Son, and Co., are grain merchants carrying on business in Hull, and having frequent transactions in grain on the London market.

By a contract in writing dated London, the 1st Oct. 1902, entered into after previous negotiation by telegrams and correspondence, the sellers agreed to sell and the buyers to purchase a quantity of about 500 tons of St. Malo barley, at time of shipment "to be about as per sample No. 373," for shipment in Oct. 1902, at the price of 23s. 6d. per 420lb. free on board, including freight and insurance to Hull, Grimsby, or Goole, the destination to be given when the vessel was ready to load. Amongst the further terms of the contract it was provided that any shipment in partial execution of the contract was to be deemed and accepted as if made under a separate contract, and that there should be no implied condition that the goods were free from latent defect. Payment was to be by net cash in London for invoice amount on presentation of and in exchange for bill of lading and policy of insurance, and any dispute arising out of the contract was to be left to arbitration in London in the usual way.

[K.B. Div.]

[K.B. Div.]

On the 3rd Oct. the sellers chartered the steamship Formby for the purpose of the contract, and by letter of the same date informed the buyers that the vessel was chartered for their purchase, and requested destination to be given.

The sellers, for the purposes of the sale and in pursuance and in partial execution of the contract, caused to be shipped from St. Malo a quantity of 414 tons 17cwt. 2qrs. 4lb. of barley by the steamship Formby and duly appropriated such shipment to the contract, and on the 7th Oct. the buyers gave directions for the destination of the vessel to be the Albert Dock, Hull, which directions were communicated to the master.

On the afternoon of the 8th Oct., after the vessel was partly loaded, the buyers (having previously requested and received from St. Malo a bulk sample of the barley shipped) by telegram sent from Hull at 4.30 p.m. requested the sellers to stop the shipment, alleging that the bulk sample differed from the selling sample, to which telegram the sellers replied on the same day that they were unable to stop the shipment.

The loading of the Formby was completed on the 9th Oct., and she forthwith sailed for Hull. The bill of lading was made out in the name of and to the order of F. Avril Fils, the actual shipper of the barley, and, after indorsement by him, passed into the hands of the Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris, from which it was obtained by the sellers. The sellers in taking up the bill of lading did so for and on behalf of the buyers for the purpose of enabling the latter to receive the barley at Hull, to which port they had ordered the ship, and not with the intention of reserving to themselves any power of disposing of the barley.

On the 9th Oct. the sellers forwarded to the buyers the invoice, amounting to 2505l. 16s. 1d., at the same time stating that the documents would, no doubt, be presented on the following Saturday, and inquiring at what London bank they (the sellers) were to present the same for payment. On the same day the buyers wrote to the sellers that, as they would not pay until proof of a proper shipment, it would be of no use to present the documents, and the arbitrator found as a fact that formal presentation of the shipping documents under the contract was waived by the buyers.

Further telegrams and correspondence passed between the parties, but no arrangement was come to, and the buyers still declined to pay for the documents.

On the 12th Oct. the sellers again wrote that they had the documents in their possession, and that they were still at the buyers' service against payment of 2000l. on account.

The Formby arrived in Hull on the 13th Oct., and, the buyers still refusing to take up and pay for the documents pursuant to the contract, the sellers landed the same for account of whom it might concern with Messrs. Laner and Harrison (whose names had been suggested by the buyers in the course of the correspondence) pending arbitration, and on the same day nominated their arbitrator.

On the barley being landed, it was ascertained that there was a deficiency of 27... quarters of the bill of lading quantity. The freight duty and landing charges were paid by the sellers, and amounted to 250l. 13s. 4d. The barley has since remained in store, with the exception of a small quantity sold by arrangement between the parties without prejudice to their respective rights.

No further tender of barley was made by the sellers to complete the total quantity contracted to be sold.

By the custom and usage of the London corn trade applicable to the sale of barley or other grain on contracts in the form employed in this case, a buyer is not entitled to reject for difference or variation in quality unless the same is excessive or unreasonable and is so found by arbitration under the contract.

This has been the custom in the corn trade in London for a very long period, and it has been adopted as one of the terms of the forms of contracts for sale of barley and other grain issued by the London Corn Trade Association since its incorporation in 1886, which forms are very largely used not only in the United Kingdom, but also throughout the British colonies and possessions, and on the Continent of Europe, and in America and elsewhere. The words inserted in the forms of contract are "difference in quality shall not entitle the buyers to reject except under the award of arbitrators or the committee of appeal, as the case may be." A similar rule has been adopted by the Corn Trade Associations of Liverpool and Hull as a rule in forms of contract issued by these associations.

It was contended before the arbitrator on behalf of the buyers that such a custom would be bad in law.

The barley shipped per the Formby, although somewhat inferior to the sale sample in quality, and in this respect not "about as per sample" so as to entitle the sellers to insist on payment of the full contract price without any allowance, was commercially within the contract, and the inferiority was not excessive or unreasonable, nor was it so great as to amount to a difference of description.

At the request of the buyers the arbitrator submitted the following as questions of law for the opinion of the court: (1) whether, by reason of the quantity of barley shipped by and discharged from the Formby being below the minimum named in the contract, the tender was a good tender under the contract; and (2) whether the above-mentioned custom or usage is bad in law, and, if so, whether, by reason of the inferiority of quality, the buyers were justified in entirely rejecting the barley per Formby, and in

WALKERS, WINSER, AND CO. v. SHAW, SON, AND CO.

[K.B. Div.]

refusing to accept the same subject to an allowance.

The evidence of the witnesses before the arbitrator formed part of the case.

Scrutton, K.C. and Loehnis for the buyers, Shaw, Son, and Co.—This custom is bad. The barley was to be "about as per sample," and the contract was made on that condition. The custom is contrary to that condition and so is void, as it contradicts the written contract. They referred to

The Alhambra, 43 L. T. Rep. 636; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 410; 6 P. Div. 68;

Barrow v. Dyster, 51 L. T. Rep. 573; 13 Q. B. Div. 635.

If it is good, then the seller could force the buyer to take goods different to what were ordered. It was laid down in Yates v. Pym (6 Taunt. 446; 16 R. R. 653) that a usage of trade cannot be set up in contravention of an express contract, and therefore, on a warranty of prime singed bacon, evidence was held not to be admissible to receive bacon to a certain degree tainted as prime singed bacon, nor of a practice to preclude the purchaser from all remedy if he does not discover and point out the defect by an early day. The custom is also unreasonable. They referred to Leuckhart v. Cooper, 3 Bing. N. C. 99; 43 R. R. 602; Sea Steamship Company v. Price, Walker, and Co., 8 Com. Cas. 292.

Again, the custom is too vague and uncertain to be good, for the margin of difference is entirely left to the arbitrator, and one arbitrator might think one thing and one another, so that the buyers and the sellers would never know how they were situated. The custom does not now exist, for, according to the findings in the special case, the custom is incorporated in the contracts. On all these grounds the custom is bad.

Carver, K.C. and Leck for the sellers, Walkers, Winsor, and Co.—The custom is good, for its true meaning is only that a buyer cannot reject merely on account of there being a difference or variation in quality. If the difference or variation in quality is excessive or unreasonable, and whether it is excessive or unreasonable is a question for the arbitrator to decide, the right to reject still remains. Such a custom cannot be unreasonable. The reasons why the customs were held bad in Leuckhart v. Cooper (sup.) and Sea Steamship Company v. Price, Walker, and Co. (sup.) were, in the first case, because it would bind the goods of third persons, and, in the second, because it was clearly unreasonable. As to the point raised that the custom is too vague and uncertain to be enforceable, the only uncertainty that exists is in the application of the rule which the custom makes. The rule itself is certain enough, and the same might be said of every rule of law. They referred to

Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company, 31 L. T. Rep. 789; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125;

Vigers v. Sanderson, 84 L. T. Rep. 464; (1901) 1 K. B. 608.

It does not contradict the written contract. If it had been imported into the written contract, it would, perhaps, have contradicted some terms of such contract, but no one could have contended that it was void.

CHANNELL, J.—This case certainly raises some points of difficulty. I think that they are mainly the points of difficulty which always arise when one tribunal has got to review the decision of another tribunal and has not the same jurisdiction, and has not jurisdiction to go into the whole matter which the tribunal below has gone into. It is the difficulty which arises in our courts in County Court appeals and in magistrates' appeals, and also in these special cases stated by arbitrators. I, sitting here, have only power to review or even express opinion as far as I know upon the decisions of these arbitrators so far as they deal with the question of law. Questions of fact are still for the arbitrators alone, notwithstanding the alteration, so far as it is an alteration, in the recent Arbitration Act. There is, besides that, a little difficulty arising upon the terms in which the custom has been found by the umpire. The custom that he finds is that in the London corn trade, the custom and usage of the London corn trade applicable to the sale of barley or other grain on contracts in the form employed in this case, is as he states it. The form employed in this case is a contract to purchase barley to be shipped in France at a cost freight and insurance price with a clause providing that all disputes shall be settled by arbitration, without any clause such as is stated to be put into forms of contract settled by the Corn Trade Association. Where there is a clause in the contract, it says that the difference in quality shall not entitle the buyers to reject except under the award of arbitrators or the committee of appeal, as the case may be. The arbitrator says that where there is a contract such as here, there is a custom that the buyer is not entitled to reject for difference or variation in quality unless the same is excessive or unreasonable and is so found by arbitration under the contract. I think, to my mind, that there is just a little difficulty in consequence of the form in which that is stated. It is stated generally that the buyer is not entitled to reject for difference or variation in quality. If the thing had stopped there, I should think that it was unreasonable; but it does not stop there. There is a qualification in it, "unless the same is excessive or unreasonable." On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that that saves it and makes the thing good. I think that the true meaning of what the arbitrator has found is that which I have been putting throughout the latter portion of the argument, that it means that you have not a right to reject merely for difference or variation in quality if it is a matter that can reasonably be met by an allowance in the price—that is to say, if it does not affect other matters than the amount, the price at which, in fact, the corn or grain was bought. If it did affect other matters, then that variation would be an unreasonable variation, and would be such a variation that it would not be reasonable to require a buyer to take the goods simply at an allowance in the price. If that is what the custom as found here does mean, I see no reason why effect cannot be given to it in law. The law now upon contracts of sale is, of course, stereotyped in the Sale of Goods Act, and the two sections that I have been referred to dealing with the matters are the 15th and the 55th. Sect. 15, sub-sect. 2, says that in the case of a contract for sale by sample there is an

WALKERS, WINNER, AND CO. v. SHAW, SON, AND CO.

[K.B. Div.]

implied condition that the bulk shall correspond with the sample in quality—that is to say, that there is not merely a warranty, but there is a condition—and therefore the buyer may reject if the thing tendered is not in accordance with the sample. But then the 55th section says that, "Where any right, duty, or liability would, arise under a contract of sale by implication of law"—that, I think, clearly includes this—it may be negated, amongst other things, by usage, if the usage be such as to bind both parties to the contract. Consequently there may be a usage which would prevent this implied condition arising and alter it from a condition into being a mere warranty. Upon that, if there was no arbitration clause, damages could be recovered. If there is an arbitration clause, of course the matter would be settled by the arbitrator giving an allowance. Therefore, provided that there is a valid and effective usage in law, this implied condition, as a condition, is gone. The points that are made against this custom are, first, that it contradicts the written contract. If it did, of course effect could not be given to it. I was somewhat struck with Mr. Scrutton's argument in the first instance, but I think that Mr. Carver answered it by pointing out that this custom is imported into a large number of contracts in this trade, and that, when it is there, nobody contends that the contract cannot be given effect to, or that it makes the contract of no effect. Clearly it does not. Therefore I do not think that it can be said that this custom is so inconsistent with the terms of the contract that it cannot be given effect to. If it went the length of saying, "You shall have no remedy for any variation in the quality contracted for," of course that would be unreasonable and would absolutely alter the nature of the contract. But that is not the custom. The custom simply is that you may take it with a variation in the price, and provided there is a limit to the custom in the way that I think there is by the words "unless the same is excessive or unreasonable," I do not see that that is inconsistent with the written contract. The point whether it is unreasonable is very nearly the same as that which I have been dealing with already. The suggestion is—and it is obvious that it is so—that if you have not got something of this sort in writing it is not fair between the two parties, because one party has the option to reject, when it is in his interest to do so by the market price having fallen, and he also has got the option to keep it when the price has gone the other way, notwithstanding the variation. It is said, and I think with a great deal of truth, that it is reasonable to have a custom which will prevent the rejection being claimed merely on the ground of a variation which does not affect the purpose for which the buyer wants to use the goods, but only goes to affect the price which he is to pay for it. If the custom is so limited, it seems to me that it cannot be said to be unreasonable. Then there is another ground on which it is said to be unreasonable which comes in with the third ground of Mr. Scrutton—namely, that it is uncertain. It is said that it is uncertain because it is a custom which depends, as was put, I think, by Mr. Loehnis in his cross-examination of the witnesses before the arbitrator, upon the idiosyncrasies of the arbitrator. But reasonableness, as Mr. Carver has pointed out, is a thing which has to be considered in very many points arising in law. Reasonable price, reasonable time, reasonable care and skill are all things recognised by the law, and there is no standard of reasonableness except that which a jury, which is the usual tribunal dealing with such matters, may think to be reasonable; and juries certainly have idiosyncrasies, sometimes very remarkable ones, quite as much as arbitrators, and I should think that most likely judges have them also, so that where the reasonableness, as in the case of a custom, is for the judge and not for the jury, there may be great variations of opinion according to what may be called the idiosyncrasies of the judge just as they are called the idiosyncrasies of the arbitrator. I think, therefore, that the fact that this custom in its operation depends upon what the tribunal which has to deal with it thinks to be reasonable does not make it uncertain in law so that it cannot have any effect given to it. That, therefore, disposes of the three points upon which Mr. Scrutton has contended that this custom cannot be given effect to. Then comes the point which he dealt with lastly—in one sense, perhaps, I ought to have dealt with it first—namely, whether I can interfere with the finding of the umpire that the custom exists in fact. As to that, the question has been put as to whether there is any evidence of it. If there is no evidence of it, I am at liberty to treat it as a question of law, just as a judge, if there is no evidence to go to the jury, says so as a matter of law, and withdraws the case from the jury. If there is any evidence—that is the usual expression; I suppose that it means any real and reliable evidence on which he can reasonably find it—then it becomes a question of fact, and I cannot interfere with it. In this case, if the whole matter were for me, I think that I should come to the conclusion that the custom did not exist, and for this reason. There is a considerable amount of evidence of gentlemen who have known this trade for a long time that at one time the custom did exist, in the sense that it was not incorporated in contracts, and was taken to be understood between the parties in the trade, and that they made their contracts upon the footing of the existence of this custom, without incorporating it in their contracts. After a time the Corn Trade Association was formed, and when the association was formed they drew their own form of contract, and in their form of contract they put an express term more or less corresponding with this alleged custom. I should myself have drawn the inference that that meant this, that as men of business they thought it far more convenient that such a thing as this is should be expressed in the contract rather than left to a common understanding, and that therefore they put it into the common form of contract with a view to the parties agreeing to it if they meant to agree to it, and if they did not propose to agree to it leaving it out. If they say so, that destroys the custom as a custom, a custom being something that is so well understood that it is unnecessary to put it into your contract. I myself should have drawn that inference, I think, upon the whole of this evidence. I should have also taken into account, of course, that which has been pointed out—namely, that the witnesses differed a good deal as to some portions of the custom. Many of

LORD LUDLOW v. PIKE.

[K.B. Div.]

them say that they always put it into their contracts, and many of them also base it upon the arbitration clause. The arbitration clause in my opinion is an insufficient ground to base it upon. That would have been my view upon this evidence, but I do not feel at liberty to say that there is no evidence upon which a reasonable person could not come to the conclusion to the contrary. There are several witnesses who, although they vary in details, speak decidedly to the custom. Then there is the fact that the umpire is himself the chairman of this Corn Trade Association, and I cannot help thinking that when people refer a matter to a gentleman in that position they mean to avail themselves of his knowledge of the trade by selecting him as the umpire, and that it cannot be said that he is not at liberty to take some account, at any rate, of his knowledge. It would make a good deal of difficulty, in my mind, in my holding as a matter of law that there was no evidence of this custom if the gentleman, merely of his own assertion, asserted that it existed; but of course he has done more than that in this case, because he has had in fact the evidence of gentlemen, possibly as skilled as himself in the trade, who have spoken more or less to the custom. Therefore I think that I cannot hold that there is no evidence of the existence of this custom. I said just now, and perhaps I had better just explain what I meant, that I thought that the incorporation of an arbitration clause merely was not sufficient to base the existence of this contract upon. What I mean is this: I do not pretend that I have so much knowledge of these commercial matters now as I think that I had some thirty years or so ago, because the course of business, the forming of a special commercial court, has taken some of us rather out of the way of dealing with or hearing much about these things. But I cannot help thinking that in many trades besides this trade, arbitrators have been in the habit of assuming, contrary to law, where there is no custom, that they had power, when objection was taken to the quality of an article tendered, to say, "That shall be taken with an allowance." Before the Arbitration Act it was practically impossible to review in any way the decision of arbitrators unless they chose to state a special case, and there was no difference in the practical result whether they went wrong upon a point of law or upon a point of fact. I think that where arbitrators were taking it upon themselves to say that a variation did not signify very much, and could quite fairly be met by an allowance, which undoubtedly they did, they were going wrong on a point of law, having been selected as the tribunal to decide both law and fact. Their decision was final and could not be reviewed. But now, if you intervene at the proper time and in sufficient time, you can, by the operation of the order to state a special case, stop an arbitrator going wrong upon points of law. Therefore the fact that they have been in the habit for years past of deciding these questions, in the way in which they have decided them, by awarding an allowance instead of a rejection, does not seem to me to show the existence of a custom in law. It merely shows that arbitrators have been in the habit of dealing with the matter perhaps in a way that was businesslike and probably fair and just between the parties, but they have been in the habit of dealing with it in that way not according to law. Of course, if you intervene in time, as was done here, apparently you can deal with it. The evidence of some of the gentlemen who gave evidence, I think, really did not go much beyond that. It was to the effect that, when you got an arbitration, the arbitrator has got power to deal with the matter, and that it had always been the practice of arbitrators to say: "It does not matter very much. We will give you a money allowance and not allow rejection." If they did that, following a binding custom binding the parties to the contract, of course it was all right, but if they did that by virtue of a sort of equitable jurisdiction assumed by themselves, it does not go to make a custom. It only shows that the arbitrator was not infrequently going a little bit beyond the law, possibly not knowing any better. I would not blame them for it if they thought that it did justice, but they could have been stopped if the present machinery under the Arbitration Act had existed. That is the reason upon which it seems to me that some of the evidence of some of the gentlemen really with regard to this custom based upon the fact of the arbitration clause was not evidence to the point, but I think that, on the whole, there was such evidence before the umpire that it would be impossible for one to say that there was no evidence, and therefore, although I myself should have found to the contrary on this point as to the custom, I cannot in any way interfere with the finding. I do not think that I have jurisdiction to do so. On those grounds I think that the decision on the questions in this special case must be given in favour of Mr. Carver's clients.

LORD LUDLOW v. PIKE. (a)

Landlord and tenant—Tithe—Agreement to pay tithe as further rent—Validity—Tithe Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 8), s. 1.

An agreement by a tenant to pay to his landlord a certain rent for a farm and "also by way of further rent so much as the landlord shall pay by way of tithe rentcharge on the said premises" is void by virtue of sect. 1 of the Tithe Act 1891.

POINT of law raised on the pleadings.

The action was brought to recover a half-year's rent due the 29th Sept. 1903 for the West Ashton Farm. By the lease the defendant agreed to pay 235*l.* rent per annum, and "also by way of further rent so much as the landlord shall pay by way of tithe rentcharge on the said premises."

The defendant paid into court the sum of 117*l.* 10*s.*, but pleaded that, as to the balance, the agreement to pay was void by virtue of sect. 1 of the Tithe Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 8), and so the amount so reserved was not recoverable.

It is provided by sect. 1 of the Tithe Act 1891:

(1) Tithe rentcharge as defined by this Act issuing out of any lands shall be payable by the owner of the lands.

LORD LUDLOW v. PIKE.

[K.B. Div.]

notwithstanding any contract between him and the occupier of such lands, and any contract made between an occupier and owner of lands after the passing of this Act for the payment of the tithe rentcharge by the occupier shall be void. (2) Where the occupier is liable under any contract made before the passing of this Act to pay the tithe rentcharge then he shall cease to be bound by that part of his contract, but he shall be liable to pay to the owner such sum as the owner has properly paid on account of the tithe rentcharge which such occupier is liable under his said contract to pay exclusive of any costs incurred or paid by the owner in respect of such tithe rentcharge, and every receipt given for such sum shall state expressly that the sum is paid in respect of that tithe rentcharge, provided that where the lands out of which any tithe rentcharge issues are occupied by several occupiers who have contracted to pay the tithe rentcharge any of such occupiers shall be liable only to pay such proportion of the sum paid by the owner of the lands on account of that tithe rentcharge as the rateable value of the lands occupied by him bears to the rateable value of the whole of the lands occupied by such occupiers.

Foote, K.C. (Garland and Foa with him).—The question raised here is whether the 10*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, which under the agreement of tenancy is the further rent payable by the tenant, being the amount payable by the landlord as tithe rentcharge, is recoverable or not, having regard to sect. 1 of the Tithe Act 1891. That section says that a contract between an occupier and owner for payment of tithe rentcharge by the occupier is to be void. But I submit that the proper way to read that section is that any contract for the payment of tithe by the occupier to the tithe owner is to be void, and that it does not affect a contract between the landlord and tenant such as this one. The owner of the land must pay the tithe owner, and then he can recover it from his tenant. The object of the Tithe Act was not to avoid an arrangement between the landlord and tenant like this one, but merely to make the owner of the land responsible direct to the owner of the tithe. There is no doubt that if in this case the farm had been let at an inclusive rent, even although that rent was higher, because the tithe rentcharge was taken into consideration, that undoubtedly would have been good, and Lord St. Leonards points out in Davies v. Fitton (2 Dr. & War. 225)—when dealing with 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 119, which is an Irish statute and provides that the tenant shall hold the land free from the payment of tithes, and that all contracts to the contrary are to be null and void—that the landlord could get a rent equivalent to both the old rent and the tithe, and that an agreement by the tenant “to pay 10*l.* a year rent and in consideration of the tithe rentcharge an additional sum of 5*l.* a year” would be good. He also referred to Colbron v. Travers, 6 L. T. Rep. 287; 13 C. B. N. S. 181; 31 L. J. 257, C. P.

This last case, which was decided with reference to the Income Tax Acts, shows that if the agreement here had been for a rent of a certain sum, to be reduced by a certain sum if tithe rentcharge should be abolished, that undoubtedly would be good, and it can make no difference because the sum is certain. The case is stronger with regard to tithe rentcharge than with regard to income or property taxes, because in the latter statutes repayment to the landlord is absolutely forbidden.

On these considerations this agreement is good, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover the balance in this case.

Moyeses, for the defendant, was not called upon to argue.

CHANNELL, J.—I have here to determine the question whether sect. 1 of the Tithe Act 1891, which says that any contract made between an occupier and owner of lands for the payment of tithe rentcharge by the occupier shall be void, applies to this contract. It is said by the plaintiff that the section was only intended to apply to a contract that the occupier should pay the tithe directly to the tithe owner, and that it does not apply to a contract by the occupier to pay to his landlord the sum which that landlord has had to pay by way of tithe, and so the agreement is good. The agreement is to pay by way of further rent so much as the landlord shall pay by way of tithe rentcharge, and it certainly does not make the tenant liable to repay the tithe rentcharge as such when the landlord has paid it, but it simply says that as rent or in addition to the rent the tenant is to pay an amount equal to the tithe. It, however, puts upon the tenant the burden of the tithe, though he gets the advantage of a reduction or the disadvantage of an increase according to the fall or rise in the price of corn. However that may be, I think this contract clearly comes within sect. 1 of the Tithe Act 1891, although I do not see why a contract of this kind should be forbidden. As to the cases which have been cited, I think when Davies v. Fitton (sup.) is considered it is in point, though distinctly against the contention put forward by Mr. Footo on behalf of the plaintiff. Lord St. Leonards said: “If a lease be granted subject to a gross rent with a collateral covenant with the tenant to pay the tithe rentcharge, that agreement would be void under the statute. But suppose an agreement of this nature—the tenant offers to pay 10*l.* a year rent, and in consideration of the tithe rentcharge an additional sum of 5*l.* a year, and this offer is accepted by the landlord. If this court were called upon to carry into execution such an agreement, could it refuse to do so? I certainly can see nothing to prevent it doing so. I apprehend that the court would have no difficulty in so modelling the contract as to make the tenant liable to an entire rent of 10*l.* There is nothing illegal in such a contract, and by so executing it the court would act according to the spirit of the contract.” There his Lordship is drawing a distinction between a contract to pay the exact amount of the tithe and a contract to pay a fixed certain sum assessed between the landlord and the tenant as compensation to the landlord because he has to pay the tithe, and he certainly says that the contract to pay the sum so assessed would be good. Earlier in his judgment he said: “No doubt, independently of the provisions of the statute, he was bound to pay the tithe which is part of the produce which he takes from the land and as a natural burthen on the tenant, but the effect of the statute is to place the matter on a different footing. It provided that no tenant, except under the peculiar circumstances mentioned in the Act, should be liable to pay this demand, and transferred the liability to the landlord or the person who is seized of an estate of inheritance as defined in the statute. On the other hand, however, the Act does not prevent the landlord saying, 'I must have a greater rent than I formerly received in consequence of this new obligation imposed on me by this statute.' Every man may take the largest rent people will give him; he may, notwithstanding the statute, by contract, get a rent equivalent both to the old rent and the tithe." That is relied on by Mr. Foote, and he contends that it disposes of this case in his favour, but, when one looks further on in the judgment, this is not so. Lord St. Leonards continues: "But this contract must be construed having regard to the enactments of the statute. I was much struck by the drafts of 1833, for they contain clauses which expressly provide for the payment by the tenant of the tithes. I apprehend these provisions would have been void." At p. 226 of the report the clauses in the drafts referred to contain these words: "Yielding and paying the amount of tithe to the said R. Hedges, Esq. [the landlord], his heirs and assigns, or to such proper authorities as may by Act or Acts of Parliament be duly authorised to receive the said tithe property." From that it appears that in Lord St. Leonards' opinion a contract to pay the amount of the tithe to the landlord would be void, just as a contract to pay the amount of the tithe to the person duly authorised to receive the tithe—namely, the tithe owner—would be void. It would seem that both the cases of Davies v. Fitton and Colbron v. Travers (sup.) show that a contract to pay the amount of the tithe by way of rent is void, and I think that the contract in the present case is within sect. 1 of the Tithe Act 1891, and judgment must be entered for the defendant.

Statute of Limitations—Letter to managing director of company—Acknowledgment.

A letter, written by the debtor to the managing director of a company to whom he owes money, stating: "I am willing to sell the 5230 shares that I hold in the P. D. B. B. Company Limited for the sum of 816l. 4s. 6d., and in the event of my doing so I will with the money pay the 10s. call due on 629 of the above shares, amounting to 314l. 10s., and the balance in settlement of my account with R. B. and Son Limited, amounting at December last to 501l. 14s. 6d.," is sufficient acknowledgment to take the debt out of the Statute of Limitations, even although the sale of the shares does not take place.

A general acknowledgment of a debt with a conditional promise to pay, but without any distinct statement that except upon the performance of the condition the debtor will not or cannot pay, is sufficient to take a debt out of the Statute of Limitations.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ACTIONS tried under Order XIV.

The following were the facts:—

The plaintiff company sued to recover from Davies 557l. 15s. 3d. and from Withers 418l. 3s., money lent and interest, and the defences raised were the Statute of Limitations.

In Davies' case the last loan was made by the plaintiff company on the 11th Feb. 1897, and the writ was not issued until the 27th Jan. 1904.

The only acknowledgment on which reliance was placed to take the case out of the statute was a letter, dated the 13th March 1901, which came into being in the following circumstances:

Just before the 31st Dec. 1900 an account was rendered by the plaintiff company to the defendant showing the total then due from him 501l. 14s. 6d., of which 87l. 4s. 6d. was for interest. This account was accompanied by a letter written on the company's paper signed "C. A. Barrett, managing director," in which Mr. Barrett said that he inclosed the company's account, and that if Mr. Davies could not arrange to pay the whole by the end of the year he must ask him at least to pay the interest.

It was agreed that after this there was a meeting between Mr. Barrett and Mr. Davies, which resulted in Mr. Davies writing the letter of the 13th March 1901.

The letter was as follows:

Dear Sir,—I beg to confirm our conversation of yesterday—viz., that I am willing to sell the 5230 shares that I hold in the Preston Davies Ball Bearings Company Limited for the sum of 816l. 4s. 6d., and in the event of my doing so I will with the money pay the 10s. call due on 629 of the above shares, amounting to 314l. 10s., and the balance in settlement of my account with R. Barrett and Son Limited, amounting at the 31st Dec. last to 501l. 14s. 6d.—Yours faithfully, PRESTON DAVIES.

Compton for the plaintiff.

PHILLIMORE, J.—[His Lordship, after stating the facts set out above, continued as follows:] It was suggested that this letter was not an acknowledgment made to the plaintiff company, and that it might arise out of some private transactions with Mr. Barrett. I do not think there is any force in this. Barrett was managing director; he had written on behalf of the company; the letter is addressed to him at the premises which happen to be the company's office, and I was told that the plaintiff company had an interest in the Preston Davies Ball Bearings Company Limited which would connect them with the proposal to reconstruct this latter company, and with the advantages to be gained by such reconstruction. The transaction fell through. There was no quotation for the Preston Davies Ball Bearings shares on the Stock Exchange. These are apparently all the facts. It has been decided upon the construction of Lord Tenterden's Act (9 Geo. 4, c. 14) that an acknowledgment of a debt is not enough; that there must be a promise to pay. I agree with what Bramwell, L.J. says in Meyerhoff v. Froehlich (39 L. T. Rep. 620; 4 C. P. Div., at p. 64), and I think it difficult to see why an acknowledgment in writing has not been held a sufficient compliance with the statute. But it has certainly been decided to be insufficient. The next steps are plain. From a general acknowledgment without more it is proper to infer a promise to pay: (see Gardner v. Macmahon, 2 G. & D. 593; 3 Q. B. 561; Mitchell's claim, L. Rep. 6 Ch., p. 828; Skeet v. Lindsey, 36 L. T. Rep. 98; 2 Ex. Div. 314). From an acknowledgment coupled with a promise to pay upon condition, and declaring inability or unwillingness to pay except upon this condition, no general promise can be inferred, and the acknowledgment does not operate unless the condition is satisfied: (see Tanner v. Smart, 6 B. & C. 603; 30 R. R. 461; Smith v. Thorne, 18 Q. B. 134; Mitchell's claim, L. Rep. 6 Ch., p. 828; Meyerhoff v. Froehlich (sup.), and many other cases). This, however, still leaves some of the ground uncovered. There are cases in which the reference to a particular source of payment has been held to point to that source as a primary one, but not as the only one; and, the acknowledgment stands as a general promise to pay, with a suggestion only that the payment may be made out of a particular fund. Lastly, there may be a case where there is a general acknowledgment of the debt with a conditional promise to pay, but without any distinct statement that except upon the performance of the condition the debtor will not or cannot pay. That, I think, is this case; and I do not think that it is covered by authority. There are no doubt cases, such as Re Bethell (56 L. T. Rep. 92; 34 Ch. Div. 561) and Meyerhoff v. Froehlich, already referred to, where the statement that the debtor will not or cannot pay except upon condition is not put forward in precise words, and yet the acknowledgment has been held insufficient. But in these cases the whole tenor of the language is such as distinctly to negative any prospect of payment unless the condition is fulfilled. In the case before me I have a distinct acknowledgment of the debt coupled with a promise to pay it upon a particular condition happening and silence as to what is to occur if this condition does not happen. Arguments can be adduced on either side. For the debtor it will be said expressum facit cessare tacitum, where there is an express promise no other promise can be implied—or, to put it in another way, the express promise cannot be enlarged by implication. For the creditor it could be urged that, if an acknowledgment of a debt implies a promise to pay, there is no reason, in the absence of negative words, for cutting down that promise; that the further promise to pay upon the happening of a particular condition is at worst surplusage, and should in this case rather be treated as explanatory. It might be said that the object of the debtor when he wrote the letter of the 13th March 1901 was to secure himself from being pressed for payment during such reasonable time as he would require to realise the shares, and that in order to secure his practical immunity—I do not say his legal immunity—for that period he indicated that he would pay as soon as he realised, while by a separate admission he kept alive the debt, which was not at that time statute barred. Upon the whole I think that the creditor is right, and that there must be judgment for the plaintiff company. I must not forget to notice the further contention put forward on behalf of the plaintiff company that the letter of the 13th March 1901 gave a fresh cause of action upon an account stated, which would run for six years from that date. If this were so, every admission of debt with a conditional promise to pay would be an account stated and would take the case out of the statute; and this is certainly not so. The defendant was not intending to agree an account; he was, I think, intending to acknowledge the debt, and therefore I have inferred a promise to pay; but the case for the plaintiff company is not made really stronger by substituting the words "account stated" for "acknowledgment." In the action against Withers the plaintiff company has tried to strengthen the case by two letters written by the defendant on the 31st Dec. 1900 and the 20th Dec. 1902. I do not think that these letters add strength to the plaintiffs' case. Both are promises to pay when things get better, coupled with positive statements of inability to pay until things are better. Meyerhoff v. Froehlich shows that such letters do not keep the debt alive. The case, therefore, against Withers is no stronger than the case against Davies, but it is equally strong. I give judgment for the plaintiffs in both actions, with costs.

Judgment accordingly.

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF WESTMINSTER. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Local government—Public health—Sanitary authority—Power to provide "public sanitary conveniences"—Subway—Subsoil of highway—Vesting in sanitary authority—Right of adjoining owner usque ad medium filum viæ—Trespass—Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 44.

Where a sanitary authority, purporting to act under the powers conferred upon them by sect. 44 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, had constructed beneath the middle of a street certain public lavatories and sanitary conveniences, with requisite and proper means of approach thereto and exit therefrom on both sides of the street so that the approaches in fact constituted a subway for crossing the street, the entrances to the subway being by staircases placed at each side of the street at or near the edge of the footway, it was held that the sanitary authority had been exercising the powers conferred by the statute for a purpose not thereby authorised, they having no power to acquire lands for the purpose of constructing a subway; and that therefore the plaintiffs, opposite the doors of whose premises one of the entrances to the subway was placed, were entitled to a mandatory injunction to restrain the trespass.

Decision of Joyce, J. (85 L. T. Rep. 544) reversed.

By an indenture of conveyance dated the 26th July 1886, and made between Alfred Hooper,

(a) Reported by E. A. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

APP.] LONDON & NORTH-WESTERN RAIL. CO. v. MAYOR, &C., OF WESTMINSTER. [APP.]

William Henry Wroot, and Milson Percy Wroot of the first part, Sir Edmund Antrobus and Hugh Lindsay Antrobus of the second part, Emma Elizabeth Matthews and Joseph Ebenezer Newsom of the third part, Emma Viner of the fourth part, the plaintiffs of the fifth part, and Stephen Reay of the sixth part,

All those freehold messuages or tenements situate in Parliament-street, in the parish of St. Margaret's, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, and numbered 34, 35, and 36, in Parliament-street aforesaid, and also all those two freehold messuages or tenements situate in Bridge-street, in the said parish of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and numbered respectively 11 and 12 in Bridge-street aforesaid, but which were formerly numbered 46 and 47 in the same street, all of which said premises are more particularly delineated on the plan drawn in the margin of these presents and therein coloured red, were conveyed to the plaintiffs in fee simple in possession.

The property comprised a block of buildings at the north-east corner formed by the junction Parliament-street and Bridge-street.

The houses in Parliament-street had vaults or cellars in connection with them which extended beyond the boundary line, as shown upon the plan, under the pavement of the footway, and for some little distance into the roadway as it then existed.

At the date of the conveyance the footway was about 12ft. wide from the wall of the houses to the outer edge of the pavement.

Between 1887 and 1890 the plaintiffs rebuilt the premises, and as rebuilt they consisted of a receiving office for parcels occupied by the plaintiffs, at the corner of Bridge-street, and other offices and shops which were let to different tenants.

In 1899 Parliament-street was widened by pulling down the houses on the western side, and throwing a portion of the site into the roadway, and at the same time the footway or pavement in front of the plaintiffs' premises was widened by being increased from 12ft. to about 21ft.

In Nov. 1900 the defendants, who were the highway and sanitary authority of the district, constructed underneath the middle of Parliament-street certain public lavatories and sanitary conveniences, with approaches thereto by means of subways from both sides of Parliament-street, the entrances and exits to and from the subways and conveniences being by means of staircases placed at or near the edge of the footway.

One of the entrances was placed opposite the doorway of the plaintiffs' premises. The staircase extended for a distance of 33ft. along the footway, and the iron railings which formed part of it and by which it was fenced off from the roadway encroached to the extent of 2ft. 9in. on the footway or pavement as it existed after the street was widened.

The wall of the staircase nearest to the plaintiffs' premises was built up close to the wall of the plaintiffs' vaults.

The railing on the pavement was placed upon stone slabs, which to the extent of a few inches were vertically over the wall of the plaintiffs' vaults.

The plaintiffs, who claimed to be entitled to the soil of the roads adjoining their premises as far as the middle of such roads as they existed when conveyed to them, alleged the works were not sanitary conveniences merely, but subways, and that the defendants had no statutory power to construct subways; that inasmuch as the subsoil of the roads was vested in the plaintiffs usque ad medium filum viæ, constructing the works and excavating the soil under the roadway and footway constituted a trespass upon the plaintiffs' property; that even if for the purposes of making sanitary conveniences the subsoil of the roadway was vested in the defendants and not in the plaintiffs, the subsoil of the footway was not so vested, and that, to the extent to which the staircase was constructed in the footway, it constituted a trespass; further, that the erection of a portion of the staircase over the wall of the plaintiffs' vaults constituted a trespass.

In the alternative the plaintiffs alleged that if the soil as far as the middle of the roads did not belong to them, the defendants had obstructed the highway by erecting the staircase and railings opposite to the entrance to the plaintiffs' premises to the particular damage of the plaintiffs by interfering with the access of the plaintiffs from their premises to the highway.

The plaintiffs therefore brought this action against the defendants claiming (1) an injunction to restrain the defendants from continuing to trespass on the plaintiffs' premises by permitting the subways, staircase, and railings, and other works to remain upon the plaintiffs' land; (2) alternatively an injunction to restrain the defendants from continuing to cause an obstruction of the highway, to the damage of the plaintiffs; and (3) damages.

The defendants by their defence alleged that they had acted in pursuance of their statutory powers vested in them for that purpose by the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

The material section of that Act is as follows:

SECT. 44 (1). Every sanitary authority may provide and maintain public lavatories and ashpits, and public sanitary conveniences, other than privies, in situations where they deem the same to be required, and may supply such lavatories and sanitary conveniences with water, and may defray the expense of providing such lavatories, ashpits, and sanitary conveniences, and of any damage occasioned to any person by the erection or construction thereof, and the expense of keeping the same in good order, as if they were expenses of sewerage. (2) For the purpose of such provision the subsoil of any road, exclusive of the footway adjoining any building or the curtilage of a building, shall be vested in the sanitary authority.

In June 1901 the action came on for trial before Joyce, J., when his Lordship reserved judgment.

On the 19th Nov. 1901 it was decided by Joyce, J. (85 L. T. Rep. 544) that the defendants had acted bonâ fide in the exercise of their statutory powers, and that the erection of the sanitary conveniences and the approaches thereto, although capable of being used for crossing the street, was not ultra vires. The learned judge also decided that the presumption of law—that in the absence of evidence to the contrary (of which none had been adduced) the soil of a highway to the middle of the road (usque ad medium filum viæ) belongs to the owner of land adjoining the highway—being equally applicable to streets in a town as to highways in the country: (Re White's Charities, 78 L. T. Rep. 550; (1898) 1 Ch. 659) applied; and that the land or soil as to the 2ft. 9in. in width was the property of the plaintiffs, and, being part of the footway, was not liable to be taken and used by the defendants under sect. 44 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 for the purpose of the construction of sanitary conveniences.

A mandatory injunction was accordingly granted for the removal of the portion of the staircase as to 2ft. 9in. in width.

As to the first part of that decision the plaintiffs appealed.

The hearing of the appeal was delayed by reason of negotiations between the parties with a view to a compromise. These negotiations, however, ultimately proved abortive, and the appeal was restored to the paper, and now came on for hearing.

Younger, K.C. and Eustace Hills (with them Montague Shearman, K.C.) for the appellants.—The defendants' only defence is that what they have done was in exercise of the powers conferred upon them by sect. 44 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891. But we submit that they have exceeded the powers under that Act, and that the whole work is ultra vires. The subsoil is vested in the defendants by that section for the purpose of making sanitary conveniences and no other. The works which the defendants have constructed are not merely sanitary conveniences within the Act. They are in their essence a subway for foot passengers, and none the less a subway because, owing to the manner in which it has been constructed, it can be used as a means of access to the sanitary conveniences. The plan shows that; and the defendants have described the works in their own language as "a crossing for foot passengers with sanitary conveniences communicating therewith." The test is if there had been no sanitary conveniences would the subway have been a distinct thing of itself? The answer is that it would have been a distinct subway. As to the sanitary conveniences, they are distinct in themselves and shut off from the subway. The real and original intention was to construct a subway, and afterwards it was considered expedient to make sanitary conveniences; and for constructing the subway the defendants have no statutory authority. Having exceeded their statutory authority they must be treated as trespassers. The case of Mayor, &c., of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird (74 L. T. Rep. 385; (1896) A. C. 434) is very like the present case, except that the defendants here justify under sect. 44 of the Act of 1891. That section was passed to get over difficulties which were raised outside the metropolis, as in the case of Mayor, &c., of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird (ubi sup.). [STIRLING, L.J. referred to the railway cases such as Stockton and Darlington Railway Company v. Brown (9 H. of L. Cas. 246).]

Hughes, K.C. and Dighton Pollock for the respondents.—There are two things which the plaintiffs must establish in order to entitle them to succeed in their action; first, that the defendants had no power to do what is complained of; and secondly, that they have not acted bona fide, and that the construction of the sanitary conveniences was a mere device in order to permit of the construction of a subway at the same time. On the face of the Act of 1891 it is perfectly clear that the defendants have power under sect. 44 to do what they have done. What they have constructed is sanitary conveniences in the middle of the roadway, with an underground access from the footway on both sides of the street. The suggestion is that the defendants had no power to make an approach by means of a subway to the sanitary conveniences. But to say that the sanitary conveniences could be made without an approach is futile. The subway is merely the approach to the sanitary conveniences, and there is nothing in the attempt to distinguish the approach from the entrance. The fact that there is a subway in connection with the sanitary conveniences does not make them any the less sanitary conveniences. If the defendants were of opinion that the entrance from the footway was more convenient than from the roadway, it was not only within their powers, but it was their duty to construct the works in that manner. It has been found that if the entrance to sanitary conveniences is made in the middle of the street, their usefulness is much reduced. The matter was fully considered, and the defendants in the exercise of their discretion came to the conclusion that their scheme was the best that could be adopted. The approach is no more than an entrance to the sanitary conveniences from the nearest suitable spot. If, having regard to sect. 44 of the Act of 1891, the plaintiffs cannot object to the entrance in the middle of the road, neither can they do so if it is placed at the side of the road. They are sanitary conveniences placed in a situation where they are "deemed to be required." It is not suggested that the defendants have not deemed the sanitary conveniences to be required where they are placed. As regards the question of excess of statutory authority, the following are other railway cases which are in point:

London, Brighton, and South-Coast Railway Company v. Truman, 54 L. T. Rep. 250; 11 App. Cas. 45;

Wilkinson v. Hull and Barnsley Railway and Dock Company, 46 L. T. Rep. 445; 20 Ch. Div. 323;

Lewis v. Weston-super-Mare Local Board of Health, 59 L. T. Rep. 769; 40 Ch. Div. 55.

We submit that the action is wrong in toto, but even if it is right as to the excess of 4ft., which is complained of, then it should be limited in that way. All that the court should do is to put right what is regarded as an unreasonable width. But there is no jurisdiction to order the railings to be removed.

Younger, K.C., in reply.—That the court will grant a mandatory injunction in such a case as the present is shown by Goodson v. Richardson, 30 L. T. Rep. 142; L. Rep. 9 Ch. App. 221.

[VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Finchley Electric Light Company Limited v. Finchley Urban District Council (88 L. T. Rep. 215; (1903) 1 Ch. 437).] We ask, therefore, that the court will order the subway and works to be removed entirely. The plaintiffs are in exactly the same position as the plaintiffs in Mayor, &c., of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird (ubi sup.).

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—So far as the objects of the vestry, who were the predecessors of the corporation of the city of Westminster, and the objects of the corporation are concerned, I have a good deal of sympathy with them. And

I cannot doubt myself but that they acted in good faith in this sense; that their desire was a desire to do that which might be best for the public. Of their good faith, in that sense, I have not the slightest doubt. Moreover, I think that they rather drifted into the position which they ultimately took up than took that position up deliberately. Their first object was to make a provision for the comfort and convenience of strangers visiting this part of the metropolis. It is known that a great many persons of all nations, as well as natives of this country, go to see the Houses of Parliament and Westminster Abbey, and the desire at first was that some accommodation of this sort should be provided for those visitors; and it was desired to provide it somewhere near the Abbey or the Houses of Parliament. There was a difficulty about that. The vestry could not do it without obtaining certain consents, which they could not get. Then the notion seems to have occurred to them that they might provide this accommodation at some point more to the north than the Houses of Parliament and Westminster Abbey, and that, inasmuch as there are a considerable number of carriage-ways which converge in that direction, the visitors and others coming from Westminster Abbey or the Houses of Parliament might get their by a subway. Then it seems to have occurred to somebody that if they had a subway there it was just as well to have a system of subways. They found, when they came to deal with this matter, that there was great difficulty in arranging for it, and they then seem to have given up the notion of a convenience to be established in Victoria-street, or in that neighbourhood, or, as was at one time thought, at Great George-street. And it seems to have occurred to them that it would be a good place to have a convenience at the southern end of Parliament-street. Then it occurred to them that it would be a very good position to place that convenience in, if they could place it somewhere adjacent to a subway, and get some public authority—the First Commissioner of Works, and one other authority, I think, were asked about it—to make the subway for them. Then their notion was to make a convenience which should have its entrance from, and its exit to, this subway, which they hoped to persuade other people to make. I think one gets the plainest indication of this view in the minute of the 27th July 1898, which I find in the extracts from the minutes of the united vestry of St. Margaret's and St. John's. It runs thus: "Parliament-street and Parliament-square subway and convenience. The surveyor has submitted a plan showing a proposal for the formation of a subway to facilitate vehicular traffic and to provide a safe crossing for foot-passengers under Parliament-street and Parliament-square in connection with the widening of the first-named thoroughfare, and embracing in the scheme a project for the construction of a large convenience." Then it goes on: "The committee recommend that the vestry give their approval in principle to the proposition, and that the scheme be submitted to the First Commissioner of Works for his consideration with an intimation that the vestry would undertake the construction and maintenance of the convenience." That was on the 27th July 1898. On the 11th Jan. 1899 there is a further minute: "In reference to the proposal for the construction of a convenience and subways at the south end of Parliament-street, and to the representations made in the matter to the First Commissioner of Works by direction of the vestry on the 27th July last, it has now been reported by the surveyor that the department does not intend to take any steps to provide the suggested subways, and has expressed the opinion that the construction of the convenience should not be commenced until after the coming session of Parliament." That, to my mind, shows very plainly how this matter was initiated—how at first the vestries had no notion of making the subway themselves, and no notion of doing anything more than availing themselves of the subway, when it should come to be made, as a place into which the exit from the conveniences should be made, and from which the entrance should be made. In this state of things which has come about, it seems to me quite clear that eventually the corporation determined that they would make the subway themselves, from which the entrance was to be to the convenience, and into which the exit was to be. Now, for the moment, I will not say any more about the evidence, which, to my mind, shows conclusively that that was the truth, but I will deal for a moment with what the powers of the authority were under the Public Health (London) Act 1891; and in particular sect. 44. [His Lordship read that section and continued:] My view of that section is, first, that I do not think that sub-sect. 2 really intends that there should be vested in the sanitary authority immediately so much of the subsoil as could possibly be used for the purposes mentioned, but I think that what that section seems to point to is, that if the sanitary authority in fact do use the subsoil for this purpose, then ipso facto the subsoil shall vest in the sanitary authority. I mention that because, if that is the right view, it seems to me to negative altogether the idea that the sanitary authority are to acquire the land and pay for it, or pay compensation for it, in any shape whatsoever. I do not think, if that is the right view, that it could be that the words "may defray the expense . . . of any damage occasioned to any person by the erection or construction thereof" could possibly cover the money payment in respect of the vesting of the land taken in the sanitary authority. That is of some importance, although in the view that I take of this case, it is not essential that I should determine the matter now. But I think it right to mention that this view which I have taken of the construction of this section might be of importance if one had to decide whether or not the sanitary authority were intended to be the judges of what land should be taken, and how much of it, because when the House of Lords had to deal with a similar question in Stockton and Darlington Railway Company v. Brown (ubi sup.), I find in the speech of Lord Cranworth these words: "Some general propositions admit of no doubt. In the first place, I think it clear that when the Legislature authorises railway directors to take, for the purposes of their undertaking, any lands specially described in their Act, it constitutes them the sole judges as to whether they will or will not take those lands provided only that they take them bona fide with the object of using them for the purposes authorised by the Legislature, and not for any sinister or collateral purpose. This is the construction to be put on all such legislative powers, whether the language of the Act is that the company may take so much of the lands as is necessary for the undertaking, or so much as is required or is expedient to be taken, or simply (as in this case) that the company may take lands for the purposes of the undertaking. In such cases the Legislature, having provided what it considers sufficient means for securing adequate compensation to the owners of the land, leaves it to those interested in the undertaking to say to what extent it will be useful to them to exercise their statutable powers." I am not quite sure myself—assuming it to be an essential part of Lord Cranworth's definition as to the occasions on which the company, or others, taking the land, have jurisdiction to say to what extent they will take the land, that the land so taken shall be taken under the condition that there is secured to the landowner adequate compensation for the taking of the land—that this is a case in which one could say that that was true, because for reasons that I have already given, I have great doubts whether the words in sect. 44 as to damage do secure adequate compensation to the landowner. But I do not propose to decide that question or enter into it, because in my judgment it is not necessary in this case to do so. I say that it is not necessary in this case to do so, because, in my judgment, in the present case, it is not true to say that the corporation have taken this land, which they have taken, with the object of using it for the purposes authorised by the Legislature. If the language of Lord Campbell, who delivered the first judgment, is looked at, as well as this judgment of Lord Cranworth to which I have been referring, both of them affirm in the clearest possible manner that if a company or other authority purporting to acquire the land under the powers of the Act of Parliament is not acquiring it for the purposes mentioned, but is acquiring it for other and different purposes, then the duty of the court would be to restrain that authority. Lord Campbell's words are, "If it had been proved that the company was acting malá fide, and trying under the powers of the Act of Parliament to get possession of lands of Brown, which were to be applied to other and different purposes, I think the court would have been justified in interfering by injunction," and Lord Cranworth says precisely the same thing. Now I want to say one word about malá fides. Lord Campbell uses the words "malá fide." Joyce, J. said that he could not find on the evidence here that the corporation or the vestry, or either of them acted otherwise than boná fide. I think that when Lord Campbell says here "was acting malá fide, and trying under the powers of the Act of Parliament to get possession of lands which were to be applied to other and different purposes" than those authorised by the Act of Parliament he meant merely to explain there what would be malá fides. You are acting malá fide if you are seeking to acquire and are acquiring lands for a purpose not authorised by the Act of Parliament. In such a case it is right to restrain persons who are misapplying the powers of an Act of Parliament. Now, as I have already said, my view is that the defendants here, and their predecessors did acquire these lands for purposes not justified by the Act of Parliament. It really was hardly denied during the argument, but that in truth and in fact the defendants did construct this approach as it has been called, of dimensions which were wider than would be required for the approach to a sanitary convenience, and which were suitable for a subway. It also really was hardly denied, but that in so doing they did it for the very purpose that this subway might be used as a highway. They have no parliamentary authority to acquire land for the purpose of making a subway, and under those circumstances, it seems to me, that they ought to be restrained. I have said that in argument it was hardly denied that the facts were such as I have stated. But really it could not be denied in the face of two such letters as the letters of the 20th Sept. 1900 and the 4th Dec. 1900. The letter of the 20th Sept. 1900, written to the solicitor of the London and North-Western Railway Company, runs thus: "I am constructing on behalf of the Westminster Vestry, and in accordance with their directions, a subway from one side of Parliament-street opposite your offices to the western side which is approached by staircases on footpath. Unfortunately this will necessitate the acquiring by lease or purchase a portion of your vault. I should therefore feel obliged if you would inform me what your company would require for assisting in giving a great convenience to the public at so dangerous a crossing, and inclose a plan." Now, as to that letter I wish to say that it seems to me couched in most accurate language and exactly to describe the true facts, and also to recognise the legal consequences following upon the adoption of the course indicated by the letter. Then we come to the letter of the 4th Dec. 1900, which is again written to the solicitor of the London and North-Western Railway Company: "Your letter of the 19th ult. on the subject of the works in progress at the south end of Parliament-street was laid before the works, sewers, and highways committee of the city council at their last meeting, when I was directed to explain that the intention is the construction of a subway to facilitate pedestrians crossing from one side to the other of a thoroughfare of great width and very considerable traffic, an object with which the committee consider your company will be in the fullest accord. The formation of an entrance at the position in question is necessarily obligatory to give proper effect to the scheme. Admission to the conveniences which will be accessible from the subway could otherwise have been provided from refuges above them." I may add, for your information, that the plan and project generally received the approval of Her Majesty's Office of Works." Now, in the face of those letters it is not to be wondered at that there was considerable hesitation in arguing that the object and purpose which the Corporation of Westminster had in view here was the construction of a subway. We find an argument about whether the Act of Parliament authorised or justified the taking of the subsoil for the purpose of making approaches to the sanitary convenience—I shall say one word about that in a moment—but let me assume to the full that the Act of Parliament does justify that. It only justifies such a course in a case where the making of the approach where it is made is really necessitated by the conditions of access to and egress from the convenience. But how can that be said to be so here when this very letter tells us that admission to the convenience, which will be accessible from the subway, could otherwise have been provided from the refuges above? It ceases—if that passage is true—to be true that these subways have in fact been constructed as approaches to the sanitary convenience. It is merely that these subways, having been built by the Westminster Corporation, it is supposed by the Westminster Corporation that it will be a convenient thing that there should be placed sanitary conveniences, the access to and egress from which shall be in a subway which is being constructed by the corporation. With regard to the approaches I agree with a great deal that counsel for the respondents said. I think that where you are to have underground conveniences you must have approaches other than mere access (entrance to) and egress (exit from) them, because in the nature of things you must have some stairs or some slope, which will occupy considerable lateral space, leading you to immediate proximity to the situation of the conveniences. Therefore I think that you must have an approach, and I think, probably, that if the corporation or other sanitary authority had really fixed upon a particular passage as affording a proper approach for the conveniences, as such, it might not have been right for us to review their discretion in that respect. But no such question arises in the present case if you arrive at the conclusion that I have arrived at, in fact which I cannot put better than this, that the true position of affairs is accurately described in the letter of the 4th Dec. 1900, which I have just read. Under these circumstances, I think that this appeal ought to be allowed. I think that the remedy which should be given to the plaintiffs here should be wider than that which Joyce, J., gave. Now what is the best way of giving this remedy? As I said before, one wishes, in giving this remedy, to give it in such a manner as shall be least detrimental to the public. There is the subway; there are the conveniences. Whether they are in a convenient position or not it is not for me to say—the sanitary authority will consider that. But I have no doubt that, apart from the conveniences, the subway at the present moment is a considerable convenience to pedestrians crossing that wide thoroughfare. Under these circumstances, although I think that we ought not to limit our injunction to what has been called the excess of 4ft., yet I want to give an opportunity for the defendants, the corporation, to do that which I am sure they would wish to do—that which is most for the benefit of the public, and at the same time consistent with the law as we lay it down. If we now say that this is a case in which it may be right ultimately to grant an injunction, we can yet give to the corporation an opportunity of making, or undertaking to make, alterations which will relieve us from the necessity of granting any injunction at all. If we hold our hand in that way, and give to the corporation liberty to apply to us—of course the other side must have liberty to apply in case there is delay—it may be that the corporation will satisfy us that they have either made, or are immediately going to make, such alterations as will justify us in saying we shall not grant an injunction at all. I think that is all I have to say at present, except that I take it for granted that the plaintiffs will, in a matter of this sort, facilitate the work which the corporation has to do, and will be prompt and ready to agree to any alterations which may reasonably and properly be suggested by the corporation.

STIRLING, L.J.—In this case the defendants, the corporation of the city of Westminster, purporting to act under statutory powers conferred on them as the sanitary authority within the city, have erected two subterranean constructions at the south end of Parliament-street, one being a public sanitary convenience and the other a subway. Both those erections stand in part on the subsoil of Parliament-street at a point where that subsoil is vested, or is admitted to be vested for the purpose of the present proceedings, in the plaintiffs, the London and North-Western Railway Company, who are the owners of a house in Parliament-street. The plaintiffs allege in this appeal that that subway has been erected without any statutory power for the purpose. In this appeal, whatever may have been the case at other times, the erection of the sanitary convenience is not complained of, but it is alleged, as I have already said, that the subway has been erected without any proper authority, and, at the Bar, an injunction has been asked against the defendant corporation to restrain that corporation from maintaining or using the subway. That relief is sought on two grounds. First, on a ground which is thus stated by Lord Cranworth in Galloway v. Mayor and Commonalty of London (14 L. T. Rep. 865; L. Rep. 1 E. & I. App. 34, at p. 43): "It has become a well settled head of equity that any company authorised by the Legislature to take compulsorily the land of another for a definite object will, if attempting to take it for any other object, be restrained by the injunction of the Court of Chancery from so doing." That is one ground. The other ground is, that the corporation, having erected this subway without any authority, are in the position of trespassers, and continuing trespassers, on the soil of the plaintiffs. And for that reason, in accordance with the decision of this court in Goodson v. Richardson (30 L. T. Rep. 142; L. Rep. 9 Ch. App. 221), the plaintiffs are entitled to the injunction which is sought. If the fact be, as is alleged, that the subway has been erected without any statutory authority, it seems to me that relief may properly be given on both these grounds; and that the main question in the action really is, whether or not this subway has been so improperly erected. Now, as regards the statutory authority, the matter stands thus: However useful it may be that in such frequented streets subways for the purpose of the passage of passengers should be made, the Legislature has not yet thought fit to confer that power on any corporate body having authority within the cities. It has conferred by sect. 44 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, a power on every sanitary authority within the area which is governed by the Act to provide and maintain, amongst other things, public sanitary conveniences in situations where they deem the same to be required, and has provided that for the purpose of such provision the subsoil of any road shall be vested in the sanitary authority and it is under this section of the Act, and under this alone, that the defendants, the corporation of

Westminster, justify what they have done. The corporation allege that it is within their power under the section not merely to determine the situation where this sanitary convenience is to be placed, but also the proper and reasonable mode of providing for the entrance and exit of the persons who are to use it. And they contend that they are not limited to making those entrances and exits simply by lifts or by stairs, but that they may, if they see fit, make proper approaches to the convenience from the pavement to the place where it is situate in the roadway. I shall assume that that contention is well founded, and then the question simply reduces itself to this, was this subway constructed as an approach to the convenience, or was it constructed with an object that it might be made use of by the public for passing from one side of Parliament-street to the other? Now, upon that I come to the conclusion on the evidence that the latter was the real object with which the subway was constructed. I do not desire to go through the evidence, much of which has already been referred to by my Lord. But I will state very briefly some of the—to my mind—striking passages of the evidence. I refer first of all to the minutes of the predecessors of the defendants—namely, the united vestries of the parishes of St. Margaret and St. John, Westminster, under the dates of the 29th July 1898 and the 27th June 1900, and to the minutes of the defendant corporation under date the 6th Dec. 1900. I also refer, as my Lord has already referred, to the two letters of the 20th Sept. 1900 and the 4th Dec. 1900. In addition to that I should like to read two short passages from the evidence of the defendants' witnesses. [His Lordship did so and continued:] Therefore, it seems to me from its size, and from the statement of the chairman of the committee, it has actually been constructed in such a way as to be far more than an approach, and that it is not a reasonable and proper approach to the convenience which has been lawfully erected. Under these circumstances, I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to the injunction for which they ask. But at the same time, as it is possible that the subway may be so altered as to make it a reasonable and proper approach to the convenience, I think that it is reasonable that the corporation should have an opportunity of making such alteration if they see fit to avail themselves of leave for that purpose. Therefore, I quite agree in the form of judgment which is proposed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I entirely agree with what has fallen from my Lord and Stirling, L.J., and I should not desire to add anything were it not for the fact that we are differing from the judgment of Joyce, J. Now, two things, I think, are quite clear here: first, that the Westminster Corporation have no power at all to construct a subway, or at least, if they have power under some of their general Acts to incur the expense of constructing a subway, although no such statutory power has been called to our attention, they certainly have not any power to take the plaintiffs' land for the purpose of constructing a subway. I think it is equally clear that they have power under sect. 44 of the Act of 1891 to provide and maintain sanitary conveniences, and for the purpose of such provision to take and use that portion of the property of the plaintiffs which is under the road, exclusive of the footway. But those two propositions being quite clear, I think we must approach the consideration of this question having regard to the perfectly well-established and extremely important jurisdiction which the Court of Chancery have exercised from the earliest days of railway legislation, and probably long before, the jurisdiction, I mean, to say that public bodies authorised by Parliament, to take certain land shall not be allowed to take that land except for the purpose authorised by Parliament. And if that doctrine is important in ordinary cases where compensation is provided for all land taken, it is specially obligatory on the court to have regard to it in a case where a public body is authorised to take another person's property without making any provision for his compensation. In my view, therefore, the question for our consideration is really this: With what purpose was this land of the plaintiffs taken? I think you cannot avoid considering that question first. The language of Lord Cranworth in Stockton and Darlington Railway v. Brown (ubi sup.) was this: That although the railway company are the sole judges of what they require, and will take for their purposes, there is the proviso: "Provided only that they take them bonâ fide with the object of using them for the purposes authorised by the Legislature, and not for any sinister or collateral purpose." Now, here I cannot bring myself to doubt what was the purpose for which this land was taken. My Lord and Stirling, L.J. have both gone through the evidence, and it would be a waste of time for me to repeat it. I observe that Joyce, J. said, and this is no doubt the foundation of his judgment, that the defendant's primary object was, in his opinion, the construction of the conveniences with requisite and proper means of approach thereto and exit therefrom. If I had come to that conclusion of fact, I think I should probably have agreed almost entirely with the judgment. But being unable to come to that conclusion, as a matter of fact, having satisfied myself from the documentary evidence that the primary object was to construct a subway for facilitating the passage of passengers from one side of Parliament-street to the other, I come to the conclusion that the Westminster Corporation are now seeking to justify that which was a wrongful act, and saying that they might justify the taking not the whole, but a part of it, for a purpose authorised by sect. 44 of the Act of 1891. I do not think that they ought to be allowed to do that. I feel very strongly that in every case in which a public body intrusted with the duties of performing a public work say that they have, in the exercise of their discretion, fixed upon a particular place and a particular mode, the court ought to be extremely slow to interfere with their discretion. But when they have not really been acting under the authority of the Act, when they have been doing something outside the Parliamentary power, and have been governed by considerations of a different kind, and for a different purpose, the question of discretion seems to me to have no bearing whatever on the case. For these reasons I agree with what has been said, and think that the injunction ought to be granted, qualified as my Lord has said. I observe that in the court below, the learned judge finding as he did that the plaintiffs had succeeded in part and failed in part, gave no costs, but the plaintiffs must have the costs in the court below as well as the costs of the appeal.

Their Lordships granted an injunction ordering the defendants to pull down the whole of the staircase railings and other works placed upon the plaintiffs' land other than the conveniences and such further portion of the construction as the court might upon application sanction as a proper approach to the conveniences; and the operation of the order was suspended, with liberty to apply to the court. Their Lordships also acceded to an application that the injunction should be suspended for two months, to enable the defendants to decide whether they would appeal to the House of Lords, and, if they should so appeal, the injunction was to be suspended pending the appeal. Appeal allowed.

REX v. PINCKNEY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Habeas corpus—Jurisdiction of court—Issue of writ—Person out of the jurisdiction.

The court has no jurisdiction to order a writ of habeas corpus to issue directed to a person who, at the time of the application for the writ, is out of the jurisdiction.

APPEAL from an order of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) affirming an order made by Walton, J. at chambers directing that a writ of habeas corpus should issue, but that it should be allowed to lie in the office.

On the 29th July 1903 Mr. Pinckney applied to Walton J. at chambers for a writ of habeas corpus directing Mrs. Pinckney, his wife, to produce before the judge at chambers the child who was the issue of their marriage.

The learned judge ordered that the writ should issue.

The child was between three and four years of age.

At the time this application was made Mrs. Pinckney was, with the child, out of the jurisdiction.

On the 5th Aug. Walton J. quashed the order he had made on the 29th July, and made a new order directing that the writ should issue, but that it should lie in the office until Mrs. Pinckney should come within the jurisdiction.

Mrs. Pinckney appealed against this order.

The Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) thought that the question was one for the discretion of the judge, and refused to interfere with the order of Walton, J.

Mrs. Pinckney appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C. and A. S. Poyser for Mrs. Pinckney.—The judge at chambers had no jurisdiction to order the writ to lie in the office till the appellant came within the jurisdiction. The foundation of the high prerogative writ of habeas corpus is the right of the King to be informed if anyone within the realm is being illegally detained. The writ cannot be issued where the person said to be detained and the person said to be detaining are both outside the kingdom. Formerly the writ could issue against a person in any part of the dominions of the Crown:

Res v. Cowle, 2 Burr. 834, at p. 856.

But now by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 20 it is provided, by sect. 1, that no writ of habeas corpus shall issue out of England by authority of any judge or court of justice therein into any colony or foreign dominion of the Crown where Her Majesty has a lawfully established court or courts of justice having authority to grant and issue the said writ and to ensure the due execution thereof throughout such colony or dominion. The issue of the writ is a question that concerns the rights of the Sovereign; it is not a question between party and party:

Richard Bourn's case, Cro. Jac. 543.

It cannot be contended by the prosecutor that a writ of habeas corpus can be served on anyone out of the jurisdiction. His only object in obtaining an order that the writ shall issue and lie in the office is to hold it in terrorem against Mrs. Pinckney and to prevent her from ever coming back to England. That is not a use to which this writ can be put. It would be an abuse of the writ. The nature and object of a writ of habeas corpus was explained by Sir John Eardley Wilmot, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, in his answers to the questions put by the House of Lords in 1758. He there likened it to a writ of mandamus:

Wilmot's Opinions and Judgments, pp. 83, 109, edit. 1802.

The prerogative writ of mandamus is never issued unless the court is satisfied that it can be made effective at once. Such a writ is never ordered to lie in the office until the defendant chooses to come within the jurisdiction. Rule 232 of the Crown Office Rules provides that every writ therein referred to when issued by the Queen's Bench Division shall be made returnable forthwith in such division, "provided that every writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum shall be made returnable immediately." Thus it is a cardinal condition of the issue of the writ that it shall be served and be returnable immediately; and, in fact, the reason why Walton J. quashed his order of the 29th July was that the writ could not be served at once. The object of the writ is to put an immediate stop to an unlawful imprisonment or detention of someone. Lord Halsbury, L.C. said: "Assume the fact that the detention has ceased, then the writ of habeas corpus is, in my judgment, inapplicable":

Barnardo v. Ford; Gossage's case, 67 L. T. Rep. 1; (1892) A. C. 326.

In that case the House of Lords disapproved of the law as laid down by the Court of Appeal in Reg. v. Barnardo; Tye's case (61 L. T. Rep. 547; 23 Q. B. Div. 305). It would be a very strange inconsistency in the law of England if the court were bound to do an act nugatory in itself:

Hobhouse's case, 3 B. & A. 420.

A writ of habeas corpus is not like a writ of attachment, which can be ordered to lie in the office.

Colefax for the prosecutor.—First, there is no evidence that Mrs. Pinckney is out of the jurisdiction. All we know is that in July she was in France with the child. Next, it is not material that the child is being detained out of the jurisdiction:

Barnardo v. Ford; Gossage's case (ubi sup.)

Nor is it necessary that the person detaining the child should be within the jurisdiction:

Ex parte Wyatt, 5 Dowl. 389.

There a writ of habeas corpus was served on a person in France and was disobeyed. The English proceeding had been recognised and ordered to be obeyed by the French tribunals. The Court of King's Bench refused to grant a rule absolute in the first instance for an attachment, but offered counsel for the applicant a rule nisi for an attachment. [COLLINS, M.R.—The court also offered, in the alternative, a new writ of habeas corpus, which was accepted, the defendant being at that time a prisoner for debt in the Marshalsea of the King's Bench, so that the case came to nothing.] No objection was taken before Walton J. that he had no power to order the writ to issue on the ground that Mrs. Pinckney was out of the jurisdiction. It is now too late to raise that point.

COLLINS, M.R.—It seems to me that the writ of habeas corpus in this case has been issued under a mistake. There is evidence that the last known place where Mrs. Pinckney was staying was somewhere in France, and she had expressed an intention to remain out of the jurisdiction. Under the circumstances it has hardly been contended that the court has jurisdiction to order a writ of habeas corpus to issue directed to a person who is not within the jurisdiction. Reliance was placed upon a kind of estoppel, because it was said that at the application to the judge at chambers no point was taken on behalf of Mrs. Pinckney that she was out of the jurisdiction. But the omission to raise that point would not give the court jurisdiction, if otherwise they had none. There was no jurisdiction to order the writ to issue, and the appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with that part of the order of Walton, J. by which he quashed his order of the 29th July, but I cannot agree with his order substituting a new writ which was to lie in the office till it could be served. I think he had no jurisdiction to make that order. This is not like a case of attachment. A writ of habeas corpus must be served immediately it is issued.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

MOORE, NETTLEFOLD, AND Co. v. SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Landlord and tenant—Distress for rent—Sale by auction—Purchase of goods by landlord—2 Will. & M., sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2—Practice—Appeal from County Court—Claim for less than 20l.—Appeal by leave—"Right of appeal"—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 120—Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 45—Judicature Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1, sub-s. 5.

Sect. 1, sub-sect. 5, of the Judicature Act 1894 applies to all cases in which an appeal has properly come before the High Court, whether it has come with leave or without leave.

A landlord who has distrained for arrears of rent cannot himself purchase the goods distrained when they are sold by auction under 2 Will. & M., sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2.

Dictum of Blackburn, J. in King v. England (9 L. T. Rep. 645; 4 B. & S. 782) approved.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (88 L. T. Rep. 739; (1903) 2 K. B. 168) affirmed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff company from a judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.) reversing a decision of the judge of the Shoreditch County Court.

The action was brought for the conversion of a sewing machine valued at 17l.

In March 1902 the defendants let the machine in question on the hire-purchase system to one Anton, the agreement containing a clause providing that the defendants should have power to seize the machine if the instalments should at any time be in arrear.

Anton was a tenant of the plaintiffs, and in July 1902 was in arrear with his rent.

The plaintiffs distrained for the rent, and seized the sewing machine in question.

The machine was then put up to auction, and at the auction was bought by the plaintiffs, who then let it out to Anton on the hire-purchase system.

In Oct. 1902 Anton made default in payment of the instalments due under his hire-purchase agreement with the defendants, and the defendants thereupon, in pursuance of the power contained in the agreement, seized the machine.

The plaintiffs brought this action for conversion of the machine in the Shoreditch County Court.

The County Court judge held that the purchase of the machine by the plaintiffs at the auction was a valid purchase, and that therefore the property in the machine was in the plaintiffs and that they were entitled to succeed in the action, and he gave judgment accordingly.

The Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.), upon the defendants' appeal, held that a landlord cannot himself purchase goods that he has distrained for rent when they are sold by auction, and that, as the plaintiffs' purchase of the machine was invalid, the defendants were entitled to judgment, and they accordingly reversed the decision of the County Court judge.

CT. OF APP.] MOORE, NETTLEFOLD, & CO. v. SINGER MANUFACTURING CO. [CT. OF APP.]

The case is reported 88 L. T. Rep. 739; (1903) 2 K. B. 168.

The Divisional Court refused leave to appeal, but leave was obtained by the plaintiffs on applying to the Court of Appeal.

On the appeal being called on, the defendants raised a preliminary objection.

Hugo Young, K.C. and H. H. Lawless for the respondents.—There is a preliminary objection to the hearing of this appeal. The amount recovered by the plaintiffs in the County Court being not more than 20*l.*, the appeal to the Divisional Court was only by virtue of leave given by the County Court judge under sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1888. The Divisional Court refused leave to appeal, and leave to appeal was given by this court upon the application of the plaintiffs. By sect. 45 of the Judicature Act 1873 the decision of a Divisional Court upon an appeal from a County Court is final "unless special leave to appeal from the same to the Court of Appeal shall be given by the Divisional Court by which such appeal shall have been heard." That section has not been repealed, and it is still in operation except so far as it has been altered by sect. 1 (5) of the Judicature Act 1894. Sect. 1 (5) of the Act of 1894 only gives the Court of Appeal power to grant leave to appeal "in all cases where there is a right of appeal to the High Court from any court or person." In the present case there was no "right of appeal" from the County Court to the High Court, but only a power to appeal with leave. Therefore this case does not come within the provisions of sect. 1 (5) of the Act of 1894, giving the Court of Appeal power to grant leave to appeal, but remains governed by sect. 45 of the Act of 1873, under which the Divisional Court alone can grant leave to appeal. In Re Oddy (71 L. T. Rep. 861; (1895) 1 Q. B. 392) the distinction was pointed out between cases where there is a "right of appeal" and cases where there is only a power to appeal with leave. In Hawkins v. Great Western Railway Company (14 R. 360) and Godman v. Moses (83 L. T. Rep. 46) it was held that the Court of Appeal could grant leave to appeal when the Divisional Court had refused leave, but this point was not raised. In Wynne-Finch v. Chaytor (89 L. T. Rep. 123; (1903) 2 Ch. 475) the decision of the full Court of Appeal was that sect. 1 (5) of the Act of 1894 applies only to appeals from inferior courts, and that decision does not affect the present question.

Lush, K.C. and Lincoln Reed for the plaintiffs.—This court had jurisdiction to grant leave to appeal. Sect. 1 (5) of the Judicature Act 1894 was passed for the purpose of making a uniform practice on appeal. It deals generally with all appeals from inferior courts to the High Court, and provides that the determination thereof by the Divisional Court shall be final unless leave to appeal is given either by that court or by the Court of Appeal. The words in sect. 1 (5), "where there is a right of appeal to the High Court," are taken from sects. 120 and 121 of the County Courts Act 1888. Sect. 121 provides for the procedure on appeal "in any action or matter in which there is a right of appeal," and clearly deals with all appeals from the County Court, whether with or without leave of the County Court judge. The distinction referred to by the words "right of appeal" in sects. 120 and 121 of the County Courts Act and sect. 1 (5) of the Judicature Act 1894 is between cases where there is a right to appeal either with or without leave and cases where there is no right of appeal at all. A party has just as much a "right of appeal" whether he appeals because he has obtained leave to appeal or because he can appeal without any leave. If the contention of the respondents that the words in sect. 5 (1), "where there is a right of appeal," refer only to cases where there is a right to appeal without leave were right, there would be no provision at all for the hearing of appeals by leave of the County Court judge, for those words govern the whole of sect. 1 (5); and, further, the provisions of sect. 121 of the County Courts Act 1888 would not apply to appeals by leave, and the appellant would have no right to a copy of the judge's notes. The decision in Godman v. Moses (ubi sup.) shows that sect. 45 of the Judicature Act 1873 has been repealed by sect. 1 (5) of the Act of 1894.

Hugo Young, K.C. in reply.—In sect. 120 of the County Courts Act 1889 the expression "right of appeal" is used, and there clearly refers only to cases in which there is a right to appeal without any leave.

Collins, M.R.—I am of opinion that the preliminary objection which has been raised in this case must fail. It seems to me that, when we examine the provisions of sect. 1 (5) of the Judicature Act 1894 and see what they aim at and deal with, it is quite obvious that they are not concerned with the initial condition of the action at all, but are dealing with the time when it becomes necessary to see what is the court by which an appeal can be heard. At the time when appeals have to be dealt with there are cases in which there is a right to appeal with leave and cases in which there is a right to appeal without any leave. The provisions of sect. 1 (5) deal with the court which is to hear all those appeals, and therefore must necessarily consider and deal with all those cases which are appealable and include all appealable cases, both those which are appealable with leave and those which are appealable without leave. It has been contended that the same expression, "right of appeal," is used in sects. 120 and 121 of the County Courts Act 1888, which give power to appeal to the High Court, and that therefore the expression in sect. 1 (5) must of necessity be addressed to the inception of the action, and not to the subsequent stage when the appeal comes before the High Court. But in sect. 1 (5) of the Judicature Act 1894 the provisions are addressed to a different stage, and there is undoubtedly a "right of appeal" when the appeal comes before the High Court, whether it comes there by leave or without leave. I think, therefore, that this objection fails, and that the appeal must be heard.

Romer, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the words "right of appeal" in sect. 1 (5) of the Judicature Act 1894 ought to be read in their ordinary sense as referring to the time when the court for hearing the appeal is to be constituted, and I should say that a party, if he had leave to appeal, had a "right of appeal" just as much as if he could have appealed without leave.

CT. OF APP.] MOORE, NETTLEFOLD, & Co. v. SINGER MANUFACTURING Co. [CT. OF APP.]

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Sect. 1 (5) applies to all appealable cases. There are two classes of appealable cases—those in which there is an appeal without any leave and those in which there is an appeal only with leave. If a party obtains leave to appeal, he is in just the same position as if he had a right to appeal ab initio.

Objection overruled.

March 14.—The appeal being heard this day, it was heard by consent before two judges only, under the Judicature Act 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 6), s. 1.

Montague Lush, K.C. and Arthur Page (Lincoln Reed with them) for the plaintiffs.—The Divisional Court decided this case in reliance upon a sentence of Blackburn, J., who said: "I think the sale in pursuance of stat. 2 Will. & M., sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2, must be a sale to a third person; otherwise many abuses might arise":

King v. England, 9 L. T. Rep. 645; 4 B. & S. 782.

But that was only an obiter dictum. The real ground of the decision is given in the judgment of Cockburn, C.J. The landlord in that case had the goods appraised and then took them at the appraised value, and it was his appropriation of the goods to himself in that way that the court held was not to be allowed. The case is no authority for saying that at a public auction the landlord may not buy. It is suggested that to allow the landlord to buy would open the door to abuses. But it is to the tenant's interest that there should be plenty of bidders at the auction, and if the landlord is willing to give more for any particular article put up for sale than any other bidder, it is to the tenant's advantage that the landlord's offer should be accepted. So far as public policy is concerned, there can be no greater objection to a landlord bidding at an auction of goods that he has distrained than an executor creditor bidding at a sale of goods taken in execution. They referred to sect. 5 of the Law of Distress Amendment Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 21), which abolishes the necessity of appraisement under 2 Will. & M., sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2, except where it is required by the tenant or owner of the goods. Then it was said that the landlord is the vendor at an auction of goods distrained for rent, and that he cannot sell to himself. That is not the correct view. The landlord is not the vendor. The goods are in the custody of the law. When the goods are sold the property in them is not transferred by the landlord, but by the law, as in the case of a sale by the sheriff. The landlord has no property in them, nor even possession. He cannot maintain trover:

R. v. Cotton, 2 Ves. Sen. 288.

The auctioneer who carries out the sale is the agent, not merely of the vendor, but also of the purchaser:

Emmerson v. Heelis, 2 Taunt. 38.

Therefore the contract of sale in this case cannot be said to be made by the landlord with himself. They cited also Bishop v. Bryant, 6 C. & P. 484.

Hugo Young, K.C. and Lawless for the defendants.—A landlord distraining for nonpayment of rent is not bound to sell by public auction. He may also sell by private treaty. If he can sell to himself at a public auction, there can be no reason why he cannot sell to himself by private treaty. That would open the door to great abuses. Even at a public auction the landlord, by arranging the sale at an inconvenient time or place, or by putting the goods together in lots in such a way as to hinder persons from bidding, might be enabled to do great injustice in order that he might himself buy the goods cheap. Though the landlord is not the owner of the goods distrained, yet under the statute of 2 Will. & M., sess. 1, c. 5, he is the vendor of the goods. In the present case the landlord was selling an article which belonged to a third person, and this is a thing which might lead to great abuse. A tenant might arrange with his landlord so that the landlord could buy in the article for a very small sum, and then let it out on hire to the tenant for a less sum than it was worth. In Rocke v. Hills (3 Times L. Rep. 298) Day, J. ruled that a landlord's agent could not act as an appraiser of goods distrained by the landlord. A fortiori the landlord could not be the purchaser of the goods. The question of whose agent the auctioneer is does not affect the question whether or not the landlord can sell to himself.

Arthur Page in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal against a decision of the Divisional Court upon a question arising out of a distress for rent put in by the plaintiffs as landlords. They seized among other things a sewing machine which had been let out on hire to the tenant, and upon the machine being put up for sale by public auction they bought it in at what was apparently a fair price. Having bought the machine, they then let it out to their tenant. The defendants are a sewing-machine company, and had originally let out the machine to the tenant on the hire-purchase system. The instalments due under their agreement fell into arrear, and they seized the machine under their powers under their agreement. Now, the landlords have brought this action against the sewing-machine company for conversion of the machine. That raises the question whether the landlords have any title to the machine. Now, it seems to me that the case is really on all fours with King v. England (ubi sup.). In that case there had been an appraisement of the goods distrained, as was then necessary, and the landlord took over the goods at the appraised value with the consent of the tenant, the goods being at the time of the distress the property of a third person. The true owner of the goods then seized them, and the result was an action against him for conversion, in the same way as in the present case. The only difference is that in this case the formality of a sale by auction took place. But still the substance of the thing is the same—namely, a sale by the landlord to himself. By the statute the landlord is to sell the goods distrained. It is true that the auctioneer selling at an auction is for certain purposes considered as agent both for vendor and purchaser, but primarily he is the agent of the vendor. The mischief in the present case is the same as in King v. England (ubi sup.)—namely, the landlord being both seller and buyer—and that mischief was pointed out in that case by Blackburn, J., and in the present case by Wills, J. It seems to me that both on principle and authority the decision of the Divisional Court was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is really the same as King v. England (ubi sup.). The Act of 2 Will. & M., sess. 1, c. 5, s. 2, makes the matter quite clear. Under that statute the landlord is empowered to sell the goods he has distrained for rent. A sale clearly means a sale to someone else. It is said that there was a sale because there was an auction. An auctioneer is the agent of the landlord to effect the sale, and he may be the agent of the buyer to record the sale. But in the present case there was no one but the landlord in the so-called sale. The case is clearly within the authority of King v. England (ubi sup.), and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

SOCIÉTÉ GÉNÉRALE POUR FAVORISER LE DÉVELOPPEMENT DU COMMERCE ET DE L'INDUSTRIE EN FRANCE v. JOHANN MARIA FARINA AND Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Execution—Discovery in aid—Judgment against a company—Examination as to property of company—Ex-director—"Any officer"—Order XLII., r. 32.

Order XLII., r. 32, provides that when a judgment for the payment of money has been recovered against a company, the court or a judge may order that "any officer thereof" shall be orally examined as to whether the company has any property or means of satisfying the judgment.

Held, that the court or a judge has jurisdiction under this rule to make an order for the examination of a person who has been a director of the company, though he may have ceased to hold that office.

APPEAL by Gottlob Emmanuel Staenglen from an order of Phillimore J. at chambers.

On the 9th Oct. 1902 this action was brought by the plaintiffs, a French société anonyme, upon a bill of exchange for 5000fr. accepted by the defendants.

On the 18th Oct. appearance was entered by Messrs. Marshall and Marshall, solicitors for the defendants, in the following form:

Enter an appearance for Compagnie d'installation pour l'Eclairage et le Chauffage par le Gaz à Bâle, a société anonyme trading as Johann Maria Farina et Cie., gegenüber dem Josephsplatz, and sued as Johann Maria Farina and Co. in this action.

On the 29th Oct. an application was made on behalf of the plaintiffs for summary judgment under Order XIV., whereupon an affidavit was filed on behalf of the defendants, made by the appellant, Gottlob Emmanuel Staenglen, who therein described himself as a director of the Compagnie d'Installation, &c.; and upon such application unconditional leave to defend was given.

On the 24th April 1903 the defendants withdrew their defence, and thereupon judgment was signed by the plaintiffs for the sum of 207l. 0s. 9d. and costs to be taxed.

As this judgment remained unsatisfied, and the plaintiffs were unable to discover any asset of the defendants whereon to levy execution, the plaintiffs, on the 5th Nov. 1903, obtained an order from the master under Order XLII., r. 32, directing an examination of the said Gottlob Emmanuel Staenglen, as a director of the judgment debtors, as to what debts were owing to the judgment debtors, and whether they had any and what property and means to satisfy the judgment obtained by the plaintiffs. This order was not opposed, nor was it appealed against.

The order was duly served on Staenglen.

On the 5th Feb. 1904 Staenglen attended before the master who had been appointed to hold the examination.

At this examination Staenglen admitted that he was a director of the Compagnie d'Installation, &c., at the time when the judgment in this action had been obtained, and that Johann Maria Farina and Co. were never registered as a company, but were merely a name used by the Compagnie d'Installation, &c. After making these admissions, however, he refused, on the advice of his solicitor, to answer any further questions or to give any information as to the debts due or property of the alleged Compagnie d'Installation, &c., or Johann Maria Farina and Co., on the ground that, as he alleged, he had ceased to be a director of the Compagnie d'Installation subsequently to the date of the judgment—namely, on the 30th June 1903.

The master, after hearing the objections of the solicitor who appeared on behalf of Staenglen at the examination, ruled that Staenglen was bound to answer the questions put to him with regard to the debts due and property of the company, but Staenglen still refused to answer, and thereupon the master adjourned the examination to make an application to be made to the judge.

Upon the plaintiffs' application to the judge for an order to commit Staenglen for contempt of court, Phillimore, J. made an order directing Staenglen to attend at his own expense before the master to be examined.

Staenglen appealed from this order of Phillimore, J.

Order XLII. provides as follows:

Rule 32. When a judgment or order is for the recovery or payment of money, the party entitled to enforce it may apply to the court or a judge for an order that the debtor liable under such judgment or order, or, in the case of a corporation, that any officer thereof, be orally examined as to whether any and what debts are owing to the debtor, and whether the debtor has any and what other property or means of satisfying the judgment or order, before a judge or an officer of the court as the court or judge shall appoint; and the court or judge may make an order for the attendance and the examination of such debtor, or of any other person, and for the production of any books or documents.

C. F. Hohler for Staenglen.—Order XLII., r. 32, provides that "any officer" of the company may be ordered to be examined as to the company's property. That means "any existing officer."

The rule does not enable the court to order any one to be examined subject only to the provision that at some time or another he has been an officer of the company. Staenglen had ceased to be a director of the company when the order for his examination was made, and therefore the court had no jurisdiction to compel him to undergo the examination. The rule must be construed strictly. In a case where the judgment debtor was a married woman, the Court of Appeal held that no one but the judgment debtor herself could be examined under this rule as to her property:

APP.] SOCIÉTÉ, &C., DU COMMERCE ET DE L'INDUSTRIE EN FRANCE v. J. M. FARINA & Co. [APP.]

Hood-Barrs v. Heriot; Ex parte Blyth, 75 L. T. Rep. 15; (1896) 2 Q. B. 338.

And in the case of a corporation being a judgment debtor, Lord Esher, M.R. said that the expression "any other person," at the end of r. 32, "does not include within the rule in the case of an individual debtor any other person than himself, or, in the case of a corporation, anyone but officers of the corporation":

Irwell v. Eden, 56 L. T. Rep. 620; 18 Q. B. Div. 588.

He referred also to

Republic of Costa Rica v. Strousberg, 43 L. T. Rep. 399; 16 Ch. Div. 8.

F. M. Abrahams for the plaintiffs.—The expression "any officer" includes past as well as present officers. If it did not, a company, by changing its officers, might prevent a judgment creditor from obtaining the information to which, under this rule, he is entitled. It is enough if the judgment creditor can show that the ex-officer of the company whose examination is desired is a person who is likely to be able to give the required information. Then the court, in its discretion, may order him to be examined. Sect. 115 of the Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89) contains an enactment very similar to rule 32. It provides that when an order has been made for the winding-up of a company, the court may summon before it for examination "any officer of the company or person known or suspected to have in his possession any of the estate or effects of the company, or supposed to be indebted to the company, or any person whom the court may deem capable of giving information concerning the trade, dealings, estate or effects of the company." There the words "any officer" include any ex-officer, within reasonable limits. Further, there is not proper evidence here that Staenglen is not still an officer of the company. We know for certain that he was a director of the company when judgment was signed against it, and against that we merely have his assertion that, in order to avoid being examined, he has resigned his directorship. There is no further evidence of his resignation, and we do not know what he has actually done in order to carry out his resignation, nor what is the legal effect of what he may have done.

Hohler in reply.—This is a foreign company, and the Companies Acts have nothing to do with it. There is nothing to contradict the evidence that the appellant is no longer an officer of the company. The whole question turns on the meaning of rule 32.

Collins, M.R.—This is an appeal from Phillimore, J. at chambers, who ordered the appellant to attend at his own expense and be examined before the master. The action was brought against Johann Maria Farina and Co., but appearance was entered for the "Compagnie d'Installation pour l'Eclairage et le Chauffage par le Gaz à Bâle, a société anonyme trading as Johann Maria Farina et Cie., gegenüber dem Josephsplatz, and sued as Johann Maria Farina and Co. in this action." That substituted the Compagnie d'Installation in the place of Johann Maria Farina and Co. as defendants in the action. Judgment was obtained against the defendants, and an application was afterwards made under Order XLII., r. 32, for the examination of the appellant as a director of the defendant company. Now, in answer to the application made by the plaintiffs for leave to sign judgment under Order XIV., the appellant swore an affidavit in which he stated that he was then a director of the company, and authorised to make affidavits on their behalf. Naturally, therefore, the plaintiffs, upon their application under Order XLII., r. 32, proposed to have him examined. He attended the examination as directed, but he refused to answer questions put to him, on the ground that he had ceased to be a director of the defendant company since the date when judgment had been recovered against them. Thereupon an application was made by the plaintiffs to Phillimore, J., who has made the order against which this appeal is brought. The appellant's contention is that because he was not a director of the company at the time when the order was made under Order XLII., r. 32, the court or judge had no jurisdiction to make any order against him under that rule. That contention seems to me to put too narrow a construction upon that rule. I see no ground for limiting its application so as to make it apply only to persons who, at the time of the application to the judge, are officers of the company. The rule enables the judge to order "any officer" of the company to be examined. I do not think that it is incompatible with that expression to say that persons who have been officers of the company may be ordered to be examined. It cannot be that an officer of the company can get rid of his liability to be examined and give information as to the company's assets merely by resigning his office. I may add that as regards the appellant, we do not know whether he has resigned his directorship in the proper way or what is the exact effect of what he has done. But, however that may be, I think that it would be too narrow a construction to put upon rule 32 if we limited it so as to make it applicable only to persons who at the date of the order are officers of the company. There are somewhat analogous provisions in sect. 115 of the Companies Act 1862, but the effect of that section has not been limited to persons who are existing officers of the company in question. It seems to me that the expression "any officer thereof" in rule 32 has reference not to a period of time, but to the character of the person to be examined, and I think it is putting a fair construction on the words to say that they give power to examine a person who has been an officer of the company. Though he may have ceased to be an officer of the company, yet he may have some power or control over the company's property, and be able to give information about it. For those reasons I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

CT. OF APP.] CONTINENTAL CAOUTCHOUC, & CO., CO. v. KLEINWORT, SONS, & CO. [CT. OF APP.]

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant was a director of the defendant company when judgment was recovered against them, but he alleges now that he had ceased to be a director when the order was made for his examination as to the company's property. He made no application to have that order set aside, but, when he attended before the master in obedience to the order, he refused to answer the questions put to him. It is contended that under the words of Order XLII., r. 32, he was not bound to answer the questions. Now, it must be remembered that the object with which rule 32 was made was to enable a person who has obtained judgment against a company to get from persons connected with the company information which he is entitled to have as to the property and assets of the company. I do not think that a company ought to be allowed to escape investigation as to its property by getting its directors to resign. We ought not to put such a construction as that upon the rule. The appellant in this case was certainly a director of the company until quite recently, and he must have the information as to its property which the plaintiffs are entitled to get. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

CONTINENTAL CAOUTCHOUC AND GUTTA PERCHA COMPANY v. KLEINWORT, SONS, AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Principal and agent—Mistake—Money paid to agent—Remittance to banker—Credit given by banker to customer—Remittance made by mistake—Recovery back from banker by payer.

K. was a merchant, financed by two banks. These banks were each in the habit of advancing money to K. on the security of the shipping documents of goods, bought by him. When he sold such goods he was in the habit of obtaining from them the necessary documents to enable him to deliver the goods, and at the same time assigning to them the purchase money. On receipt of the purchase money from the purchasers of the goods, the banks would credit the amount to K.'s account.

The plaintiffs bought several parcels of goods from K., and received from him notice of the assignment of the purchase money. The purchase money of some of the parcels was assigned to one bank, and of the other parcels to the other bank. Through a mistake of their clerk the whole of the money payable by the plaintiffs in respect of all these parcels of goods was paid over by them to only one of the banks, with instructions to credit K.'s account with the amount. This was accordingly done by the bank under the belief that the whole of the money was rightly paid over to them. On discovering the over-payment, the plaintiffs asked the bank to return it. The bank refused. In an action to recover back the money:

Held (affirming the decision of Bigham, J. at the trial), that the plaintiffs were entitled to the return from the bank of the money that had been thus paid them by mistake.

APPEAL by the defendant company from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover back a sum of 1480*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.* paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants by mistake.

At the trial Bigham, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The case is reported 8 Com. Cas. 277.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Bigham, J. :—

A firm of Kramrisch and Co. carried on business in Liverpool as importers of rubber. The defendants, who were foreign bankers and also carried on business in London, were in the habit of making advances to Kramrisch and Co. on the security of the shipping documents of the rubber, and when the rubber arrived in this country the defendants continued the advances, holding the rubber itself as their security. When Kramrisch and Co. sold any part of the goods it was their practice to apply to the defendants for a corresponding delivery order, which the defendants gave them, thereby enabling Kramrisch and Co. to fulfil their contract of sale with their buyer. In exchange for the delivery order Kramrisch and Co. gave to the defendants a letter containing the particulars of the sale, the quantity, the price, and the name of the buyer, and by the same letter they assigned to the defendants the right to receive the purchase money; this assignment Kramrisch and Co. completed by a written notice to the buyer notifying that the money was to be paid to the defendants. Thus, although when the rubber was sold the defendants parted with the goods, they got in place of the rubber the right to receive the price from the buyer. When the buyer paid the price, the defendants credited the amount to Kramrisch and Co.'s account, and thus the transaction ended. Kramrisch and Co. did business in this way not only with the defendants, but also with a firm of Wm. Brandt, Sons, and Co.

The plaintiffs were customers of Kramrisch and Co., and frequently bought parcels of rubber from them, and following the practice above described they were in the habit from time to time of paying the price to the defendants or to Brandt and Co., as the case might be, in accordance with the directions given to them by Kramrisch and Co.

In Dec. 1902 and Jan. 1903 the plaintiffs had bought from Kramrisch and Co. several parcels of rubber which had been held by the defendants as security for advances made to Kramrisch and Co. The defendants had parted with these parcels of goods, getting from Kramrisch and Co. an assignment of the right to receive the price, of which assignment express notice in writing had been given to the plaintiffs. The goods were delivered to the plaintiffs and from time to time in the early part of January the plaintiffs made remittances to the defendants on account of the price. The total price of the different parcels so bought by plaintiffs was 9505*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.*, and the payments made on account amounted to 8259*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.* Thus there remained a balance of 1246*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* to be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants.

It appears that at this time the plaintiffs were also purchasers from Kramrisch and Co. of three other parcels of rubber amounting to 1480*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.*, against which advances had been made to Kramrisch and Co. by Brandt and Co.; and the plaintiffs were, by virtue of an assignment made by Kramrisch and Co. in favour of Brandt and Co., under an obligation to pay the price of these parcels to Brandt and Co. By a blunder on the part of one of the plaintiffs' clerks the fact was overlooked that this 1480*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.* was to go to Brandt and Co., and the remittances for the whole amount (the 1246*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* and the 1480*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.*) were sent by plaintiffs to the defendants. Thus the defendants received an amount (1480*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.*) which ought to have been sent to Brandt and Co.

On the 7th Feb. Brandt and Co. wrote to the plaintiffs to know why the money for the three parcels of rubber, the 1480*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.*, had not been remitted to them in accordance with the undertaking created by the assignment. The plaintiffs then discovered the blunder which had been made by their clerk, and on Feb. 10 they wrote to the defendants asking to have the matter put right by the return of the money.

The defendants refused to return the money, alleging that in effect it had been paid over to Kramrisch and Co. or had been accounted for to them; and, further, that on the faith of the representation made by the plaintiffs that the money was available for Kramrisch and Co. in the defendants' hands, the defendants had been induced to give fresh credit to Kramrisch and Co.; and, further, that whether the payment had or had not induced the giving of fresh credit, the state of the accounts between Kramrisch and Co. and the defendants had, in fact, been altered between the dates of the receipt of the money and the notification of the mistake.

Shortly after the notification of the mistake Kramrisch and Co. failed; and thereupon Brandt and Co. called on the plaintiffs to pay the 1480*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.* in accordance with the obligation created by the assignment, and the plaintiffs did pay, as indeed they were bound to do. Thus the plaintiffs had paid the money twice over, the first time in mistake to the defendants, the second time properly to Brandt and Co., and the question now was whether they could recover back from the defendants the amount of the first payment or whether they must be satisfied with a proof against the bankrupt estate of Kramrisch and Co.

Before the mistaken remittance was made, Kramrisch and Co. had advised the defendants of large sales of rubber to the plaintiffs in addition to those already referred to, and had obtained corresponding deliveries of goods from the defendants. Such sales had in fact been made, but Kramrisch and Co., instead of delivering the goods to the plaintiffs, converted them to their own use, so that plaintiffs owed nothing in respect of them. Of this, however, the defendants were unaware, so that when they received the remittance they believed that it was properly sent to them against the goods with which they had parted.

By the letters from the plaintiffs to the defendants in which the remittances were inclosed the defendants were requested to credit the amount to Kramrisch and Co., and in accordance with these letters the defendants did credit Kramrisch and Co.'s account with the remittances, and so advised the plaintiffs when they wrote acknowledging the receipt of the money. Not only did the defendants deal with the remittances in the way they were told to deal with them, but they also advised Kramrisch and Co. of the receipt of the money and that the amount had been passed to their credit. Kramrisch and Co., in answer to this, wrote back to the defendants saying that they noted the fact and had made entries in their own books in conformity therewith. Bigham, J. found that Kramrisch and Co. knew well that the plaintiffs ought not to have paid the money to the defendants, and that they (Kramrisch and Co.) had no right to the credit of which the defendants had sent advice; and that they kept their mouths shut. Between the receipt of the money and the notification of the mistake the state of the accounts between Kramrisch and Co. and the defendants underwent considerable changes, the general effect of which was to reduce very considerably the large amount owing to Kramrisch and Co. No doubt, in the course of these changes, some payments were made by the defendants to Kramrisch and Co. or on their account; but they were far less in amount than the payments in, and they were either made against ample security or were of insignificant amounts. Moreover, not one of the payments to Kramrisch and Co. was in any way induced by the receipt of the money from the plaintiffs. This the defendants themselves admitted, and the learned judge was satisfied, as a matter of fact, that it was so. The receipt of the money in no way caused the defendants to make any payment or to grant any indulgence to Kramrisch and Co., or to favour them in any way. Their business with Kramrisch and Co. would have gone on precisely as it did, even if the money had not been received, for the open account was, at the time of the payment, so large and the subsequent dealings were so small and of such little importance that the mistaken payment could not have influenced, as indeed it did not influence, the defendants in any way.

The defendants were still large creditors of Kramrisch and Co.

On these facts Bigham J. held that the 1480*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.* was paid into the defendants' hands in such circumstances of mistake as to make it money paid by the plaintiffs to their own use, and that it had never ceased to have that character. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 26.—COLLINS, M.R. read the following judgment:—This is an appeal from the decision of Bigham, J., who has held that the appellants are bound to repay to the plaintiffs a sum of 1480*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.* paid by them to the defendants under a mistake of fact. The defence is that the sum in question was paid to and received by the defendants as agents for Kramrisch and Co., now bankrupt, with whom they had, previous to the plaintiffs' demand, settled it in account. The facts are fully and lucidly stated in the judgment of Bigham, J., and a bare outline is all that is necessary to make this judgment intelligible. Kramrisch was an importer of indiarubber, carrying on business at Liverpool. He was financed by two "merchant bankers," as they are described in the case, viz., the defendants Kleinwort, Sons, and Co., and Brandt and Co., who only come incidentally into this discussion. The course of business as between Kramrisch and these firms was that when he imported a parcel of indiarubber one or other of these firms made itself liable to the vendor for the price upon the security of the shipping documents, which were deposited with the firm, and as Kramrisch effected sales of the rubber so imported the financing firm released the bills of lading covering such sale and transmitted them to the purchaser, taking from Kramrisch an authority to receive the price from the purchaser direct. The plaintiffs, before the transaction in question, had bought from Kramrisch parcels of indiarubber, some of which he had imported through the aid of the defendants and some through that of Brandt and Co., and had in each case arranged to pay direct to the defendants and Brandt and Co. respectively according to the instructions received with each consignment. The sum in question in this case represented the price of indiarubber which was in fact payable direct to Brandt and Co., but by a mistake of a clerk of the plaintiffs it was sent to the defendants instead of to the account of Kramrisch. The defendants placed it to the credit of Kramrisch in their account with him, and apprised him of the fact, and he acknowledged and approved what they had done. It was contended by the defendants that they were thus discharged from all liability to the plaintiffs. Bigham, J. has rejected their contention, and I am of opinion that he was right. Without going into the question whether there was an absolute assignment of the debt by Kramrisch to Kleinwort, Sons, and Co., with notice to the plaintiffs—a matter that was discussed under somewhat similar circumstances in Brandt, Sons, and Co. v. Dunlop Rubber Company (ante, p. 106; (1904) 1 K. B. 387)—the undisputed facts are sufficient, in my judgment, to decide this case in favour of the plaintiffs. It is clear law that prima facie the person to whom money has been paid under a mistake of fact is liable to refund it, even though he may have paid it away to third parties in ignorance of the mistake. He has had the benefit of the windfall and must restore it to the true owner. On the other hand, it is equally clear that an intermediary who has received money for the purpose of handing it on to a third party, and has handed it on, is no longer accountable to the sender. In such case he is a mere conduit-pipe, and has not had the benefit of the windfall. A case rather more difficult arises when the mode by which he passes it on is by settlement in account with a third party for whom he has received it, involving the application of the money to the discharge of a debt due from the third party to himself. He has thus no doubt benefited by getting his debt paid, but he has done so in discharging his primary duty of passing the money on to his principal. He has constructively sent it on and received it back, and has done nothing incompatible with his position as a conduit-pipe or intermediary. He was entitled to be paid, and has been paid by his debtor, who was no doubt put in funds to do so by the receipt of the money, and who therefore, and not the intermediary, has had the benefit of the windfall. Hence the care with which the courts have considered whether the sum has in fact been effectually passed out of the hands of the agent into those of the principal, no entry by the agent in his books sufficing until the assent of the principal has completed the transaction: (see Buller v. Harrison, 2 Cowp. 565). But these questions as to whether or not the sum received has been effectually passed on to the principal are only material in those cases where the person receiving is really and primarily a mere intermediary—that is to say, a person who as against his principal has no right to receive the fund for the purpose of passing it on. Once place him in the position of a person who has a right to receive and apply the fund for his own benefit, and he is at once taken out of the category of mere intermediaries for whom alone the defence is available that they have acted as such and passed on to another the liability to refund the windfall. I think the cases of Buller v. Harrison (2 Cowp. 565), Cox v. Prentice (3 M. & S. 344), Holland v. Russell (4 L. T. Rep. 547; 1 B. & S. 424; in error, 8 L. T. Rep. 468; 4 B. & S. 14), and Newall v. Tomlinson (25 L. T. Rep. 382; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 405), particularly the judgment of Brett, J., fully establish the above propositions. Now, in this case it is quite clear that, as between Kleinwort, Sons, and Co. and Kramrisch, the former were the persons primarily entitled to receive the purchase money of the goods in respect of which they had released the bills of lading. Had the sum due from the buyer been deposited with a third party and become the subject of an interpleader issue between Kramrisch and the defendants, it must, I think, have been awarded to the defendants. For these reasons I think that the defendants in respect of the sum claimed are in no better position than any other persons who have received for their own benefit money paid to them under a mistake of fact. The grounds on which I base my opinion relieve me from discussing some of the points referred to in the judgment of Bigham, J. and in the admirable argument before us. In my opinion the appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J. read the following judgment:—I am of the same opinion. I will only add that, in my opinion in this case, unlike the one recently decided by us and referred to by the Master of the Rolls, the evidence is sufficient to establish an equitable assignment as between Kramrisch and the defendants. The proceeds of the rubber against which the defendants had made advances and which was consigned to the plaintiffs for sale were equitably assigned by Kramrisch in favour of the defendants. And, if it were essential to the present case (though, in my opinion, it is not), I should come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had notice of the assignment, and could only disregard that notice at their peril. But, in justice to the plaintiffs, I think they did not disregard the notice. On the contrary, it was, in my opinion, because the plaintiffs recognised the obligation cast upon them that they forwarded the proceeds of the rubber to the defendants, and it was by reason of the mistake in fact made on their behalf, in thinking that the moneys, the subject of this action, were proceeds of such rubber, that these moneys were forwarded to the defendants. When the mistake in fact was discovered the plaintiffs became entitled to recover the moneys from the defendants, unless the defendants could show that they had received the moneys as agents, and before notice of the mistake had parted with them to their principal, or so dealt with them by mandate of their principal as to render it unjust to call upon them to repay the moneys to the plaintiffs. But in the present case the defendants could not show that they had so received and dealt with the moneys. In fact, they received the moneys by virtue of the rights existing between them and Kramrisch, including their rights as equitable assignees, and when they had so received the moneys they dealt with them according to those rights, and not according to any unfettered right of Kramrisch to direct how the moneys should be dealt with. The notice they gave to Kramrisch of the way in which the moneys had been appropriated by them was simply notice that they had applied them according to their own rights as previously pointed out, and not by way of obtaining a ratification from Kramrisch of a previously unauthorised application. I agree, therefore, that the appeal fails.

Re FOX; WODEHOUSE v. FOX. (a)

Will—Powers of appointment and advancement—Hotchpot clause.

A testator gave his real and residuary personal estate upon trust for his wife for life, and after her death for his four children as his wife should by will appoint. In default of appointment the children were to take equally. The testator's will contained a power of advancement. Any child who had received any part of the funds under any appointment was, in default of appointment to the contrary, to bring the appointed funds into hotchpot. After the testator's death 705*l.* was advanced to R., one of his children. The widow subsequently by her will appointed one equal fourth part of the property of which she was tenant for life to each of two of her children absolutely, and one equal fourth part upon trust for each of her other children (of whom R. was one) respectively for life, with remainder to their respective children. No reference was made in the widow's will to the 705*l.* advanced to R.

*Held, that R. was not liable to bring into hotchpot or account for the 705*l.* advanced to him out of his expectant share.*

By his will the Rev. W. C. Fox devised and bequeathed all his real estate and the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon trust to pay the income thereof to his wife for her life, and after her death "in trust for all such one or more exclusively of the others or other of my children, Eliza Frances Fox, Lionel Wodehouse Fox, Armine Wodehouse Fox, and Raymond Wodehouse Fox, or their issue respectively born or to be born during the life of my said wife, or within twenty-one years after her death, at such age or time or respective ages or times, if more than one, in such shares and with such future executory or other trusts for the benefit of the said issue, or some or one of them, with such provisions for their respective advancement, maintenance, or education at the discretion either of the said trustees or trustee, or of any other persons or person, and upon such conditions with such restrictions and in such manner as my said wife shall, whether covert or sole, by will or codicil appoint, and in default of such appointment, and so far as no such appointment shall extend, in trust for all such of my four last-mentioned children living at my death, and of the children then living or afterwards born of any such child or children having died in my lifetime as being male attain the age of twenty-one years, or being female attain that age or marry under that age, if more than one as tenants in common in equal shares, so that my children who shall be objects of this trust shall take in equal shares, and the children being objects of this trust of any child of mine having died in my lifetime shall take equally between them the share which the parent would have taken had he or she survived me. Provided always that no child who or whose issue shall take any part of the said premises under any appointment in pursuance of the power hereinbefore contained shall, in default of appointment to the contrary, have or be entitled to any share of the unappointed part of the said trust premises without bringing the share or shares appointed to him or her or to his or her issue into hotchpot, and accounting for the same accordingly. Provided always and I hereby declare that it shall be lawful for the said trustees or trustee after the death of my said wife or previously thereto, with her consent in writing, to raise any part or parts not exceeding in the whole one half of the then expectant or presumptive share of any child under the trusts hereinbefore declared, and to apply the same for his or her advancement or benefit as the said trustees or trustee shall think fit."

The testator died in Oct. 1883.

His widow in 1890 sent to the trustees a request in writing that they would, under the advancement clause in the testator's will, advance to her son Raymond Wodehouse Fox, who was then a minor, the sum of 400*l.* to enable him to be articled to a solicitor. The money was advanced, and the receipt for the same was signed by the widow. In Dec. 1894 the trustees similarly advanced to Raymond Wodehouse Fox a sum of 305*l.*

On the 22nd June 1898 the widow made her will and, after reciting the power given to her

(a) Reported by E. L. HOPKINS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Re FOX; WODEHOUSE v. FOX.

by her husband's will "to appoint his real and residuary personal estate of which I am tenant for life," appointed that the trustees should stand possessed of the trust estate "upon trust, as to one equal fourth part or share thereof, for my said daughter Eliza Frances Williams absolutely for her own benefit, and as to one other equal fourth part or share thereof upon trust for my said son Armine Wodehouse Fox absolutely for his benefit, and as to one other equal fourth part or share thereof upon trust to retain the same and pay the income thereof to my son Lionel Wodehouse Fox until his death or until he shall become bankrupt or assign or charge the said income or some part thereof," and then if he died in trust for his children as he should appoint, and in default of appointment for all his children equally, and if he had no children then for his brothers and sister, but if he became bankrupt in trust for all his children equally. The testatrix gave "the remaining fourth part or share of my husband's trust estate upon trusts similar in all respects mutatis mutandis in favour of my son Raymond Wodehouse Fox to those hereinbefore expressed with reference to the one fourth share hereinbefore appointed in favour of the said Lionel Wodehouse Fox."

On the 8th Dec. 1900 the testatrix made a codicil to her will and thereby directed that another sum of 700*l.* which had been advanced by the husband of her daughter Eliza Frances Williams to Raymond Wodehouse Fox should, in the division of the testator's estate, be charged upon the share directed to be retained by the trustees for Raymond Wodehouse Fox and added to the share given to Eliza Frances Williams.

By a second codicil, dated the 29th March 1901, the testatrix directed that the trustees should have power to apply one half of the share of Lionel and Raymond for their advancement respectively, and she gave Raymond a general power of appointment over his share.

There was no reference either in her will or codicils to the advancement of the sum of 705*l.* to Raymond.

Mrs. Fox died on the 9th July 1901.

This originating summons was taken out by the trustees of the testator's will for the determination of the following questions: First, whether the 705*l.* advanced to Raymond Wodehouse Fox out of his expectant share ought to be brought into hotchpot or accounted for; and, secondly, if so, in what manner it was to be done.

Crossfield for the defendant Raymond Wodehouse Fox.—The advances made to Raymond were irrevocable, and the sum of 705*l.* was thereby withdrawn from the settlement, and no longer formed part of the settled funds:

Re Gosset's Settlement, 19 Beav. 529, 535;

Lawrie v. Bankes, 4 K. & J. 142.

The money advanced to Raymond became his property for all purposes, and consequently the widow had only power to appoint property which had not been advanced. She only purported by her will to deal with the property of which she was tenant for life; and as she had parted with the 705*l.* she was no longer tenant for life of it.

Her trustees could not "retain" it, for it was gone. It is clear from the codicils that the intention of the testatrix was that Raymond should have an interest in a share of the trust estate equal to the other shares. He is entitled to retain the 705*l.* advanced to him, and also to have a life interest under his mother's will in one fourth of the remainder of the trust funds.

Harman for the brothers and sisters of Raymond.—The sum advanced must be brought into account. The power of appointment given to the testator's widow being a special power, the appointment must be read into the testator's will. The money advanced to Raymond was not taken out of the trust estate absolutely. According to the ordinary practice of conveyancers, the trust estate is to be treated as consisting of the remaining investments, plus any money which may have been advanced:

Davidson's Precedents in Conveyancing, 3rd edit., vol. 3, pt. 2, p. 772.

[BYRNE, J.—The hotchpot clause only applies in default of appointment. Mrs. Fox has exercised her power of appointment, and has deliberately abstained from making the shares equal.] She was purporting to deal with everything that could form part of the trust estate, including the money advanced, which had not been taken out of the estate for all purposes. In Re Gosset's Settlement (ubi sup.) the question was whether the money paid to the son was appointed to him or taken as an advance. The judgment was on that point only, and it was held that the hotchpot clause applied. That case did not decide that money advanced was taken out of the estate altogether. The 705*l.* formed part of the estate which Mrs. Fox appointed. Reading the two wills together, the advance must be treated as having been made subsequently to the date of the testator's will. If it had been made in his lifetime, the rule against double portions would have applied, and the court can treat that rule as applying in the present case. The second question does not arise if the 705*l.* is not to be brought into account.

BYRNE, J. stated the facts and continued:—There are expressions in the lady's will in which she speaks of her husband's residuary estate of which she was tenant for life. There is no reference in it to the advance of 705*l.* to Raymond. It is argued that Raymond ought to bring into account, or that there ought to be brought into account, from the share given to him and his children, a sum equal to the advances made to him. It is admitted that the hotchpot clause has no application to the matter, and that there is no general equity that a person who has been advanced should repay the sum advanced in such circumstances as these. The question is whether, looking at the appointment which has been made, there was an intention that this 705*l.* should be brought into account. I think it clear that such advances as these take the sum advanced out of the trust estate altogether. In Re Gosset's Settlement (ubi sup.) the will contained a power of appointment and a power of advancement, and a hotchpot clause which was applicable to the latter and not to the former. The Master of the Rolls said: "An advancement has a definite meaning distinct from an appointment. It means that a certain portion of the fund is actually taken out of the settlement altogether and paid over to the object of the power. But an appointment deals only with the reversion of the fund, leaving the previous life interests untouched." And in Lawrie v. Bankes (ubi sup.), where there had been an advancement to a son for the purpose of procuring a commission, and he had got possession of the fund, it was held that the amount of the advancement was taken out of the trust estate so as to free him from any liability to bring it into account. The last paragraph of the headnote says: "Proceeds of the sale by an infant of his commission in the army, purchased three months previously at his request by his trustees, under a power to raise money for his maintenance and advancement out of a fund in which he had only a contingent interest: Held, in the absence of fraud, to belong to the infant, although the trustees' object in exercising the power had failed ab initio." It appears to me, looking at the will of the widow, that I cannot find anything to make me say that she made an appointment of what at that time constituted her husband's estate so as to ensure the bringing of the advance into account. There is nothing unreasonable in such a scheme as this, for it is always in the power of the appointor to appoint so as to make it certain that money advanced shall be accounted for. As I read her will, the widow intended to appoint the funds so that Raymond should not be liable to account for the 705*l*.

CURL BROTHERS LIMITED v. WEBSTER. (a)

Goodwill—Sale of business with goodwill—Vendor interested in new business—Solicitation of old customers who have also become customers of the new business.

The vendor of an interest in a business which with the goodwill thereof had been sold by him to a company solicited on behalf of a competing business in which he was interested customers of the old business, who were also customers of the competing business.

Held, that, on the rule laid down in Trego v. Hunt (73 L. T. Rep. 514; (1896) A. C. 7), the vendor must be restrained by injunction from soliciting the customers of the business which he had sold, whether or not such customers were also customers of the competing business.

WITNESS ACTION.

On the 17th May 1899 a firm known as Curl Brothers, who had some time previously carried on the business of wholesale drapers and warehousemen in the city of Norwich, entered into an agreement with a trustee on behalf of a limited company proposed to be formed for the sale of the business and goodwill to such company. Such company was to be known as Curl Brothers Limited.

At the date of this agreement the firm consisted of Jacob Curl and Henley Curl, Robert William Claxton Skoyles, and William Hucks Webster.

The company was registered on the 18th May 1889, and on the 14th July the agreement was confirmed by the company.

The brothers Curl and Webster entered into an agreement with the company to act as directors thereof until the 3rd Jan. 1903. Webster agreed thereunder that he would, with certain exceptions, devote his whole time to the business of the company and the furtherance of such business, and would not prior to the 3rd Jan. be concerned, either directly or indirectly, as a partner or manager or otherwise in any business whatsoever other than the business of the company.

Webster continued to act as a managing director of the company until Jan. 1903, when he ceased to be a director and left the company's business. He thereupon joined with another firm of drapers in Norwich in promoting and bringing out a company known as the Norwich Warehouse Company Limited, and in this company he was a director and considerable shareholder.

The company commenced business, and Curl Brothers Limited brought an action against Webster to restrain him from soliciting the plaintiffs' customers, either personally by a traveller or by letter.

It was admitted in the course of the trial that the defendant had solicited custom from certain customers of the plaintiffs.

Some of these persons, however, it was alleged, had voluntarily become the customers of the Norwich Warehouse Company Limited prior to the date of such solicitation by the defendant.

The question, therefore, was argued whether in granting an injunction against the defendant the court should confine the injunction to cases in which the customers had not become the customers of Norwich Warehouse Company Limited prior to the date of the defendant's solicitation.

Eldon Bankes, K.C. and R. J. Parker for the plaintiffs.

Upjohn, K.C. and Jessel for the defendant.—The relief to which the plaintiffs are entitled (and we do not deny that they are entitled to an injunction) should be limited so as not to restrain the defendant from soliciting old customers of Curl Brothers, who, prior to any solicitation on his part, had become customers of the Norwich Warehouse. It is unavoidable (as is stated by the House of Lords in Trego v. Hunt, 73 L. T. Rep. 514; (1896) A. C. 7), but that customers in the old business, of which the goodwill has been sold, may transfer their custom to a new firm in which the vendor is interested; but when this has been done there is no objection to the vendor soliciting them. Otherwise the vendor could not even send a price list to a person who had once been a customer of the old firm. It would be, further, excessively inconvenient to work such an injunction:

Leggott v. Barrett, 43 L. T. Rep. 641; 15 Ch. Div. 306.

Eldon Bankes, K.C. in reply.—The defendant ought not to be allowed to solicit any person who is our customer, even though, once in a way, he may have bought something from the business with which the defendant is now connected. Having sold his interest in the goodwill, he is not at liberty to recapture it; and the only test that can be applied in deciding whether he is trying to do so, is to ask whether or not the person solicited is a customer of the plaintiffs' business.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. SANDOVER AND LONG.

[K.B. DIV.]

FARWELL, J.—The only question that I have to consider here is whether the rule which prohibits the vendor of a business from soliciting old customers applies when those customers, although continuing customers of the old firm, have in fact dealt with the vendor's new firm, and so become customers of the new firm. In my opinion it would make no difference. The test is whether or not they can properly be styled customers of the firm of which the goodwill has been sold. The principle governing this class of cases is, unfortunately, wide, and, because of its generality it is difficult to apply. It is, however, the old principle that a man may not derogate from his grant; but it is complicated by the fact that it is, notwithstanding that principle, well settled law, that it is competent for a man who has sold his business to set up a similar business next door next day and to do the best he can short of representing that he is still carrying on the old business, or soliciting the customers of the old business, to attract away all the old business that he has already sold. I take the law as I find it to be; as Lord Davey says in Trego v. Hunt, the difficulty of doing full justice ought not to prevent me from meting out such scanty measure of protection to the purchaser of a goodwill, as the circumstances permit. It seems to me that this is the smallest measure of protection that a purchaser can get. It is unfortunate that he cannot get more; but he is entitled on the authorities to say, "You have sold me this business, and you shall not actively solicit the customers who made that business, who formed the value of it, to leave me and come to you." That being the principle, it appears to me a matter of no consequence, whether a particular individual, who is solicited, has also of his own accord done business with the vendor. If a customer, as in the instance before me is the case with every witness, has remained throughout and still is a customer of the old firm, the mischief done by the solicitation is the same, whether he has also dealt with the new firm of his own free will or not. What the purchaser is entitled to say is, "You shall not actively solicit your old customers, who became mine, so long as they are my customers to come to you, whether they have or have not of their own accord come to buy goods from your new firm." I think that I should be wrong to limit the small amount of protection which the purchaser of a business can get by any such restriction as is suggested. The injunction will go without any qualification as against Mr. Webster and his agents. I cannot grant an injunction against the company; but the injunction against Mr. Webster must restrain him from directing or suggesting solicitation by travellers or other agents of the company.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Wednesday, March 9.

(Before CHANNELL, J.)

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. SANDOVER AND LONG. (a)

Copyhold—Fine—Colourable admittance—Customary tenant—Right of lord to have admittance cancelled.

By the custom of the manor of R. a person not already a customary tenant taking any estate as a purchaser by surrender or otherwise has to pay an arbitrary fine to the lord, but a customary tenant purchasing other customary lands pays only two years' quit rent of the purchase.

S., who was not a customary tenant, having agreed to purchase certain property within the manor, agreed with L. to purchase of him a cottage within the manor for 100l., S. agreeing to pay all expenses in connection with the transfer, to reconvey the cottage within three months for 75l., and to allow L. to collect and retain the rent of such cottage, L. to pay all outgoing. If S. desired to retain the cottage he was to pay 80l. more.

S. was duly admitted to the cottage, and paid an arbitrary fine in respect thereof to the lord. He then applied and was admitted to the certain other property, paying a sum of 6d. as quit rent only.

Held, that, as the transaction with regard to the cottage was a colourable one (though not fraudulent), the lord of the manor was entitled to an arbitrary fine in respect of the property as if S. had not been admitted to the cottage.

INFORMATION.

His Majesty the King, in right of his Crown, is lord of the manor of Richmond, otherwise West Sheen, in the county of Surrey.

By the custom of the manor, if a person not already a customary tenant of the manor takes any estate as a purchaser by surrender or otherwise of the customary lands or tenements within the manor, he is to pay an arbitrary fine to the lord, but if a person being a customary tenant of the manor purchases other customary lands or tenements he is to pay only a sum equal to two years' quit rent of the property purchased.

Shortly before Aug. 1902 the defendant, William Sandover, who was not a customary tenant of the manor, agreed to purchase a messuage, land, and hereditaments, known as Ormond Lodge, copyhold of the manor, from John Thomas Billett, for the sum of 1725l.

The fine payable to His Majesty as lord of the manor by the defendant on the purchase of that property had been duly assessed at the sum of 400l.

In order to avoid payment of that fine the defendant Sandover, it was alleged by the Crown, arranged with the defendant Walter James Long, who is an auctioneer at Richmond and a customary tenant, for a colourable sale by the defendant Long to the defendant Sandover of a copyhold cottage, No. 11, Prospect-place, Richmond, so that the defendant Sandover might appear to be already a customary tenant of the manor when he should apply for admission as purchaser to Ormond Lodge.

In pursuance of that arrangement Sandover

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B. Div.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. SANDOVER AND LONG.

[K.B. Div.]

signed an agreement on the 22nd July 1902, and on the 13th Aug. 1902 the defendants, representing to the deputy steward that a real sale was taking place between them, procured entries to be made on the court rolls, whereby the defendant Long, in consideration of 100*l.* paid to him by Sandover, purported to surrender the copyhold cottage of which the defendant Long was then tenant on the rolls, to Sandover, and whereby on such surrender Sandover was admitted tenant at a quit rent of 1*d.* yearly, paying a fine of 32*l.*

Sandover then completed his purchase of Ormond Lodge, and on the 29th Sept. 1902 was admitted tenant thereof on the rolls (upon the surrender of John Thomas Billett, and in consideration of 1725*l.*) at 3*d.* quit rent, paying to His Majesty a fine of 6*d.* only, because he was (as the defendants pretended) a tenant already.

On the 11th Oct. 1902 Sandover's solicitor wrote to the deputy steward alleging (contrary, as it was alleged, to the real facts) that Long had recently sold to Sandover the cottage, that he had agreed to sell back the cottage, No. 11, Prospect-place, to Long for 75*l.*, and requesting to have the necessary documents prepared.

On the 2nd Dec. 1902 the defendants again went before the deputy steward, and the defendant Sandover, in consideration of 75*l.* paid to him by Long, purported to surrender, and the defendant Long was readmitted to the copyhold cottage, paying a sum of 2*d.* only.

There never was (the information stated) any sale of the cottage by Long to Sandover, nor any intention on the part of either of them to effect a real transfer of the property, or of any interest therein. There was no negotiation or contract for purchase or valuation or investigation of title or change of possession or of the receipt of rents, and all costs attending the transaction both of conveyance and reconveyance were paid by Sandover. The sum of 100*l.* was an inadequate and not a real price, and the difference between the sums of 100*l.* and 75*l.* was, in fact, the consideration paid by Sandover to Long for the assistance of the latter in enabling Sandover to avoid payment of the fine properly payable on the sale of Ormond Lodge. The real nature of the transaction and the agreement of the 22nd July 1902 were concealed by the defendants from the deputy steward, who would not otherwise have allowed the surrender and admission of the 13th Aug. 1902 to be entered on the rolls or the forms of surrender and admission to be gone through.

Under the circumstances, His Majesty, as lord of the manor, is entitled to the same fine on the purchase of Ormond Lodge as if the surrender and admittance of the 13th Aug. 1902 had not been made. The surrender and admission of and to No. 11, Prospect-place were effected with no other purpose than that of enabling Sandover to avoid payment of the fines, and were covinous and void, or (if not) were voidable by His Majesty, and ought to be set aside, and the entries thereof on the court rolls ought to be cancelled.

The information prayed (1) that it might be declared that the alleged purchase of the cottage and the surrender and admission of the 13th Aug. 1902 were merely colourable and void as against His Majesty, and ought to be set aside, and that Sandover was not before his admission to Ormond Lodge on the 29th Sept. 1902 a customary tenant of the manor; (2) that Sandover might be ordered to pay to the deputy steward of the manor the sum of 400*l.*, or such other sum as the court might direct, the full fine due in respect of the purchase of Ormond Lodge (less the sums of 32*l.* and 6*d.*), together with interest.

The agreement made between Sandover and Long on the 22nd July 1902 for the sale of the cottage provided that Sandover agreed to purchase the cottage, No. 11, Prospect-place, for the sum of 100*l.* and to pay all expenses in connection with the transfer, and he further agreed to reconvey the cottage at his expense, at the expiration of three months, for 75*l.*, and he agreed to pay and bear all costs in connection with such transfer. The deeds were to be handed to his solicitor, and he empowered Long to collect and retain the rents during the term he (Sandover) held the cottage, and Long was to pay all outgoings in connection therewith. In case he wished to keep the property, it was agreed that Sandover should pay a further sum of 80*l.*

The custom of the manor as stated in the "Certified Extract from Parliamentary Survey. A Survey of the Manor of Richmond," is as follows:

Hee that is a stranger and comes to bee a tenant of the coppiehold lands belonging to ye sd manor is fineable for ye same at ye will of ye lord of the sd manor as the first tenant, but never after hee is once admitted to be a tenant doth hee pay any arbitrable fine for any other lands that hee shall buie within the sd manor.

The defendant William Sandover and the defendant Walter Long gave evidence, and were cross-examined.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, K.C.) and Vaughan Hawkins for the Crown.—The defendant Sandover, for the purpose of getting the benefit and privilege of paying only two years' quit rent, nominally acquired another small tenement in the manor. If that small tenement had been genuinely and really acquired there is no doubt that according to the custom of the manor he would have been let off the payment of anything beyond the nominal fine on the purchase of the large tenement; but what was carried through was not a genuine acquisition of the small tenement at all—it was a mere form. [They referred to the contract of the 22nd July 1902.] We do not for one moment dispute that if there had been a real purchase and a real admittance to the copyhold cottage that would have been good. When the contract is looked at, it is not a real transaction, and there is no real passing of the property in any way. With regard to the question of such conveyances, which are really only forms, the leading case on the subject is Rex v. Boughey and Fisher (1 B. & C. 565; 2 Dowl. & Ry. 824; 25 R. R. 516). [They referred to the judgments of Abbott, C.J., Bayley and Holroyd, J.J.] The whole question is, as was put by the judges in that case, Is there a real purchase? Here, res ipsa loquitur; the whole thing is transparently not a reality. The purchaser is not to enter into possession of the rents, and he is not to be liable for the repairs. Then, as regards the amount of the fine, we say that, although the admittance could not have been refused, when the true facts are discovered the person admitted to the larger tenement is liable for the fine which he would have had to pay if the real facts had come to light. They referred to Re v. Dillington, Freeman, 494; 1 Shower, 56;

Certified Extract from Parliamentary Survey. A Survey of the Manor of Richmond.

This last document gives the custom of the manor, and the question was dealt with in Re v. Dillington (sup.), and in this last case they refer to another cited by Dolben, J., of Pinsent the Prothonotary, where five years' value was set for a fine and it was held to be reasonable, and in such a case seven years' value might have been set. Here four years' improved value has been charged. They also referred to

Kitchin on Courts, 103 B.;
Watkin on Copyholds, p. 372.

In ordinary cases two years' value has been established as what is reasonable, and we say the additional two years—four years instead of two—is only reasonable in consideration of the fact that it franks the tenant for all other purchases in the manor.

Dankwerts, K.C. and Holman Gregory for the defendant Sandover. — We ask your Lordship here as a matter of fact to hold that there was a bona fide intention on the part of this defendant to be on the rolls as owner for a period of three months at least. We submit that he was the owner. For the purpose of seeing who was the beneficial owner of this property you must look at the real truth, and the truth of the matter is that Mr. Sandover was the legal owner of the property with a superadded contract that he was obliged to resell to Mr. Long at the expiration of three months unless he chose to pay a further 80*l.* and keep it for ever. That is the legal position and the equitable position, and there is nothing whatever upon the face of the agreement to alter the position with the exception of the arrangement about the rents. As to those, that does not make him the equitable owner of the property at all. Long was not to have them in any capacity as beneficial owner, but simply to have them in his capacity as collector. [CHANNELL, J.—The unfortunate result is that Mr. Sandover did not get the property under the circumstances.] We submit that he did. As to the custom of the manor, that shows that the criterion is tenant or not tenant admitted. The custom is not that the man shall be tenant and beneficial owner. They referred to Re v. Boughey and Fisher (sup.).

The custom here is not an arbitrary reasonable fine at all, but is a fine absolutely at the will of the lord. The custom, therefore, is a claim to an arbitrary fine, and that is bad. They referred to

Douglas v. Lord Dysart, 6 L. T. Rep. 327; 10 C. B. N. S. 689.

On these grounds there ought to be judgment for the defendants, and in any case four years' improved value is not a reasonable fine.

Cave, K.C. and Gilbart Smith for the defendant Long.—There is not a word in the custom which refers to sale or purchase, and the whole attempt to show that this was not a bona fide sale or purchase is beside the mark. The point is this—that the man must be a customary tenant. If he is a customary tenant he does not pay the big fine. The question for decision, then, is: Was he a tenant or not; was he really a tenant of the manor? We submit that, just as a trustee who becomes entitled as a trustee must be admitted if a copyholder gives the tenement to another, the copyholder can ask the lord to admit him in his place without his being a purchaser. [CHANNELL, J.—Is not Re v. Garland (22 L. T. Rep. 160; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 269) rather against that?] They also referred to Re v. Manor of Hendon, 2 T. R. 484.

There is a distinct obligation to admit any person who comes with a surrender of a copyhold tenement. The lord is bound to admit, his office being merely ministerial. They referred to

Elton on Copyholds, p. 22, quoting from Burton's Compendium;

Hall v. Bromley, 56 L. T. Rep. 683; 35 Ch. Div. 642;

Re v. Garland, 22 L. T. Rep. 160; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 269.

The Attorney-General in reply.—I ask your Lordship to deal with the case directly in the way indicated by the court in the case of Re v. Boughey and Fisher, and to say that in such a case as this there is no right to be admitted. I concede that a copyholder is entitled to alienate for value or voluntarily, but he must alienate in fact, and here he did not. He referred to Alexander v. Newman, Barr. & Arn. 657; 2 C. B. 122.

As to the amount of the fine, he referred to

Douglas v. Lord Dysart, 6 L. T. Rep. 327; 10 C. B. N. S. 689;

Scriven on Copyholds, 7th edit., p. 182.

The author of this last-mentioned work refers to a whole series of cases which show that if "arbitrary" meant that the lord might exact any amount he pleased that would be bad and unreasonable. But that is not the legal meaning of "arbitrary." As Scriven puts it: "An admission fine is prima facie uncertain, or, in legal phraseology, arbitrary." When it is said that a fine is to be arbitrary, all that it means is that it is uncertain, and then the law imposes the limitation upon it that it must be reasonable in amount. In the present case I submit that the amount of four years' improved value is a very reasonable amount, and we ask that Mr. Sandover may be ordered to pay 400*l.*, the four years' value, minus the 32*l.* and the 6*d.* that he has already paid.

CHANNELL, J.—In this case I must find, subject to the question of amount, for the Crown. I think it is perfectly clear that the transaction was in point of fact colourable, and I think that is the best word to adopt, because I do not think that it was fraudulent in fact as a moral fraud or anything of that sort. To begin with, anyone has a right to evade this custom—that is to say, to so conduct his business as not to come within the custom and not to subject himself to the larger fine. It was perfectly legitimate for Mr. Sandover to have purchased this cottage from Mr. Long, and it would have been perfectly legitimate, in my opinion, for them to have had an understanding between each other that, if desired, at a future date Mr. Long should purchase it back again. The transaction would then have passed the property in the cottage to Mr. Sandover. The rents and profits of it would have been his. It would have been his property, and it would not have signified that he only wanted to become owner of it because he could get on the court roll, and, being on the court roll as tenant, he then would have other advantages as tenant—in this particular case the advantage of getting on the roll in reference to another property at a cheaper rate. But it might have been for any other advantage which being on the court roll would give him, for he might have bought it for the purpose of pasturing a cow on the common for a particular time or for any other reason. It does not in the least signify what his motive is, for his motive is to get on the court roll of the manor and to get other rights, which include in this case a very special right. But in order to do that it must be a real transaction, and, if he pretends to purchase property when there is no intention that the property shall pass, it is a colourable transaction. The property not passing, he does not become the person who is entitled to go on the roll of the manor as a tenant. The result is that the lord of the manor is entitled to say: "I admitted you upon a representation that you had become the owner of this cottage, and so gave you the rights of a tenant of the manor, but as you procured admission by representing to me something that was not the fact, and as you did it for the express purpose of paying me a less fine, I am entitled to treat you as if you had not acquired any rights under that first admittance." I think that seems to be supported by the authority of the case of Rex v. Boughey and Fisher (1 B. & C. 565; 2 Dowl. & Ry. 824; 25 R. R. 516). It seems to me to be in accordance with that decision and in accordance with ordinary principles. I do not think it is necessary to deal with the case as to what a lord of the manor would be bound to do upon an absolutely voluntary surrender when a person who is tenant of a copyhold property comes forward and desires to put on the roll in his place somebody who has not acquired for any valuable consideration a right to the property, and who is merely going to be there on the rolls as a trustee for the former tenant. It is not necessary to discuss that case. In all probability, when there was a real bona fide reason for doing it, the lord would be bound to admit the proposed surrenderee, but, when it is shown that the object of the transaction was to affect the lord's fine, it seems to me quite clear that he has a right to refuse, and possibly Reg. v. Garland (22 L. T. Rep. 160; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 269) may be some authority for that proposition. I am not quite sure that it is, because the circumstances were very different in that case. Now, it only remains just to point out why I say that this transaction was colourable. The principle part, to my mind, is not the agreement to repurchase. As to that, that might be evidence, but no more than evidence, that it never was intended that the property should pass at all; but the thing that shows the property is not to pass is that the supposed purchaser was not to have the rents and profits of the property that he purchased, and not only was not to have the rents and profits, but was not to be liable to the liabilities of the property. Those were both to remain, the rents and profits on the one hand and the liabilities on the other, with the supposed vendor. That seems to me to show quite clearly that the property really never passed, and that the purchase was only one in name, and that it was a colourable transaction. That being the case, and again saying that I do not think there was anything which could be called intentional fraud, the parties were entitled to avail themselves of any mode that did exist of complying with this peculiar custom, but they made a mistake. The only difficulty is about what the remedy is. I think the lord is entitled to be put in the position in which he would have been if he never had admitted the tenant under this representation. Then he would have had a reasonable fine, and I cannot accept the view that because it is stated in the custom to be arbitrary and at the will of the lord therefore it is bad, because those cases, as I always understood, have been dealt with for many hundreds of years, and a limitation was put upon them by the court, and the usual limitation is the two years. But then there is authority for saying, and it speaks for itself if once you admit that the question is what is reasonable, that when the admittance purchases a special right such as this is—namely, to be admitted to future property at almost a nominal fine—then the fine must be assessed as to what is reasonable for the admission to that property together with that right of being admitted on the purchase of other property at a nominal fine, and something must be added for that. I am asked on my own judgment to say that four years is reasonable—perhaps not entirely on my own judgment—perhaps on the judgment of a gentleman as to whom there was a doubt raised in the course of the argument here as to whether he was judge or counsel, and who turned out to be a judge some 200 years ago or more, who then thought four years was reasonable in one case, and said that he had known as much as seven (Dolben, J. in Rex v. Dillington, sup.), but I have some doubt about that. I think myself that regard should be had in what is reasonable, to add to the fine in the case of a manor that has got this peculiar custom. I think you ought to consider something as to what is the value of the property, and whether there is some reason to think that the property in question is being bought for the purpose of being admitted to other property. For instance, if it were a question of what would be reasonable for the admission to this small cottage in Prospect-place, I think then I should be very much inclined to go to the length of the seven years Dolben, J. said had been gone to in one case within his knowledge, because with a property of that sort, and especially when you are offering the tenant the privilege of coming in at a much smaller rate upon his giving up this right, then you might reasonably charge him upon the small property as much as the seven years, or at any rate a considerable amount, but I am not quite so sure when you are purchasing a substantial property, as to which there would be no suspicion that the property was being purchased for the purpose of subsequently purchasing other properties, although it does, no doubt, carry the right to do so. I am not quite sure that, having regard to all the circumstances, I should be inclined to say that what was reasonable in that case was as much as double what would be reasonable in the manor without that additional right. It strikes me that to double the two years and to turn it into four when the property is of a substantial amount is going rather far. [His Lordship fixed the amount of the fine at 300*l.* without prejudice to other cases.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. SANDOVER AND LONG.

[K.B. Div.]

ELLINGER AND CO. AND SCHLESINGER v. MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK. (a)

Life insurance—Application form—Policy—Construction—Warranty not to commit suicide—Insurance for benefit of creditor—Executor suing as trustee for creditor.

An application for a policy of life insurance was expressed to be the basis and part of the contract, and contained the following undertaking by the assured: "I also warrant and agree that I will not commit suicide, sane or insane, during the period of one year from the date of the said contract." The policy was taken out for the benefit of a creditor, and by the policy the defendants agreed to pay, subject to conditions, 4000*l.* to the creditor "in consideration of the application for this policy which is hereby made a part of this contract." During the period of one year from the signing of the policy, the assured committed suicide in a fit of temporary insanity.

Held, that the undertaking was such that the breach of it rendered the policy void, and that it was not an undertaking the breach of which could only give the insurance company a right to claim against the estate of the assured.

COMMERCIAL CAUSE tried before Bigham, J. without a jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, Ellinger and Co., as the beneficiaries under a policy of life assurance, and by the plaintiff Schlesinger, as executor of the insured person, on a policy of life insurance made and issued by the defendant company.

Max Firnberg being indebted to the plaintiffs, Ellinger and Co., effected the policy on his life for the benefit of Ellinger and Co. by way of securing the payment of his debt to them. The material parts of the application for the policy were as follows:

This application made to the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York is the basis and a part of a proposed contract for insurance, subject to the charter of the company. I hereby agree that all the following statements and answers, and all those that I may make to the company's medical examiner, in continuation of this application, are by me warranted to be true, and are offered to the company as a consideration of the contract, which I hereby agree to accept, and which shall not take effect until the first premium shall have been paid, during my continuance in good health, and the policy shall have been signed by the secretary of the company and issued.

Twenty statements were then set out, No. 9 being as follows:

The full name of the person to whom the insurance is payable is Ellinger and Co., Manchester.

By No. 12 it was stated that:

The insurable interest of the said beneficiary in the life proposed for insurance, other than that of family relationship, is to cover debt.

(a) Reported by W. TREVOR TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The application also contained the following three clauses:

I hereby warrant and agree that during the next two years following the date of issue of the contract of insurance for which application is made, I will not travel or reside in any part of the Torrid Zone, or north of the parallel of 60 degrees north latitude in the Western Hemisphere, or north of the parallel of 70 degrees north latitude of the Eastern Hemisphere, and will not engage in any of the following extra hazardous occupations or employments—retailing intoxicating liquors, handling electric wires and dynamos, blasting, mining, submarine labour, aeronautic ascensions, the manufacture of highly explosive substances, service upon any railroad, train, or track, or in switching or in coupling cars, or on any steam or other vessel, unless written permission is expressly granted by the company.

I further warrant and agree that I will not engage in any military or naval service in time of war, during the continuance of the said contract, without first obtaining written permission from this company.

I also warrant and agree that I will not commit suicide, whether sane or insane, during the period of one year from the date of the said contract.

The application was signed by Max Firnberg, and dated the 23rd May 1902.

The policy commenced as follows:

In consideration of the application for this policy, which is hereby made a part of this contract, the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York promises to pay at its principal agency in Great Britain unto Ellinger and Co., of Manchester . . . creditors of Max Firnberg . . . four thousand pounds sterling upon acceptance of satisfactory proofs of the death of the said Max Firnberg, provided such death takes place within the term of five years from the date hereof, during the continuance of this policy, upon the following condition, and subject to the provisions, requirements, and benefits stated on the back of this policy, which are hereby referred to and made part hereof.

On the back of the policy was the following provision:

Military and naval service of any kind, the volunteer service of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace excepted, whether as combatant or non-combatant without permission in writing signed by one of the officers of the company, is prohibited under this contract.

The policy was dated the 24th May 1902.

At the time of effecting the policy, Firnberg did not inform Ellinger and Co. that he was insuring his life for their benefit, and it was not until Nov. 1902 when Firnberg was being pressed for payment that he informed them.

In Feb. 1903 Max Firnberg, in a fit of insanity, committed suicide, at a date which was less than a year from the issuing of the policy.

The plaintiffs brought the action to recover the 4000*l.* under the policy.

C. A. Russell, K.C. for the plaintiffs.—This was a policy effected by Firnberg for Ellinger and Co. issued here and subject to the laws of England, though made by an American company. 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, s. 2, provides: "That it shall not be lawful to make any policy or policies on the life or lives of any person or persons, or other event or events, without inserting in such policy or policies the person or persons name or names interested therein, or for whose use, benefit, or on whose account such policy is so made or underwrote." Sect. 3 provides: "That in all cases where the insured hath interest in such life or lives, event or events, no greater sum shall be recovered or received from the insurer or insurers than the amount or value of the interest of the insured in such life or lives, or other event or events." That statute was a recognition of policies taken out for the benefit of others, and treated the person for whose benefit it was taken out as the assured. As soon as the fact of the policy having been issued was communicated to Ellinger and Co., there was a trust for Ellinger and Co. It is only because Ellinger and Co. are interested that in this case the defendants are liable to pay. Firnberg told the company that he was taking out the policy for Ellinger and Co. to secure debts. Where a policy is taken out for a third party, he cannot control the promises of the assured. The insurance company ought to state in specific terms in the policy if an undertaking, such as the one under discussion, is to be considered a condition the breach of which renders the policy void. There was no intention to make these warranties or agreements conditions. Suicide whilst insane is an accident, or a misfortune. It is for the person trying to make out a condition to make it clear that certain results will follow certain non-observances. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover, though the defendants may have a claim against Firnberg's estate, in which case the damages might be the amount they would have to pay under the policy. If the action was brought in Firnberg's name alone, the defendants would be liable under the policy, but could counter-claim for damages caused by the act of committing suicide. If Firnberg had become bankrupt, the trustee in bankruptcy could have claimed, and the defendants could put in a proof. If, however, Firnberg had assigned, the assignee could sue, but the defendants could not counter-claim; a counter-claim will only lie against the actual contract breaker or his estate.

Cababé.—These three clauses are three personal independent undertakings by Firnberg himself, the debtor. This is a creditor policy, and these undertakings are not conditions. No agreement as to promises de futuro can be treated as a condition, the nonfulfilment of which will avoid the policy, unless the policy clearly states it to be such in express terms. The questions and answers in the application form are put on a different footing from the three undertakings. The policy is a trust policy from the first, by debtor in favour of creditor, and to the knowledge of the defendant company. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover, the three clauses being only personal promises, and not conditions in any sense of the policy.

The following cases were referred to:

Stoneham v. Ocean, Railway, and General Accident Insurance Company, 57 L. T. Rep. 236; 19 Q. B. Div. 237; Llanelli Railway and Dock Company v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 29 L. T. Rep. 357; 8 Ch. App. 942.

B. B. Haldane, K.C. for the defendants.—The stipulation not to commit suicide goes to the root of the policy. That is the true meaning of the policy. The measure of damages in an action against the deceased's estate would not necessarily be the same as the amount of the insurance. The contention that promises as to acts de futuro not being conditions is not sound; that is shown by the exception in marine insurance policies "warranted free from capture." That refers to a future act, and is a true exception to the risk covered:

Barnard v. Faber, 68 L. T. Rep. 179; (1893) 1 Q. B. 340, at p. 342, per Lindley, L.J.

A term as regards the risk must be a condition:

Barnard v. Faber, at p. 344, per Bowen, L.J.

If the word "warranty" is used in a policy of insurance that is something to lead one to suppose that a condition is meant:

Hambrough v. Mutual Life Insurance Company, per Lopes, L.J. (sup.).

The defendant company does not insure against suicide. The plaintiffs at the most are assignees in equity.

Rowlatt.—The undertaking in the policy not to commit suicide goes to the root of the policy. From the business point of view the company are deemed to have said to the assured, "If you will not commit suicide then we will insure you." The plaintiffs cannot recover.

C. A. Russell, K.C. replied. Cur. adv. vult.

BIGHAM, J.—On the 23rd May 1902 Max Firnberg signed an application addressed to the defendant company for a policy of insurance for 4000*l.* for five years on his own life. The material parts of the document are as follows:

This application made to the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York is the basis and a part of a proposed contract for insurance. . . . I hereby agree that all the following statements and answers and all those that I make to the company's medical examiner in continuation of this application are by me warranted to be true and are offered to the company as a consideration of the contract which I hereby agree to accept. . . .

Then follow twenty numbered statements, beginning with name of the applicant. The ninth and twelfth are in these words:

The full name of the person to whom the insurance is payable is Ellinger and Co., Manchester. The insurable interest of the said beneficiary in the life proposed for insurance other than that of family relationship is to cover debt.

The words in italics are written. After these statements there are three clauses in the following words:

I hereby warrant and agree that during the next two years following the date of issue of the contract of insurance for which application is hereby made I will not travel or reside in any part of the Torrid Zone, or north of the parallel of 60 degrees north latitude in the Western Hemisphere, or north of the parallel of 70 degrees north latitude in the Eastern Hemisphere, and will not engage in any of the following extra hazardous occupations or employments—retailing intoxicating liquors, handling electric wires and dynamos, blasting, mining, submarine labour, aeronautic ascensions, the manufacture of highly explosive substances, service upon any railroad, train, or track, or in switching or in coupling cars, or on any steam or other vessel, unless written permission is expressly granted by the company. I further warrant and agree that I will not engage in any military or naval service in time of war, during the continuance of the said contract, without first obtaining written permission from this company. I also warrant and agree that I will not commit suicide, whether sane or insane, during the period of one year from the date of the said contract.

The question in this case is as to the meaning and effect of the last of these three clauses, which refers to suicide. The policy was issued on the 24th May 1902. It commences with these words:

In consideration of the application for this policy, which is hereby made a part of this contract, the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York promises to pay . . . unto Ellinger and Co. . . . creditors of Max Firnberg . . . their successors or assigns 4000l. . . . upon . . . proofs of the death of the said Max Firnberg provided such death takes place within the term of five years from the date thereof . . . upon the following condition, and subject to the provisions, requirements, and benefits stated on the back of this policy, which are hereby referred to and made part hereof. The half annual premium of 56l. 16s. 8d. shall be paid in advance on the delivery of this policy, and thereafter to the company at its principal agency in Great Britain on the 24th day of November and May in every year during the continuance of this contract until premiums for five full years shall have been duly paid to the said company.

A number of provisions are printed on the back of the policy, only one of which need be referred to. It is as follows:

Military and naval service of any kind, the volunteer service of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace excepted, whether as combatant or non-combatant, without permission in writing, signed by one of the officers of the company, is prohibited under this contract.

I have read the different so-called warranties and provisions, because the plaintiffs relied upon them as showing in some way that the clause as to suicide was merely intended to operate as an independent promise and not as a limitation of the defendants' liability. It appears that when Firnberg took out this policy he owed money to Ellinger and Co. for some business debt. In Nov. 1902 Ellinger and Co. were pressing for payment of this debt, and then for the first time Firnberg told them that by way of securing the payment of their debt he had effected this policy. In Feb. 1903, Firnberg, during a fit of insanity, committed suicide. On the 25th Nov. 1903 this action was brought upon the policy against the defendant company, the plaintiffs being Ellinger and Co., the creditors, and Richard Schlesinger, the executor of Firnberg's will, who is described as suing as trustee for Ellinger and Co. Firnberg died insolvent, owing Ellinger and Co. 4000l. or more. The plaintiffs contend that the policy must be regarded as having been taken out by Firnberg on their behalf, and that they are therefore entitled to ratify and recover on it, and they say that the clause as to suicide amounts to nothing more than a personal undertaking by Firnberg, for the breach of which the defendants' remedy is limited to a claim against Firnberg's bankrupt estate. On the other hand, the defendants contend that the effect of the clause is to exclude liability on their part if death is due to suicide. I am of opinion that the defendants' contention is the right one. The policy was made by the defendants with Firnberg, and with no one else. It is in no sense a contract with Ellinger and Co. Firnberg alone was responsible for the payment of the premiums. Neither subsequent notice to Ellinger and Co. of its existence nor ratification of it by them could alter or affect its original meaning. What, then, did the parties, Firnberg and the defendant company, intend when they inserted the warranty that Firnberg should not commit suicide? I think it is clear that they intended that in the event of suicide the company should not be liable on the policy. It does not matter, I think, whether the clause is called a warranty or not. It constitutes a limitation of the defendants' liability. Death within five years is the event upon the happening of which the defendants were to pay, but death by suicide within the first twelve months is excluded. Apt words have been used to express that intention, and it is, I think, impossible to read the clause as merely giving to the company a cross-claim against the estate of the deceased for damages.

GRANGE AND CO. v. TAYLOR. (a)

Bill of lading—Construction—Bulk cargo—Undivided portions of bulk—"Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of damage"—Error in apportioning—Short delivery.

Bills of lading for undivided portions of a bulk cargo of grain contained the following clause and note in margin: "If the parcel herein signed for constitutes part of a larger bulk shipped without separation into parcels, as per bills of lading, each bill of lading shall bear its due proportion of shortage or damage and (or) sweepings, if any:"

"Part of a parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any."

By an error in apportioning damaged grain one consignee received a full consignment of sound grain. One of the other consignees, refusing to accept more than his proportionate share of damaged grain, received a consignment which was 108 quarters short.

Held, in an action for short delivery, that the error was caused by the consignees' agents, and that the clause in the bills of lading cast no duty on the shipowner to apportion the good and unsound grain.

CLAIM for short delivery of a quantity of maize shipped under bills of lading on board the Palestine and discharged at the Victoria Docks, and for breach of contract contained in the bills of lading and for conversion of the plaintiffs' goods.

The cargo of maize was in bulk, and bills of lading were given in respect of undivided portions.

GRANGE AND CO. v. TAYLOR.

[K.B. Div.]

The plaintiffs were indorsees of two of the bills of lading.

The bills of lading contained the following clause and impressed note in the margin:

If the parcel herein signed for constitutes part of larger bulk shipped without separation into parcels, as per bills of lading, each bill of lading shall bear its due proportion of shortage or damage and (or) sweepings, if any. Part of a parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any.

By an error in apportioning, one consignee received a complete consignment of sound grain and the plaintiffs, refusing to accept more than their proportion of damaged grain, brought an action for short delivery.

The facts sufficiently appear in the following considered judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

BIGHAM, J.—This is an action by indorsees of bills of lading against shipowner to recover damages for short delivery of a quantity (108 quarters) of maize. The defence is that the maize was delivered to the dock company, and that they were the agents of the plaintiffs to receive it. The defendants' ship, the Palestrina, took on board a large quantity of maize in bulk at Odessa to be carried to London. The shipper asked for and obtained from the defendants several bills of lading, each being for an undivided portion of the bulk. This was done to facilitate the sale of the maize. The bills of lading contained the following clause: "If the parcel herein signed for constitutes part of a larger bulk shipped without separation into parcels, as per bills of lading, each bill of lading shall bear its due proportion of shortage or damage and (or) sweepings, if any"; and in the margin there was an impressed note: "Part of a parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any." Two of these bills of lading came into the hands of the plaintiffs, who were buyers of the portion of the bulk thereby represented. The bills of lading for the remainder reached the hands of other buyers, among whom was a Mr. Paul. The vessel arrived in London and went to the I jetty of the Victoria Dock, when she began her discharge by means of an elevator which stands on that jetty. The maize was gathered under the open hatchways and then lifted in the elevator over the ship's side and shot into the barges of the bills of lading holders. Mr. Paul came first in time, and therefore first in turn, and received his full bill of lading quantity. Before the discharge to him was completed, but when it was too late to stop it, part of the remaining bulk was found to be heated. This heated grain was put on the quay, and was there apportioned among the different bill of lading holders, 108 quarters being the quantity which ought to have been taken by Mr. Paul as the quantity applicable to his bill of lading. He had, however, already received and taken away his full quantity in sound maize. The result was that at the end of the discharge the plaintiffs found that unless they took the 108 quarters they would be short by that quantity of their share of the bulk. They refused to take the 108 quarters, alleging that if they did so they would be saddled with more than their proper proportion of heated grain, and they then brought this action. The question is whether the shipowners are liable. The answer depends on the nature of the obligations of the shipowner under the bill of lading contract and on the usage or practice ordinarily followed in the discharge of those obligations. The bill of lading, of course, obliges the shipowner to deliver goods corresponding with the description in the document, and it also obliges him to deliver such goods to the proper person to receive them. But the plaintiffs contend that, having regard to the words, "each bill of lading to bear its own proportion of damage," the obligation is not discharged by a mere delivery of the bill of lading quantity, but delivery must in such case be made up by the shipowner of the proper proportions of sound and damaged. It is said that the bill of lading is a contract between the holder and the shipowner and between no other persons, and that, as between those two parties, the words relied upon can have no other meaning than that contended for. I am of opinion that the words put no such burden on the shipowner. It would be very unreasonable if they did. The delivery is made to the barges of the receivers turn and turn about. At first nothing but sound grain may come out of the ship, and it will be impossible to say whether there will be any damaged grain or, if any, how much. Again, the character of the damage may vary very much; some part may be badly damaged and the other part only slightly. How is the shipowner to foresee this, and how, where, and when is he to sort the grain? Skilled men are required for such work; the crew cannot do it. Is the shipowner to find and employ such men? Then, where is the sorting to be done? It cannot be done in the ship. Is the shipowner to hire quay space for the work? And when is it to be done? Until the last parcel of the bulk is out the sorting is impossible. Must the shipowner hold back all delivery until that point in the discharge is reached? I agree with Mr. Hamilton that the mere difficulty or even impossibility of discharging a duty affords no excuse for a breach if in fact the duty has been undertaken; but when I am asked to say that the shipowner has undertaken the difficult duty here contended for I expect to find plain and unambiguous words imposing it. I do not find such words in this case. If the shipowner had given but one bill of lading for the whole parcel his duty would have been completely discharged by delivering the grain with the damaged and sound mixed just as it came to hand out of the ship. Was it intended that his compliance with shipper's request to give several bills of lading should throw upon him the burden of sorting the bulk and dividing the damaged grain in the manner suggested? I cannot think so. Then why are the words introduced, and what is their effect? This bill of lading is headed, "Chamber of Shipping, Black Sea—Berth Contract Bill of Lading, 1902"; and in the top left corner are the words, "As agreed with the London Corn Trade Association and the Chamber of Shipping, 12 March 1902." Thus the bill of lading appears to be in a form adopted by the members of the Corn Association in this country and shipowners who send their ships to the Black Sea. It is in common use in connection with a very large trade, and is doubtless well known to all people in that trade. Now the shipment of grain in bags and the stowing of it in the ship's hold in separate parcels are expensive operations which add to the cost of the grain when it arrives in this country without enhancing its value. It is therefore apparently often shipped in bulk, and bills of lading are given for undivided portions of the bulk. This is a great convenience to the merchant, for it enables him to sell the grain in small parcels. The form has been drawn with special reference to this practice, and the clause relied upon has been inserted in consequence of it. Then if the shipment is made under this practice (it is not necessarily so made) the impressed note is put in the margin of each bill of lading to draw attention to the fact: "Part of parcel, shipped without separation. Each bill of lading to bear its proportion of shortage and damage, if any." The London Corn Trade Association's form of sale contract, which was given in evidence before me, contains a corresponding provision: "Should any of the within-mentioned quantity form part of a larger quantity . . . in bulk, no separation . . . shall be deemed to be necessary. All damages and sweepings . . . shall be shared by the various parcels pro rata," showing that when the grain comes to be sold the sales are made on the footing on which the bills of lading are drawn. When the bill of lading is read by the light of these facts the meaning and object of the clause in question becomes quite plain. It is put there for the purpose of regulating the rights of the holders of the different bills of lading inter se, and is not intended to increase the shipowner's duty at all. But the plaintiffs insist that the contract in the bill of lading does not and is never intended to do more than express the agreement between the shipper and the shipowner; in other words, that it cannot regulate the rights of cargo-owners inter se; and they refer to Porteous v. Watney (ubi sup.) in support of this contention. No doubt the primary object of a bill of lading is to evidence the terms on which the shipper and shipowner have agreed for the carriage and delivery of goods, and Brett, L.J. at p. 542 of 3 Q. B. Div., is reported as saying: "The bill of lading claims to be a contract between the shipowner and the person taking the bill of lading. There is no relation whatever between the holders or takers of other bills of lading and any one holder of a bill of lading. They are not co-sureties. When, therefore, it is said we can look at all the bills of lading and then divide the days of demurrage or the lay days between them, we are looking at other bills of lading which cannot be given in evidence." These words must, however, be read with reference to the form of the bill of lading in that case. That form contained no reference whatever to the holders of other bills of lading. The action was by shipowner against bill of lading holder for demurrage. The bill of lading contained the words "on paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." This charter-party gave a lien on all cargo for demurrage at the port of discharge. The defendant had always been ready and willing to take his goods, but the holders of bills of lading for other cargo lying on top had made default in taking their cargo away so that the defendant's goods could not be discharged. It was held that by the terms of his bill of lading contract the defendant had rendered himself liable for payment of the demurrage, and that he could not escape by saying that the delay was due to the negligence of holders of other bills of lading. Indeed, so much did Brett, L.J. consider the different bills of lading holders strangers to each other that he held that if the man in actual default had paid the shipowner, the defendant could not have relied on the payment by way of defence, an opinion which involved the rather startling conclusion that if there had been goods below belonging to a score of different bills of lading holders, the full amount of the demurrage would have been recoverable from each of them. The Lord Justice at p. 543 uses these words: "I think that if the consignee of a portion of the cargo had a bill of lading in the same words, and had been called upon to pay and had paid the whole demurrage to the shipowner, the holder of another bill of lading, if sued, could not set that up as a defence. That defence would arise in respect of a wholly independent contract between the shipowner and the holder of the other bill of lading. He could not set it up as a defence, because he would have no right to prove that other and wholly independent contract. I accept the proposition that it would be no defence for the owner of the bill of lading to say that the shipowner had been paid the same sum by all other holders of bills of lading for cargo in the ship." But the authority is in truth of no application to the present case. The bill of lading before me appears on its face to be one of a group. The makers and takers of it know it to be one of a group. The same thing is no doubt true in the case of the bills of lading for the remainder of the bulk. The shipowner, not for his own benefit, but merely for the benefit of the various receivers, subscribes to the stipulation as to the division of damaged grain. All the receivers buy their bills of lading with notice, and, in my opinion, become bound towards each other by what the shipowner has done for them. Even if it should be true that the intention has not been legally effected, and that the bills of lading holders are not bound inter se, that affords no reason for saying that the words used in the attempt to accomplish the intention should be twisted to a purpose for which they were never used—namely, to impose a heavy obligation on the shipowner. The view which I take of the meaning of the bill of lading contract is borne out by the practice followed in the discharge of grain cargoes at Victoria Docks and at the jetty in question. The practice is for the servants of the dock company to bring the cargo in the ship's hold under the open hatchways; for this service the shipowner pays the dock company 4d. a ton. The grain is then lifted by means of an elevator out of the hold and shot from the elevators into the barges of the consignees; for this service the consignees pay the dock company 1s. 9d. per ton. If any of the grain is found to be heated it is discharged on the quay and there sorted by the dock company's servants, the cost being covered by the dock company's charge against the consignees. In this way the dock company act as the agents of the ship to discharge the cargo and as the agents of the consignees to receive it; and the evidence, though in parts conflicting, satisfies me that as a matter of fact the receipt of the grain into the elevator is the receipt by the dock company, as agent for the consignee or bill of lading holder. If this be so, the shipowner has in this case not only discharged the bill of lading quantity, but the plaintiffs have also received it, with the result that the claim for short delivery fails. It was, however, contended on the plaintiffs' behalf that, whatever the general practice might be, the grain in this particular instance was not in fact received by them until it was placed in their barges or trucks. It appeared that upon this jetty there were two elevators belonging to different owners. The elevator which was used on this occasion belongs to a firm of Thompson and Co., who use it for the discharge of their own vessels. But sometimes no vessel of their own happens to be alongside, and the elevator is idle. On such occasions Thompson and Co. solicit other ship-owners to send their ships to the wharf, so that they may be discharged by their elevator, and they have an arrangement with the dock company by which in such circumstances they do all the work above described for the dock company for an inclusive charge of 1s. 11d. a ton. Thus the dock company get the work for which they charge 2s. 1d. (1s. 9d. and 4d.) done for 1s. 11d. This course was followed in the present case. Thompson and Co. were anxious to secure a discharge and delivery by their elevator because, I suppose, they could do the work for less than 1s. 11d. per ton, and so make a profit, and, as they feared that the job might fall into the hands of the owner of the rival elevator, they went to the defendants and induced the defendants to send the ship to the part of the jetty where their elevator stands. It was said by the plaintiffs that the defendants, by allowing the vessel to go under Thompson's elevator in these circumstances, made Thompson and Co. their agents, and that all the work, whether done on the ship or in the elevator or on the quay, was therefore done by the defendants. I do not, however, take this view of the matter. Neither the plaintiffs nor the defendants had anything to do with the arrangement between the dock company and Thompson, and when the time for paying for the work arrived, debit notes were sent in by the dock company to the ship and cargo-owners for the 4d. and 1s. 9d., just as though no such arrangement existed. I wish to add that the practice at these docks appears to have been substantially the same for the last thirty years, although, no doubt, elevators have only recently come into use. Dealing with the question in 1874, Brett, J., after stating the practice in relation to the delivery of bales of hides, says: "I am of opinion that the moment the shipowner has cleared the goods from the dock he ceases to be responsible in any way for them; and that, whatever remedy the plaintiffs may have against the dock company or anyone else, they cannot under the circumstances charge the shipowner with the loss of the bale": (see Petrocochino v. Bott, L. Rep. 9 C. P., at p. 361). It is perhaps necessary to mention one other matter. It appeared that when Thompson's men in working out the ship came across the heated grain, they notified the circumstance to the dock clerks, and after the apportionment the clerks, in the ordinary course of their duty, entered the 108 quarters in the dock books as belonging to Mr. Paul. The plaintiffs suggested that, even if there was no short delivery, this was a conversion. To this there are two answers. The first is that there was no conversion; the book entry interfered in no way with the plaintiffs' rights—the plaintiffs might have taken away the 108 quarters at any moment, and no one would have objected. The second answer is that, even if there was a conversion, it was not by the defendants; they, as I have already said, had finished with the goods when they delivered the grain into the elevator. The fact is that the plaintiffs did not want the 108 quarters. They preferred their action for short delivery. If they had taken the 108 quarters, as they might have done at any moment if they had wished, they would have been left with an action for breach of the duty to properly sort and apportion—an action which, if brought against the present defendants, would have failed, as this action fails, on the ground that the defendants had entered into no contract to do the work of sorting and apportioning. There must be judgment for the defendants with costs, and for the defendants on the counter-claim for freight.

GRANGE AND CO. v. TAYLOR.

[K.B. Div.]

MILLARD (app.) v. BALBY-WITH-HEXTHORPE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (resps.). (a) Public health—Street not repairable by inhabitants at large—Expenses of sewerage and paving—Liability of owner of premises—Owner at date of completion of work not owner at date of demand—Liability of person not owner at date of demand—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 150, 257.

Under sect. 150 of the Public Health Act 1875, notices were served by an urban authority upon the owners of premises fronting or abutting on a street (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large) to sewer, pave, and make up the street. These notices not having been complied with, the urban authority executed the necessary works and apportioned the expenses upon the owners of premises fronting on the street. The appellant, both at the time of the notice to pave and at the time of the completion of the works by the urban authority, was the owner of premises fronting the street; but before the date of the notice of apportionment and of the demand upon him to pay the amount apportioned on his premises, he had ceased to be owner, having sold the premises, and upon the date of demand of such amount he was not owner of the premises.

Upon summary proceedings before justices to recover the amount apportioned on the premises, from the appellant as being the "owner in default" within the meaning of sect. 150 :

Held, but only upon the authority of the case of Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board (40 L. T. Rep. 424; 4 Q. B. Div. 305), that, notwithstanding the words in sect. 257 of the Act that such expenses may be recovered by the local authority "from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed," the appellant not having been the owner at the date of the demand upon him to pay the apportioned amount, was not the "owner in default" within the meaning of sect. 150, although he was the owner of the premises at the time when the works were completed, and that therefore he was not liable to pay the expenses. To be the "owner in default" in such cases, a person must be the owner not only at the time when the works are completed, but also at the time when the apportioned amount is demanded from him.

Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board (ubi sup.) followed but questioned.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the West Riding of the county of York.

At the court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Doncaster, being a petty sessional court, a complaint was preferred by the Balby-with-Hexthorpe Urban District Council (the respondents) against Samuel Millard, of Carr-hill, Balby, builder (the appellant), for that the respondents having, in accordance with the provisions in that behalf of the Public Health Act 1875, executed or caused to be executed certain works, to wit, sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, and made good a certain street called Carr-hill road within the district of the respondents, not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and that the appellant was the owner and occupier of certain premises, formerly a stable, sheds, and buildings, situate in Carr-hill-road, being premises fronting or abutting upon Carr-hill-road, and that the respondents had incurred expenses to the amount of 45*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.* in the execution of the works, and that the respondents within six calendar months then last past—namely, on the 20th May 1903—had duly caused to be served on the appellant a notice in writing demanding payment of the sum of 45*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, and that sum, or any part of it, had not been paid to the respondents by the owner or occupier of the premises, or by any person on their behalf, and that there was then due and owing by the appellant to the respondents the sum of 45*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, with 7*s.* 3*d.* interest thereon, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the date of the service of the notice of demand.

The information was heard by the justices on the 28th July 1903, when they found that the respondents were entitled to recover from the appellant the sum of 45*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, with interest as aforesaid, and they made an order directing payment thereof accordingly.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted.

Carr-hill, mentioned in the information, was a street not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, situate within the respondents' urban district, and on and before the 8th June 1899 such street was not sewered, paved, &c., and made good to the satisfaction of the respondents.

Before the 8th June 1899 the respondents, in compliance with the provisions of sect. 150 of the Public Health Act 1875, caused plans and sections of the structural works intended to be executed under the section and an estimate of the probable cost thereof to be prepared under the direction of their surveyor, such plans, sections, and estimates being prepared in accordance with the provisions of the section, and being deposited for inspection as thereby required, and on the 8th June 1899 the appellant was the owner of certain premises fronting, adjoining, and abutting on such parts of the street called Carr-hill as required to be sewered, paved, &c., and made good, and on the 8th June 1899 the respondents served upon all the owners (including the appellant) of premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such parts of the street as required to be sewered, paved, &c., and made good, notices requiring such owners to sewer, level, pave, &c., and make good such parts of the street called Carr-hill as aforesaid, such notices being in the form prescribed by the Public Health Act 1875.

Such notices were not complied with by the persons to whom they were addressed, and after the expiration of one calendar month from the date of such notices the respondents executed the works mentioned therein, and such works were completed on the 4th Dec. 1901.

In the course of the execution of the works mentioned in the notice the respondents incurred certain expenses, which were duly apportioned by the surveyor of the respondents upon the owners in default (being the persons who were on the 4th Dec. 1901, the date of completion of the works, the owners of premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such parts of the street called Carr-hill as required to be sewered, levelled, paved, &c., and made good), according to the frontage of their respective premises.

On the 4th Dec. 1901 the appellant was the owner of certain premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such parts of the street called Carr-hill as required to be sewered, levelled, paved, and made good as aforesaid, and the surveyor of the respondents duly apportioned upon the appellant and his premises the sum of 45*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, as the proportion due from the appellant in respect of his premises of the expenses incurred by the respondents in the execution of the works.

A formal notice in writing of such apportionment, dated the 18th Nov. 1902, was on the 24th Nov. 1902 personally served by the respondents upon the appellant in accordance with the provisions of sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875, and the appellant did not within three months from the service on him of such notice of apportionment by written notice dispute the same.

On the 20th May 1903 a formal demand in writing for payment of the sum of 45*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.* was personally served by the respondents upon the appellant in accordance with the provisions of sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875, and such notice contained a claim for interest at the rate of 5 per cent. upon the above sum from the date of service of such notice until payment of the sum.

K.B. Div.] MILLARD v. BALBY-WITH-HEXTHORPE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. [K.B. Div.]

The appellant had not paid the 45*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.* and interest, or any part thereof, before the 25th July 1903.

On the 20th March 1902 the appellant entered into a contract for the sale of his premises in Carr-hill, and on the 25th April 1902 the premises were duly conveyed by the appellant to a brewery company.

[The evidence adduced in support of the facts above stated to be proved was set out in the case.]

The appellant admitted that the plans, specifications, &c., were duly prepared and deposited, and that the notice of the 8th June 1899 was duly served by the respondents upon the appellant, and that on the 8th June 1899 (the date of service of such notice) he was the owner of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such parts of Carr-hill as were the subject of the notice, and that he remained owner from that date up to the 20th March 1902, and that the works were not executed by the persons liable to execute the same.

He admitted that certain expenses had been incurred by the respondents in the execution of works in Carr-hill, and that the apportionment was duly made and that notice thereof was duly served upon him, and that the amount apportioned, if recoverable at all, was correct and recoverable in full, and that the apportionment was not disputed in manner provided by sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875; and that the apportioned amount was duly demanded as alleged by the respondents, and that he had not paid the sum of 45*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.* and interest, or any part thereof.

On the part of the appellant it was contended (inter alia) that by law the appellant was required to be the owner of the premises both in Dec. 1901, when the work was found by the justices to have been completed, and also on the 20th May 1903, the day of the date of the demand, and that as the justices had found as a fact that the appellant was not such owner on the 20th May 1903, the complaint should have been dismissed on that ground, as well as on the other grounds.

On the part of the respondents it was (inter alia) contended that the appellant was, on his own admission, the owner of the premises, the subject of these proceedings, on the 8th June 1899 and from that date up to and including the 20th March 1902, and that it was not contended that the appellant was the owner on the 20th May 1903, the date of the demand.

That the appellant was not required by law to be the owner of the premises both at the date of completion of the works and at the date of demand, but that by virtue of sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875, the apportioned expenses with interest were summarily recoverable from the person who was the owner of the premises at the time the works were completed for which such expenses had been incurred, and that as the appellant had been proved to be the owner at the time the works were completed he was liable to pay such expenses, notwithstanding the fact that the appellant was not the owner thereof at the date of service of demand therefor. In support of this contention the case of Re Bettesworth and Richer (58 L. T. Rep. 796; 37 Ch. Div. 535), was cited on behalf of the respondents.

The justices were of opinion that the respondents in exercise of the powers conferred on them by sect. 150 of the Public Health Act 1875, had executed certain street works in Carr-hill, a street within the district of the respondents not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and that the respondents incurred certain expenses in the execution of such works, which expenses the respondents were entitled to apportion upon and recover from the owners of premises fronting Carr-hill, as aforesaid, of whom the appellant was one; that such expenses were duly apportioned and demanded and that all the provisions of the Public Health Act 1875, relative to the matter at issue, had been duly complied with by the respondents, and that such facts as were required to be proved by the respondents had been duly proved, and that the submissions in point of law on the part of the respondents were supported by the authorities cited, and that the appellant was liable to pay to the respondents the sum of 45*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, the amount apportioned in respect of his property in Carr-hill, together with 7*s.* 3*d.* for interest thereon, and 2*l.* 11*s.*, the costs of these proceedings, and they accordingly made an order for payment thereof by the appellant by instalments of 5*l.* per month.

The questions for the opinion of the court were whether there was any evidence to justify the justices in finding the facts set out in the case, and whether (if they were justified in so finding) they came to a correct determination and decision in point of law; and if not what should be done in the premises.

The Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) provides:

Sect. 150. Where any street within any urban district (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large), or the carriage way, footway, or any other part of such street, is not sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, and made good, or is not lighted to the satisfaction of the urban authority, such authority may, by notice addressed to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such parts thereof as may be required to be sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, or channelled, or to be lighted, require them to sewer, level, pave, metal, flag, channel, or make good, or to provide proper means for lighting the same within a time to be specified in such notice. . . . If such notice is not complied with, the urban authority may, if they think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein; and may recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred by them in so doing from the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as is settled by the surveyor of the urban authority, or (in case of dispute) by arbitration in manner provided by this Act; or the urban authority may by order declare the expenses so incurred to be private improvement expenses.

Sect. 257. Where any local authority have incurred expenses for the repayment whereof the owner of the premises for or in respect of which the same are incurred is made liable under this Act or by any agreement with the local authority, such expenses may be recovered, together with interest at a rate not exceeding five pounds per centum per annum, from the date of service of a demand for the same till payment thereof, from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed for which such expenses have been incurred, and until recovery of such expenses and interest the same shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred. In all summary proceedings by a local authority for the recovery of expenses incurred by them in works of private improvement, the time within such proceedings may be taken shall be reckoned from the date of the service of notice of demand. Where such expenses have been settled and apportioned by the surveyor of the local authority as payable by such owner such apportionment shall be binding and conclusive on such owner, unless within three months from service of notice on him by the local authority or their surveyor of the amount settled by the surveyor to be due from such owner, he shall by written notice dispute the same.

The local authority may, by order, declare any such expenses to be payable by annual instalments within a period not exceeding thirty years, with interest at a rate not exceeding five pounds per centum per annum until the whole amount is paid; and any such instalments and interest, or any part thereof, may be recovered in a summary manner from the owner or occupier for the time being of such premises, and may be deducted from the rent of such premises in the same proportions as are allowed in the case of private improvement rates under this Act.

Israel Davis for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in holding that it was not necessary that the appellant should be owner at the date of the demand. To render the appellant liable to the paving expenses under sect. 150, it is necessary that he should be owner not only at the date of the completion of the works, but also at the date of demand for payment of the expenses. The exact point was raised in the case of Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board (4 Q. B. Div. 305, reported as Hinton v. Swindon New Town Local Board, 40 L. T. Rep. 424), and it was there decided that the person who is made liable for these paving expenses under sect. 150 is the person who was owner not only at the date of completion of the works, but also at the date of the demand. Such person is the "owner in default" within the meaning of that section, and the judgment of Cockburn, C.J. in that case is absolutely conclusive upon the point that it is not enough that the person sought to be charged with the expenses should have been owner at the time the work was completed, but he must also be owner at the time when payment is demanded. Cockburn, C.J. says that the "owner in default" must be "a person who continues to be owner at the time the work is completed, and when the money laid out upon it is demanded from him"; and he repeats the same view in later parts of his judgment, and emphasises the fact that if the owner has ceased to be owner before the money is demanded, then "he cannot be said to be the owner in default at the time the money is demanded, and when another has stepped into his shoes and become the owner." There is nothing due until apportionment and demand. The scheme of the Act is not to create a debt, and does not create a debt, but to provide that the burden goes with the benefit. It creates a charge on the property, and that charge may be enforced in various ways. It may be enforced by this summary jurisdiction, if there is a person who satisfies the definition of "owner in default"; or it may be enforced by a private improvement rate under sect. 213, which is the alternative remedy. There are three or four sections of the Act to be looked at, sect. 150, by the 3rd paragraph of which the urban authority have power to declare these expenses to be private improvement expenses, sects. 213 and 214, which deal with private improvement expenses, and sect. 257, which provides for the recovery of these expenses from owners. Sect. 257 would appear to be against the appellant except for the construction placed on the word "owner" by the case referred to. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—That section would seem to put completion as the test of liability.] By itself it does, but the word "owner" in that section has been interpreted as meaning only an owner in possession at the time the notice of apportionment and demand is given. The case of Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board (ubi sup.) reconciled these sections once for all, and persons were entitled to rely upon that decision, which says that the "owner in default" must be the person who was the owner not only when the work was completed, but also at the time when notice of demand was given. The matter was considered by North, J., as between vendor and purchaser, in Re Bettesworth and Richer (58 L. T. Rep. 796; 37 Ch. Div. 535) who disregarded every section except sect. 257. The learned judge made observations there with regard to the Swindon case (ubi sup.), which were wholly obiter, and the case merely decides that, as between a vendor and a purchaser, the expenses become a charge on the property from the date of completion of the work, but it is not a decision as to this summary remedy. It is only a decision as to when the expenses become a charge on the property. There is a distinction between the time when the expenses become a charge on the property and the time when they can be recovered summarily in the nature of a debt; and therefore the cases which say that the expenses are a charge on the property from the time when the work is completed are not of necessity inconsistent with those that say that you can recover only from a particular owner who was the owner at the time when the amount was demanded. [WILLS, J.—I do not find in the Act any statement that the man who is liable, and from whom the expenses may be recovered must necessarily be the owner when the demand is made.] There is no express statement to that effect, but taking the sections together they mean that, and that was the meaning placed on them by this court in the Swindon case (ubi sup.). [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—That particular distinction between completion and demand, although it was discussed by North, J. on the charging point, has never been expressly raised on this point until this case.] That is so, and the view of North, J. in Re Bettesworth and Richer (ubi sup.) has not been entirely accepted, as, for instance, in Re Boor (60 L. T. Rep. 412; 40 Ch. Div. 572). He also referred to

West v. Downman, 42 L. T. Rep. 340; 14 Ch. Div. 111;

Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell, 43 L. T. Rep. 616; 15 Ch. Div. 378.

Macmorran, K.C. (Scholefield with him) for the respondents.—The justices were right in holding that the appellant was liable to pay. As far as the summary remedy is concerned, this is a new point; but my proposition is that the summary remedy arises at the same time as the charge, that is to say, that the person liable is to be determined at the time that the charge takes effect, namely, upon the completion of the work, and when the cases are looked at it will be seen that that is so. That part of the judgment of Cockburn, C.J. in Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board (ubi sup.), which points to a contrary view, was really obiter and must be disregarded.

K.B. Div.] MILLARD v. BALBY-WITH-HEXTHORPE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. [K.B. Div.]

Sect. 257 is the only section which provides for the recovery of these expenses, and it says that such expenses are to be recovered "from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed," and until recovery the same "shall be a charge upon the premises." These words were considered by North, J. in Re Bettesworth and Richer (ubi sup.), and, after saying (37 Ch. Div., at p. 539) that the expenses are charged from the time of the completion of the work, he goes on to say: "It is quite true that the owner cannot be compelled to pay till the total costs have been made out and apportioned between the owners, and notice has been served, and he has had three months to dispute the apportionment, and at the end of the three months he had written demand served upon him. The Act says payment may be recovered from the person who is owner at the time when the works are completed, and he is the person charged under the Act." In that case there was an open contract of sale, and the question was as between the vendor and the purchaser, who was liable to bear the charge. The decision was that the vendor was liable to indemnify the purchaser because the charge had taken effect before the sale; and North, J. points out that the person who is really liable personally is the person who was owner at the time the work was completed. That case has frequently come before the courts and has never been called in question. In the Swindon case (ubi sup.), Cockburn, C.J. seems to assume that the personal liability arises immediately the work is completed, and that the previous owner at the time the work is completed becomes liable because the money becomes forthwith payable. He treats the two things, the completion and the demand, as being the same thing, and he assumes that the person who was the owner when the work was completed is liable because the expenses would be demanded at once. He does not appreciate the fact that there is an interval between the two things, and he does not deal with the case where there would be such interval; and, moreover, what he says about the time of demand is really obiter. [KENNEDY, J.—Is there any distinction in substance between this Act and the Acts under which West v. Downman (ubi sup.) was decided? If not, it would seem from what Brett, L.J. there says, that there is no liability at all until apportionment.] There does not seem to be any distinction between the Acts; there is a liability before apportionment, though it cannot be actually enforced by summary proceedings until all the steps are taken. The case of Hornsey Local Board v. Monarch Investment Building Society (61 L. T. Rep. 867; 24 Q. B. Div. 1), related to a question of charge, but the court there pointed out that although certain steps were necessary to be taken before the liability could be enforced, the liability existed all the time. Esher, M.R. said: "The charge exists, though the exact amount charged may not exist." So, without regard to the person liable, the personal liability exists against somebody, though it is not ascertained. Though the Swindon case (ubi sup.) has not been referred to in recent cases, the case of Re Bettesworth and Richer (ubi sup.) has been referred to with approval by the Court of Appeal in several recent cases, as in Stock v. Meakin (82 L. T. Rep. 248; (1900) 1 Ch. 683), where the Court of Appeal applied to the Private Street Works Act 1892, the decision already given by North, J. in Bettesworth and Richer (ubi sup.), and Williams, L.J., who delivered the considered judgment of the court, seems to imply that the personal liability is one which arises when the works are completed, although it cannot be enforced till afterwards. In Surtees v. Woodhouse (88 L. T. Rep. 407; (1903) 1 K. B. 396), the Court of Appeal simply followed Stock v. Meakin (ubi sup.). If the charge were enforced, the person who was liable when the works were completed as between vendor and purchaser would be eventually liable, and sect. 257 does appear to justify the proceedings by the local authority in this case, because it makes the person liable to them directly who is owner when the works are completed; and if that person is not personally liable, then the result is that there is nobody against whom there is a personal liability.

Israel Davis in reply.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I have no hesitation in saying that if the matter was res integra, I should have very great difficulty in coming to the conclusion which is expressed by the judgment of Cockburn, C.J. in the case of Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board (ubi sup.). It seems to me that if sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875 is looked at, the person who is to pay is clearly defined; but I have always held, and still maintain the view strongly, that where there has been a clearly expressed opinion or decision which is under ordinary circumstances binding on this court, unless we can see that the judgment has proceeded on a mistake of fact, or that the particular point has not been raised so that the opinion was clearly obiter, we ought not to draw fine distinctions. It is very important that we should do so, because, as has been pointed out, persons will act, and ought to act, on such decisions, and those decisions may influence their conduct to a considerable extent; and, moreover, this is one of those matters which, no doubt, would be pretty well known by persons dealing with local government matters. Looking at the case of Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board (ubi sup.), I must say it is quite impossible to hold that what Cockburn, C.J. there said as to the date of demand was a mere matter of dictum or not a matter of judgment in that case. The point had there been raised, and three times over Cockburn, C.J. in his judgment does refer to it, and, speaking of sect. 150, he adds the words (4 Q. B. Div., at p. 307): "We have the words 'owner in default'; that is to say, the person who as owner is required to do the work, and is in default by reason of not having done it, but it must be a person who continues to be owner at the time the work is completed, and when the money laid out upon it is demanded from him." Then later on in his judgment he says: "I think that defect is remedied by the 257th section, which treats owners upon whom notice was originally served, and who are the owners at the time the work is completed, and the expenses demanded, as the persons upon whom the local board shall be able to come for expenses." Later on he again says: "What was meant was this—if the owner who is called upon to do the work, and who makes default in doing it, continues the owner at the time the work is executed and when the money laid out upon it is demanded, then he is liable under the 150th section, but if in the meantime he has ceased to be owner, he cannot be said to be the 'owner in default' at the time the money is demanded, and when another has stepped into his shoes and become the owner." Under those circumstances, I think that if this decision is to be questioned and varied in this respect—namely, by rejecting that part of the judgment which refers to the period of time when the money is demanded, as distinguished from the period of time when the work is completed as stated in sect. 257, it must be done by the Court of Appeal. I myself should not have arrived at the same conclusion, but I think we are bound by the decision in Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board (ubi sup.), and that we ought to follow it. Therefore this appeal will be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I certainly entertain very strongly the view my Lord has expressed that where there is a decision which seems to cover the point it is better to adhere to it than to refine it away because we may think it is not correct, and to leave the correction to be made by the Court of Appeal if they should think it necessary, especially where the judgment is an old one and where many rights may have been created by relying on the judgment as it stands. Also, I entirely agree that I should not myself, after the full discussion we have had, and after consideration of the sections, have come to a similar conclusion, because it does appear to me that the words of sect. 257 are abundantly plain, and that they convey a liability, or an inchoate liability, upon the person who happens to be the owner at the time the work is completed, although it may be the case that there is no personal liability upon him for anything until he has had notice of the demand which is made on him. It is when the demand is made and the notice given that the liability on him arises. That may perfectly well be, and yet it does not change the person upon whom the liability falls. It appears to me that the person liable is expressly defined by sect. 257 as the person who is owner of the premises "when the works are completed" for which such expenses have been incurred.

KENNEDY, J.—I entirely agree with my Lord's judgment. I share with him the feeling of what the position of this court should be, and for my part I question the correctness of the previous decision in the Swindon case (ubi sup.).

Appeal allowed. Order quashed. Leave to appeal.

NEW BALKIS EERSTELING v. RANDT GOLD MINING COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Company—Shares—Calls—Forfeiture for nonpayment of calls—Sale—Certificate—Liability of purchaser.

Certain shares of the value of 5s. each were issued by the respondent company. The sum of 3s. 4d. each was paid up upon them, and a further call of 1s. 8d. was made, but not paid by the holder. The shares were thereupon forfeited, and sold by the respondents to the appellant company, and by the certificate it was stated that they were 5s. shares on which 3s. 4d. was paid up, and the remaining 1s. 8d. had been called up and was payable by the former holder. It was further stated that the purchasers were "to be deemed to be holders of the said shares discharged from all calls due prior to the date hereof." Subsequently another call was made on the shares.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the appellants were liable to pay this call.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, consisting of the Lord Chancellor (Halsbury), the Lord Chief Justice (Lord Alverstone), and Sir F. Jeune, reported 88 L. T. Rep. 189; (1903) 1 K. B. 461, who had affirmed a decision of Bucknill, J., reported 85 L. T. Rep. 780, in an action tried before him without a jury.

The respondent company was incorporated on the 5th July 1895, under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1890, as a company limited by shares, with a nominal capital of 80,000*l.* in 80,000 shares of 1*l.* each, which were subsequently by special resolution (passed on the 24th July 1895 and confirmed on the 8th Aug. 1895) subdivided into 320,000 shares of 5s. each. The material articles of association provided as follows:

8. The directors may from time to time make such calls as they think fit upon the members in respect of all moneys unpaid on the shares held by them, and not by the conditions of allotment thereof made payable at fixed times, provided that no call shall exceed 25 per cent. of the nominal amount of the share, and that no call shall be made payable at a less interval than two calendar months from the date fixed for the payment of a previous call, and each member shall pay the amount of every call so made on him to the persons, and at the time, or, if made payable by instalments, at the times and at the place appointed by the directors. A call may be made payable either in one sum or by two or more instalments.

11. If the sum payable in respect of any call or instalment is not paid on or before the day appointed for payment thereof, the holder for the time being of the shares in respect of which the call shall have been made or the instalments shall be due shall pay interest for the same at the rate of 10*l.* per cent. per annum from the day appointed for the payment thereof to the time of the actual payment. But the directors may, if they think fit, remit altogether or in part any sum becoming payable for interest under this clause.

13. If any member fail to pay any call or instalment on or before the day appointed for the payment of the same, the directors may at any time thereafter during such time as the call or instalment remains unpaid serve a notice on such member requiring him to pay the same, together with any interest that may have accrued and all expenses that may have been incurred by the company by reason of such nonpayment.

15. If the requisitions of any such notice as aforesaid are not complied with, any shares in respect of which such notice has been given may at any time thereafter before payment of all calls or instalments, interest, and expenses due in respect thereof, be forfeited by a resolution of the directors to that effect.

16. Any shares so forfeited shall be deemed to be the property of the company, and the directors may sell, re-allot, or otherwise dispose of the same in such manner as they think fit.

17. Any member whose shares have been forfeited shall, notwithstanding, be liable to pay, and shall forthwith pay to the company all calls, instalments, interest, and expenses owing upon or in respect of such shares at the time of forfeiture, together with interest thereon, from the time of forfeiture until payment at the rate of 10l. per cent. per annum, and the directors may enforce the payment of such moneys, or any part thereof, if they think fit, but shall not be under any obligation so to do.

18. The directors may, at any time before any shares so forfeited shall have been sold, re-allotted, or otherwise disposed of, annul the forfeiture thereof upon such conditions as they think fit.

By sect. 15 of the Companies Act 1862, in the case of a company limited by shares, in so far as the articles do not exclude or modify the regulations in table A, those regulations shall, so far as the same are applicable, be deemed to be the regulations of the company. The articles of the respondent company were not expressed to exclude or modify the regulations in table A.

Among the regulations in table A is the following:

22. A statutory declaration in writing that the call in respect of a share was made and notice thereof given, and that default in payment of the call was made, and that the forfeiture of the share was made by a resolution of the directors to that effect, shall be sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated as against all persons entitled to such share, and such declaration and the receipt of the company for the price of such share shall constitute a good title to such share, and a certificate of proprietorship shall be delivered to a purchaser, and thereupon he shall be deemed the holder of such share, discharged from all calls due prior to such purchase, and he shall not be bound to see to the application of the purchase money, nor shall his title to such share be affected by any irregularity in the proceedings in reference to such sale.

At various dates previous to May 1900, a large number of the shares in the respondent company had been forfeited and were available for sale. Among these were 40,000 shares held by the African Gold Properties Limited, which had, in fact, been twice forfeited before May 1900, the first forfeiture having been annulled. In May 1900 the appellants purchased the 41,300 shares (including the above 40,000) from the respondent company for 150l. on the terms that "the whole amounts of the shares had been called up and were due before the forfeitures and the sale" to the appellants, and that the appellants were to be holders of the shares "free and discharged from all calls due prior to the purchase." These terms were embodied in the certificates which, on payment of the 150l. purchase money, were issued by the respondent company to the appellants, who were duly registered as the holders of the 41,300 shares. The certificate relating to the block of 40,000 shares was in the following form:

The Randt Gold Mining Company Limited. Registered office, 19 and 21, Queen Victoria-street, E.C. Capital 80,000l., divided into 320,000 shares of 5s. each. Certificate.—This is to certify that the New Balkis Eersteling Limited, of Winchester House, Old Broad-street, London, E.C., is the registered holder of 40,000 shares of 5s. each, numbered 103,341—108,340, 220,808—247,507, 92,966—103,265 inclusive, in the above-named company, upon which the sum of 3s. 4d. per share has been paid. The remaining 1s. 8d. per share has been called up and is payable by the African Gold Properties Limited, who were the holders of the said shares prior to the same being forfeited, and the said the New Balkis Eersteling Limited is to be deemed to be the holder of the said shares discharged from all calls due prior to the date hereof. Given under the common seal of the company this 17th day of May 1900.—F. CATESBY HOLLAND, Director; C. F. WAINWRIGHT, Secretary. (Seal.)

It was agreed before the Court of Appeal that the form of certificate was in fact copied from the wording of art. 22 of table A set out above. At the trial of the action it appeared from the evidence of the secretary of the respondent company that at various times subsequent to the forfeiture of the block of 40,000 shares previously held by the African Gold Properties Limited that company had paid to the respondent company sums amounting to 627l. 3s. in respect of their liability (by reason of art. 17 of the respondent company's articles of association) to pay, notwithstanding the forfeiture, the calls owing on the shares at the date of the forfeiture. This sum of 627l. 3s. represented between 3½d. and 4d. per share on the 40,000, and there was not more than 3s. 8d. paid on those shares, and there was accordingly upwards of 1s. 3d. (the amount of the call now in question) remaining unpaid on the shares. On the 12th Dec. 1900 the directors of the respondent company resolved that a call of 1s. 3d. per share be made on all the shares held by the appellants, and be payable on the 3rd Jan. 1901, and notice of the said call was duly given. The appellants refused to pay the amount called, and the present action was commenced in the King's Bench Division on the 6th Feb. 1901 to recover that amount, with interest and costs. Bucknill J. ordered judgment to be entered for the respondent company (the plaintiffs) for the amount of their claim (2605l. 5s. 10d.), with 89l. 13s. 4d. for interest from date of writ, and costs and judgment.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellants their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: This case has been presented to your Lordships on the part of the appellants with great ability, but, speaking for myself, I rather doubt whether there is any room for argument. The facts are quite clear. There was a company called the African Gold Properties Company Limited, who were holders of shares in the Randt Company; they had 40,000 shares, upon which calls to the amount of 3s. 4d. per share were made and paid. Then there was a call of 1s. 8d., which was not paid, and the shares were forfeited. They were disposed of to the present appellants, and a certificate of proprietorship was granted to them. It seems to me that the whole question depends upon the true construction of that certificate, bearing in mind, of course, that the certificate derived its efficiency from the general principles applicable to such a case as this, and the provisions of the enactment especially in table A of the Companies Act of 1862. The general principle in such a case is, I think, that every member of a company limited by shares is liable, in respect of all moneys payable upon his shares, to pay every call that is duly made upon him. It is contended by the appellants that the company had no power to make this call. Now, the certificate is in these terms: "This is to certify that the New Balkis Eersteling Limited . . . is the holder of 40,000 shares of 5s. each" (then it sets out their numbers) "upon which the sum of 3s. 4d. has been paid." That, of course, means that 1s. 8d. per share has not been paid. Now, the provisions of table A require that in the case of forfeiture "a certificate of proprietorship shall be delivered to a purchaser," and, according to the provisions of the Act, the certificate is to specify the shares held by him, and the amount of liability upon those shares. Therefore, so far, the certificate in this case is entirely in accordance with the requirements of table A. It leaves the appellants liable on the face of the certificate for the 1s. 8d. which is unpaid. The contest is really raised upon the latter part of the certificate, which is in these terms: "The remaining 1s. 8d. per share has been called up, and is payable by the African Gold Properties Limited, who were the holders of the said shares prior to the same being forfeited." That is a statement of fact which is literally and accurately true. Then it goes on to say, "and the said New Balkis Eersteling Limited is to be deemed to be the holder of the said shares discharged from all calls due prior to the date hereof." That follows the language of art. 22 in table A, which says that "a certificate of proprietorship shall be delivered to a purchaser, and thereupon he shall be deemed to be the holder of such share discharged from all calls due prior to such purchase. It seems to me to be a very reasonable provision to make, because, if he had not been discharged from these calls, questions might have been raised as to whether he was or was not liable to pay interest upon those shares in respect of the calls which had been made. The intention seems to me to be that he is to get a certificate of proprietorship, like everybody else, specifying what had been paid on his shares, and leaving him liable in respect of the balance to any call which the company may properly make. As regards this call, there is no objection taken to it for want of formality or regularity, or anything of that kind. It seems to me that it is a call that has been duly made, and the appellants are liable to pay it, and therefore I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: I confess that in the course of the argument I had some doubt whether the order which is appealed from could be supported or not, but reflection has satisfied me that the decision of Bucknill, J., affirmed by the Court of Appeal, is correct. It appears to me that the certificate in question follows the terms of sect. 22 of table A in the Companies Act 1862. I will remark that, if it is in accordance with sect. 22, no question of ultra vires can be raised, because it would be ridiculous to say that what is prescribed by an Act of Parliament, agreeing with other articles of a company formed under that Act, could be ultra vires. The question really, as it appears to me, turns upon the construction of a few words in sect. 22—namely, what is meant by saying that the purchaser from the company of a forfeited share is "to be deemed to be the holder of such share discharged from all calls due prior to such purchase." Does that mean that he is to be discharged from the liability to pay the amount of calls already due, or does it really mean that the demand which has been made is no longer to affect the title to his shares? The words rather favour the former construction, because they are "discharged from all calls due." Now, what is due is the amount of the previous call; not the demand itself, the demand is not due, but the amount of the previous call is due. But if I look at the whole section, and the context in which it is found, and also at the nature of the transaction, I think that the meaning must be that the holder of the share as such is to be discharged from any liability under the previous demand. The reason why I say so is this. In the first place, the purport of sect. 22, and the effect of it, and, as you see if you read the whole of it, the intention is to give the holder of the purchased share a good title—that is to say, a clean title to the share which he purchases unaffected by the proceedings which had previously taken place rising out of the nonpayment of the previous demand. He is to have a clean title unaffected by the fact of the previous call having been made; or, in other words, I think that the effect is that, so far as the purchaser and any holder from him of that share are concerned, they are to be in the same position as if that prior call had never been made. But that is a mere question of quieting and perfecting the purchaser's title, and it does not appear to me to affect the question of what it is that he purchases. Now, what is it that he purchases? Upon this certificate there can be no doubt what it is that he purchases—namely, a 5s. share on which 3s. 4d. only has been paid—and therefore the holder of that share, under the Act of Parliament and the previous clauses (I think that the sections are sects. 4 and 6) in table A, will be liable to pay the extra 1s. 8d. Whether the company could make a contract to relieve him from the payment of that 1s. 8d. is, I think, hardly doubtful. They could not do so unless they were expressly authorised. Now, there is nothing in sect. 22, as I read it, which authorises the company to relieve him from the payment of that 1s. 8d. Therefore the result is this, that the purchaser purchases the shares talis qualis—that is to say, shares upon which 3s. 4d. only has been paid up. He is relieved from any liability under the previous demand or call which has been made by the company, and from any consequences of not complying with that call, but the holder of them is subject to any call which the company may properly make. He holds his shares in all respects as if those previous calls had never been made by the company; and with this consequence, that the company, quoad these particular shares (I am speaking only of the forfeited shares which are the subject of the purchase), is at liberty to make another call calling up the money over again. Therefore I think that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—My Lords: At first I confess that I shared the doubts to which Lord Davey has referred as having been entertained by him, but, as the case proceeded, it seemed to me that the conclusion which has been now stated by him was perfectly accurate. The question is really contained in the last words which he has uttered. It was contended at the Bar, as I understand, that the company had no power to make a second call on the shares which had been forfeited. It seems to me that it is in that statement that the fallacy lies. I can see no reason why, when the shares have been forfeited, and no call has been received on them, the power of the company should be taken away, and it should be prevented from obtaining the amount that may be necessary to put it in funds for carrying on its business by making a second call. The nonpayment of a call cannot be equivalent to the receipt of it in any shape or form. That being so, there is nothing injurious to the public interest, and nothing contrary to the equities existing between the parties, in this call being made and enforced against the present appellants.

Lord ROBERTSON.—My Lords: I entirely agree.

Lord LINDLEY.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I am not surprised at this certificate being construed in different ways by different people; but in order to understand it one must understand the subject-matter to which it relates. It is said that a forfeited share is like a table or a chair or any other property which the company has at its disposal. It is nothing of the sort. A forfeited share, which is either sold or reissued, or parted with with a view to future use, is a share in the company, which involves a great deal. But the short answer to the appellants' case appears to be this. Nobody who knows anything at all about companies, and shares, and the forms of documents which are in use in business, would dream of taking this certificate as a certificate for a fully paid-up share. It is nothing of the sort; it tells you that it is nothing of the sort; it tells you how much is paid; it tells you what is not paid; and then it goes on to say that the person who takes this share is to be "discharged from liability for all calls," which means that there is to be no liability on this share. The holder is not to be liable for the 1s. 8d.; that call, so far as he is concerned, does not affect it. But it tells him in language which I do not say is so plain that it cannot be misunderstood, because evidently it has been misunderstood, that he has become the holder of a share not paid up in full. Now, what is the liability of the man who takes that? It is to pay calls as and when they are made. Then it is said, "You cannot make two calls." If you look at art. 4 you will see that they are asking the House to put a construction upon it which has never been put upon it yet, so far as I know, and one which would not work in practice at all. What would be the result if under a certificate of this kind, or proceedings of this sort, the company were endeavouring to raise more than 5s. per share, I do not know; but that point is not raised. I can conceive that there might be difficulties then. But, as I understand it, they have given credit to these gentlemen for the money which they have actually got from the previous call; therefore this point is not raised. They are not attempting by this machinery to raise more money per share than they were authorized to raise by the Act. I have no doubt myself that the decision is quite right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Friday, Feb. 26.

(Before COLLINS, M.R., ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ.)

ELLIOTT v. CRUTCHLEY AND ANOTHER (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract—Performance rendered impossible—No default by either party—Money payable before performance became impossible—Right to recover—Construction of contract—Cheque given, but payment stopped.

It was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants that the plaintiff should provide the refreshments for a steamer which the defendants had hired to carry passengers to the naval review which was arranged to take place on the 28th June 1902 in connection with the Coronation of the King.

The contract provided that 300l. should be paid to the plaintiff on account of the refreshments on the 23rd June; and the defendants stipulated that "in the event of the cancellation of the review before any expense is incurred by the contractor there shall be no liability on our side."

On the 23rd June the defendants sent a cheque for 300l. to the plaintiff. On the 24th June the review was cancelled owing to the illness of the King, and the defendants stopped payment of the cheque. The plaintiff had incurred only a small amount of expense.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover the amount of the cheque.

Held (affirming the judgment of Ridley, J.), that the true construction of the contract was that, in the event of the review being cancelled, the defendants were to be liable only for the expenses incurred by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the sum of 300l.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ELLIOTT v. CRUTCHLEY AND ANOTHER.

[CT. OF APP.]

APPEAL of the plaintiff from the judgment of Ridley, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendants the sum of 300*l.* upon a cheque drawn by the defendants in favour of the plaintiff and dishonoured upon presentation.

The plaintiff was a refreshment contractor and caterer. The defendants were members of the executive committee of the Navy League.

The plaintiff provided the refreshments for passengers using the steamers owned by a company called the Coast Development Company.

In March 1902 an arrangement was made by which the Coast Development Company agreed to place their steamer, the Yarmouth Belle, at the disposal of the Navy League for the naval review intended to be held on the 28th June in connection with the Coronation of His Majesty the King; and as part of that arrangement it was agreed that the plaintiff should do the catering for the steamer on that occasion.

In pursuance of that agreement, on the 4th March 1902 the plaintiff wrote a letter to the defendants, on behalf of the Navy League, as follows:

We will supply the three meals, lunch, tea, and dinner, as per menu, at 12*s.* 6*d.* per head, you guaranteeing not less than 600 passengers, and paying for all over that number; wines and other drinks to be paid for by you at the company's ordinary tariff prices; 300*l.* to be paid to Mr. Elliott on account of the refreshments on the Monday previous to the review day.

On the 5th March the defendants wrote an answer which accepted the terms proposed by the plaintiff, and contained a postscript as follows:

It is, of course, understood that in the event of the cancellation of the review before any expense is incurred by the contractor there shall be no liability on our side.

On or before the 23rd June the plaintiff incurred some expense in the purchase of extra knives, forks, and crockery, and in printing tickets, but some of this expenditure was for other steamers hired for the same purpose. The learned judge found that the amount so expended for the Yarmouth Belle was about 20*l.* No expenditure was incurred for refreshments.

On the 23rd June, being the Monday previous to the review day, the defendants signed a cheque for 300*l.* in favour of the plaintiff, and sent it to him.

On the 24th June it became known that, owing to the illness of the King, the review would not be held, and nothing more was done by the plaintiff or the Navy League with regard to the Yarmouth Belle.

On the 25th June the defendants wrote to the plaintiff saying that, as the arrangement for the review was cancelled, they thought that the greater part of the amount of the cheque should be refunded.

The plaintiff did not answer that letter.

On the 15th July the plaintiff saw the defendants, and contended that he was entitled to be paid all the money which he would have been entitled to receive if the trip had been carried out.

The defendants intimated that they were willing to pay all the expenses incurred by the plaintiff, but he refused that offer.

The cheque not having been presented for payment, the defendants stopped payment thereof after the interview on the 15th July.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action to recover the amount of the cheque.

The action was tried before Ridley, J. without a jury, and the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the defendants (89 L. T. Rep. 417).

The plaintiff appealed.

Witt, K.C. and A. P. Poley for the appellant.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the amount of the cheque. It was a term of the contract that the sum of 300*l.* should be paid in advance on the 23rd June, and the plaintiff had a right to receive that sum upon that day. The postscript to the defendants' letter did not affect that right. It was not a term of the contract that, if the review was cancelled, any money paid under the contract should be paid back, or that any right to receive payment which had accrued should be affected: the meaning of the postscript was only that, if the review was cancelled before any expense was incurred by the plaintiff, no further liability should accrue to the defendants. The sum of 300*l.* became due and payable before the review was cancelled, and it is quite immaterial whether it was actually paid or not. This is like the case of freight payable in advance, when the advance freight is payable whether the voyage is performed or not, and cannot be recovered back if the ship is lost before performance of the voyage:

De Silvale v. Kendall, 4 M. & S. 37.

The test is whether this 300*l.*, if it had been actually paid upon the day when it became due under the contract, could have been recovered back. If it could not, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover it now. The plaintiff had a vested right to be paid this sum before performance of the contract was made impossible by the cancellation of the review, and therefore can now recover:

Blakeley v. Muller, 88 L. T. Rep. 90; (1903) 2 K. B. 760*n*;

Civil Service Co-operative Society Limited v. General Steam Navigation Company Limited, 89 L. T. Rep. 429; (1903) 2 K. B. 756.

The condition contained in the postscript does not apply, for the plaintiff had incurred expense before the cancellation of the review; and, further, this sum had become due and payable before the cancellation. It is impossible to import into this contract a condition that money paid should be recovered back, or that any accrued right to payment should be avoided. The contract cannot be construed as a contract to pay only the amount of expenses incurred, if the review was cancelled.

Montague Shearman, K.C. and Eustace G. Hills, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case the defendants, who were members of the executive committee of the Navy League, made a contract for the use of a steamer for the purpose of carrying passengers to view the naval review intended to be held on the 28th June 1902. As incidental to that arrangement the defendants thought that it was desirable to provide for the supply of refreshments on the steamer, and accordingly they made a contract with the plaintiff for that purpose which is contained in two letters. On the 2nd March the plaintiff wrote to the defendants saying: "We will supply the three meals . . . at 12s. 6d. per head, you guaranteeing not less than 600 passengers and paying for all over that number . . . ; 300l. to be paid to Mr. Elliott on account of the refreshments on the Monday previous to the review day." The defendants replied to that letter on the 5th March, accepting the terms offered by the plaintiff, and adding a postscript as follows: "It is, of course, understood that in the event of the cancellation of the review before any expense is incurred by the contractor there shall be no liability on our side." I think that that postscript is very material in this case. The day arrived on which that sum of 300l. became payable according to the terms of the letter—viz., the 23rd June. The defendants were willing to pay, and they sent the plaintiff a cheque for 300l. upon that day. Before that cheque was presented for payment the review was countermanded owing to the illness of the King. The defendants then stopped payment of the cheque, and the plaintiff did not receive any part of the 300l. In my opinion that circumstance makes no difference to the plaintiff's rights; the position is just the same as if the money had been actually paid to him upon the appointed day. The plaintiff's rights are not, I think, in any way affected by the fact that payment of the cheque was stopped. I say that because the learned judge made certain observations in his judgment upon that point. It is not necessary for our judgment on this appeal, but I have said that in order to get rid of any idea that we agree with those observations of the learned judge. The law has been repeatedly stated which applies to cases of contract when performance becomes impossible without the default of either party, and it has been quite recently laid down in this court. In the absence of special provisions, payments which have been already made remain where they were when performance becomes impossible; the party who was bound to pay and has paid cannot recover them back; and neither party is bound to any further performance of the contract. The contract is not to be treated as rescinded ab initio, but both parties are excused from any further performance. Restitutio in integrum is impossible, but no further performance is required. This rule has been laid down because, the parties not having provided for the event, it is impossible for the court to adjust exactly the rights of the parties so as to effect a complete restitutio in integrum. In the present case that general principle is not applicable because the parties themselves have by their contract dealt with that very matter, and have provided what is to happen if the review does not take place. Therefore the decisions to which I have referred do not govern the rights of the parties in this case in the event of the thing contemplated and provided for becoming impossible. That reduces this case to the sole question as to what is the proper construction of the contract contained in the two letters. The postscript to the letter written by the defendants says: "It is, of course, understood that in the event of the cancellation of the review before any expense is incurred by the contractor there shall be no liability on our side." Those words must be reasonably construed. On behalf of the appellant it is said that they mean only that no further liability is to be incurred after the cancellation of the review—that is, that it only means what the law would imply. I cannot agree with that contention. Those words must be construed reasonably and not too narrowly. It seems to me that those words mean that the parties are to be placed in the position in which they would be if there could be that which ordinarily there cannot be—that is, a rescission of the contract with a restitutio in integrum. A restitutio in integrum involves the consequence that expenses which have been incurred by the one party are to be recouped by the other party. This contract assumes that the expenses are to be recouped, and that there is to be a wiping out of any liability beyond that. It means that all liability is to be extinguished in the event of cancellation of the review, but subject to the obligation to reimburse the caterer all expenses which he may have then incurred. That is a reasonable arrangement. The parties are to stand as nearly as possible in the same position as if no contract had ever been made. In my judgment the decision of Ridley, J. was right, and therefore this appeal must fail and be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that upon the true construction of these letters, looked at from a business and common-sense point of view, this is not a case in which there was a contract to employ the plaintiff to provide refreshments whether the review took place or not. I think that the true meaning of the contract is that if the review was cancelled there was to be no liability on the part of the defendants beyond the obligation to pay the expenses already incurred by the plaintiff and no more. The review was cancelled, and I think that the defendants became liable to pay to the plaintiff the expenses which had already been incurred by him. The defendants offered to pay those expenses; but the plaintiff refused that offer, and claimed the whole 300l. In that contention I think that he was wrong. In my opinion the sum of 300l. was to be paid "on account" assuming that the review took place. That appears to me to be the true meaning of the contract. I certainly cannot gather from the terms of the contract that the sum of 300l. was to be paid to the plaintiff as a kind of retainer or to be his absolutely if there was no review. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If the contract was to pay the money to the plaintiff in any event, he would be entitled to recover. That, however, is not the contract in this case. The contract in this case is not the same as in the other cases where the money was payable before the event became impossible. In this case it is perfectly clear that it was the intention of the defendants to pay, out of the proceeds of tickets sold, the sum of 300l. on account. The common-sense meaning of the postscript is perfectly clear; it means that they are not to be liable for anything beyond the plaintiff's expenses if the review is cancelled. I think that the fact that the cheque was given, but was not paid, makes no difference in this case. The judgment

CAVENDISH v. STRUTT. (a)

Practice—Costs—Taxation—Refresher fees—Discretion of taxing master—Order LXV., rr. 8, 27, sub-rr. 29, 48.

Sub-rule 29 of Order LXV., r. 27, gives the taxing master a discretion in party and party taxation to allow refresher fees in addition to the maximum fees prescribed by sub-rule 48, if he finds that the higher amount is necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party.

Stewart and Co. v. Weber (89 L. T. Rep. 559) approved and followed.

SUMMONS to review taxation as between party and party, raising the question of the quantum of discretion given to the taxing masters in allowing refresher fees to counsel by the new sub-rule 29 of Order LXV., r. 27, passed in Jan. 1902.

The action was brought to set aside a voluntary settlement made by the plaintiff. It involved a large sum of money, and after a trial which lasted twenty days Byrne, J. gave judgment for the plaintiff setting aside the settlement and ordering the defendants to pay costs as between party and party.

The plaintiff's costs were taxed at nearly 2000*l.*, which included allowances in respect of three counsel, but a sum of over 1500*l.* was disallowed by the master on the ground that he was precluded by sub-rule 48 of Order LXV., r. 27, from allowing more than the maximum refresher fees there specified. The master stated in his answers to objections that, having regard to the importance of the action and the smallness of the brief fees, he would have been prepared to allow a substantial portion of the refresher fees paid by the plaintiff over and above the prescribed maximum, but he considered that the rules gave him no discretion in the matter.

The plaintiff, on the other hand, contended that the effect of the new sub-rule 29 (rule 10 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, Jan. 1902) was to enlarge the discretion of the taxing master and to enable him to allow, in addition to the fees prescribed by appendix N. and sub-rule 48, all costs which appeared to him "necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party."

Sub rule 29 is as follows:

On every taxation the taxing master shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice, or for defending the rights of any party, but save as against the party who incurred the same no costs shall be allowed which appear to the taxing master to have been incurred or increased through over-caution, negligence or mistake, or by payment of special fees to counsel, or special charges or expenses to witnesses or other persons, or by other unusual expenses.

The plaintiff took out this summons to review the taxation.

Buckmaster, K.C. and Mark Romer for the plaintiff.—The taxing master has discretion under the new sub-rule to allow these refresher fees. The words of Order LXV., r. 8—"no higher fees shall be allowed in any case except such as are by this order otherwise provided for"—are much stronger than those of sub-rule 48; but nevertheless, in McIver and Co. Limited v. Tate Steamers Limited (87 L. T. Rep. 320; (1902) 1 K. B. 184), when the former rule was in question, it was held by the Court of Appeal that sub-rule 29 had conferred a discretion to allow fees larger than those prescribed, and that decision has been followed in Re Ermen (88 L. T. Rep. 352; (1903) 2 Ch. 156). Moreover, the exact point has been decided in our favour by Kennedy, J. in Stewart and Co. v. Weber (89 L. T. Rep. 559).

Sargant for the defendants.—The decision in Stewart and Co. v. Weber is wrong and ought not to be followed. Sub-rule 48 deals with refresher fees on the principle of time; the proviso at the end was inserted in 1886 in order to meet the difficulty raised in Re Harrison (55 L. T. Rep. 72; 33 Ch. Div. 52) and is confined to taxations as between solicitor and client. General words in a later Act do not affect earlier and special legislation (Seward v. The Vera Cruz, 52 L. T. Rep. 474; 10 App. Cas. 59), and sub-rule 29 is in general terms and was not intended to abrogate sub-rule 48. In Re Ermen the taxation was as between solicitor and client, and the case does not decide that rule 8 has been enlarged by sub-rule 29. Sub-rule 29 does not apply to party and party taxation; and even if it does, the exception as to "payment of special fees" save the defendants from liability for the refreshers in this case.

BUCKLEY, J.—In this action Byrne, J. on the 14th May 1903 ordered the defendants to pay to the plaintiff, Cavendish, the costs of this action up to judgment, to be taxed by the taxing master. The plaintiff carried in his costs for taxation. They have been taxed, and the summons asks that the plaintiff's objections to that taxation may be allowed, and that it may be referred back to the taxing master to vary his certificate accordingly. The objections were three in number. One of them Mr. Buckmaster did not open; it was only for a small amount. The second objection he agreed that he could not argue, as the taxing master had exercised his discretion upon it. The only one argued before me was the third. It is no doubt of importance. The question I have to decide is whether on a taxation of costs between party and party the taxing master has, under the rules as they now stand, a discretion to allow a refresher fee to counsel in excess of the maximum refresher fee allowed by Order LXV., r. 27, sub-r. 48. The language of sub-rule 48 is that "the taxing officer may allow" fees of certain amounts from one sum named to another sum named. The rule contains no negative words. It does not provide that the taxing officer shall not allow more than those amounts, but on the true construction of the sub-rule I think that is its effect, and in Re Harrison (ubi sup.) Cotton, L.J., after expressing some doubt on the subject, said that the sub-rule must be read as restricting the fees. That case was decided before the proviso now at the end of the sub-rule was added. The proviso is as follows: "Provided that in the taxation of costs between solicitor and client the taxing officer shall be at liberty to allow larger fees, under special circumstances to be stated by him." The addition of that proviso no doubt supports further the construction previously adopted by Cotton, L.J. as to taxations between party and party. The history of the proviso is as follows: In Re Harrison the question was raised whether on a taxation between solicitor and client, when the client had given his solicitor authority to employ a particular leader, and to give him a refresher fee larger than the maximum fee allowed by sub-rule 48, the limit of that sub-rule applied, with the result that the taxing officer was precluded from allowing more than the maximum fee. The Court of Appeal held that it did apply, although it could be displaced by special agreement. The proviso was then introduced in order to give the taxing master a discretion in the case of solicitor and client costs. The discretion thus given was not extended to party and party costs. Therefore I start with this, that sub-rule 48 is to be read as if it provided that in a party and party taxation the taxing officer may allow, by way of refresher fee, so much and no more. The question then arises whether the new rule 10 of Jan. 1902, which is now Order LXV., r. 27, sub-r. 29, has given the taxing master a further discretion—namely, a discretion to go beyond the limits of sub-rule 48 in taxations between party and party. Sub-rule 29 is as follows: [His Lordship read the rule and continued:] In my opinion this has given him a further discretion. It has been decided by the Court of Appeal in McIver and Co. Limited v. Tate Steamers Limited (ubi sup.) that where the case is one to which Order LXV., r. 8, applies the taxing master has a discretion to make an allowance in respect of a solicitor's attendance in excess of the maximum allowance for such attendance specified in appendix N, No. 147. Rule 8 does, whereas sub-rule 48 does not, contain negative words. It says: "And no higher fees shall be allowed in any case." These words are, it is true, controlled by an exception, "except such as are by this order otherwise provided for." The Court of Appeal, however, rested their decision, not on the words of exception, but on the conclusion at which they arrived, that sub-rule 29 gives the master on every taxation a discretion to allow such costs as appear to him to be necessary or proper within the language of the sub-rule. Sub-rule 48 does not contain the words "and no higher fee shall be allowed," and therefore, of course, contains no words of exception; but, seeing that the Court of Appeal did not rest their decision on those words, the present case is not distinguishable from McIver and Co. Limited v. Tate Steamers Limited. In construing the rules, I think I am bound to read them as a whole, with the result that sub-rule 29 qualifies sub-rule 48, and gives the taxing master a discretion with regard to allowing fees under sub-sect. 48 which he did not previously possess. The old sub-rule 29 referred only to costs between party and party, and was in a negative form. It said that "as to costs to be paid or borne by another party, no costs are to be allowed which do not appear to the taxing officer to have been necessary or proper," whereas the new sub-rule 29 refers to every case of taxation, and is in an affirmative form. The rule committee struck out the old rule and substituted the other. I am bound to hold that they did that deliberately with a view to adding to the power of the taxing master. The taxing master says that if this view is adopted it will tend to abolish the distinction between party and party and solicitor and client costs. I do not think so. Sub-rule 29 consists of two parts. The first sentence is general, and applies to every taxation: "On every taxation the taxing-master shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party." The second part applies only to taxation as between party and party, for by the words "save as against the party who incurred the same," it excepts a taxation as between solicitor and client. It says: "But save as against the party who incurred the same no costs shall be allowed which appear to the taxing master to have been incurred or increased through over-caution, negligence or mistake, or by payment of special fees to counsel, or special charges or expenses to witnesses or other persons, or by other unusual expenses." The result is that in taxations between party and party there is created a new discretion in the taxing master limited by the language used in sub-rule 29. By that I mean that this limitation is imposed on him, that he must find that the higher amount which he allows is "necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party." If the taxation is between solicitor and client, he is not bound by that limitation. In that case he may allow costs incurred or increased by "payment of special fees to counsel," or special charges or expenses to witnesses or other persons, or by other unusual expenses," which he is not to allow on taxations between party and party. The latter part of the sub-rule includes what is generally called a "special fee"—that is to say, a fee paid to counsel who will only go into court on payment of a special fee in addition to the usual fees. But it is not limited to that. "Special fees" there mean unusual or extraordinary or generous fees. Mr. Sargant, who argued the case with great ability, has pressed the argument upon me, that I ought to decide the question upon the principle that where there is a special rule referring to details, and then a rule is made on the same subject but of a general character, the general rule does not abrogate the special rule. He referred to Seward v. The Vera Cruz (ubi sup.), where Lord Selborne says that: "Where there are general words in a later Act capable of reasonable and sensible application without extending them to subjects specially dealt with by earlier legislation, you are not to hold that earlier and special legislation, directly repealed, altered, or derogated from merely by force of such general words, without any indication of a particular intention to do so." I do not think that is a principle to apply in this case. Into these rules are introduced from time to time alterations and variations, and I must take it that the committee in making the alterations are dealing with the rules as a whole. I have to make up my mind whether it was intended to qualify what was in the rules before the alterations or not. Here I think it was so intended. Mr. Sargant also contended that, on the assumption that sub-rule 29 applied to sub-rule 48, nevertheless it left refresher fees as they were before, because sub-rule 48 gives a definite maximum, and sub-rule 29 says that on taxations between party and party special fees and other unusual expenses shall not be allowed. I have dealt with this already. The special fee there referred to is an unusual or extraordinary fee, and not a fee larger than that allowed by sub-rule 48, whose payment is necessary or proper within sub-rule 29. Sub-rule 29 empowers the master to go beyond sub-rule 48, for the purpose, not of allowing in party and party taxations refresher fees which are unusual or extraordinary, but of allowing such refresher fees as are "necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party," notwithstanding that they are in excess of sub-rule 48. In Re Ermen Farwell, J., and in Stewart and Co. v. Weber Kennedy, J., have decided this question in the same way as I have done. Stewart and Co. v. Weber is on all fours with this case, and I might have followed it without adding anything; but, having regard to the importance of the question, I have thought it best to give my own reasons. I allow the objections, and send this case back to the master to decide what in his discretion are reasonable refresher fees to allow to the plaintiff's counsel. The plaintiff has succeeded on the more important of his objections, and the defendants must pay two-thirds of his costs of the present application.

Re VENN; LINDON v. INGRAM.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Re VENN; LINDON v. INGRAM. (a)

Will — Construction — Ambiguity — Referring to codicil to clear up ambiguity — Gift contingent on surviving tenant for life — Class gift — Gift to a class and a named person — Lapse.

A testatrix directed her residuary real and personal estate to be converted into money and the income to be paid to a niece for her life, and on the tenant for life's decease the testatrix directed her trustees to divide the trust estate equally between the brothers and sisters of the tenant for life living at the latter's decease and A., B., and C. in equal shares, "and should either of them be dead leaving children such children are to take the share their deceased parent would have been entitled to."

By a codicil the testatrix recited that she had in her will directed her residuary estate to be sold and the proceeds divided between the persons therein named, and desired a great-niece to have a share in her residuary estate equally with the others named in the will and bequeathed her the same accordingly.

The testatrix died in 1901, and the tenant for life in 1902. One brother only of the tenant for life, and no sister, was living at the tenant for life's death. Of A., B., and C., A. had predeceased the testatrix, and B., though he survived the testatrix, died before the tenant for life. A. and B. were half-brothers of the testatrix, but C. was a stranger in blood.

Upon an originating summons taken out for the determination of the questions who were the persons entitled to the residuary estate, whether A.'s share devolved upon the next of kin of the testatrix or became divisible between the other legatees, and whether the gift of a share to B. was contingent on his surviving the tenant for life.

Held, that on the will alone there was an ambiguity as to whether the estate was divisible in moieties or in equal shares among all who took, but that the court was entitled to refer to the codicil to clear up the ambiguity, and that the codicil made it clear that the estate was divisible in equal shares.

*Held, also, that the gift of a share to B. was not contingent on his surviving the tenant for life, and that, in view of the judgments of the House of Lords in Kingsbury v. Walter (84 L. T. Rep. 697; (1901) A. C. 187), the gift could not be construed as a class gift, and that A.'s share therefore lapsed to the testatrix's next of kin.*

Darley v. Martin (13 C. B. 683) and Grover v. Raper (5 W. R. 134) followed.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By her will, dated the 18th Nov. 1890, Mrs. Sarah Venn, widow, of Gravesend, in the county of Kent, gave, devised, and bequeathed (after directing payment of her debts and bequeathing a pecuniary legacy) all the rest of her real and personal estate to the trustees of her will upon trust to convert the same into money and to pay to the testatrix's niece, Emily Alice Ingram, the interest, dividends, and income arising therefrom for her life.

The will then proceeded as follows:

And upon her decease I direct my said trustees to divide all my said trust estate equally between the brothers and sisters of the said Emily Alice Ingram living at her decease and Thomas William Gaze, Francis Thomas Brooker Gaze, and William Brand Parker in equal shares, and should either of them be dead leaving children such children are to take the share their deceased parent would have been entitled to if living.

On the 1st June 1893 the testatrix executed the following codicil:

Whereas in my will I have directed my residuary estate to be sold and the proceeds divided between the persons therein named, now I desire my great-niece Louisa Emille Ingram to have a share in my residuary estate equally with the others named in the said will, and I bequeath her the same accordingly. In all other respects I confirm the said will.

The testatrix died on the 7th Aug. 1901, and her will and first codicil (with another codicil not material to this report) were proved in the principal registry on the 20th Sept. 1901.

The estate was composed entirely of personalty. The tenant for life, Emily Alice Ingram, died on the 14th May 1902. One only of her brothers was then living, and no sister.

Re VENN; LINDON v. INGRAM.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Francis Thomas Brooker Gaze had predeceased the testatrix, and Thomas William Gaze, though he survived the testatrix, died before the tenant for life. They were half-brothers of the testatrix. William Brand Parker, who was a stranger in blood, survived the tenant for life.

Under these circumstances the trustees of the will and codicils took out an originating summons asking for the determination of the questions who were the persons entitled to the residuary estate of the testatrix; whether the share of Francis Thomas Brooker Gaze devolved upon the next of kin of the testatrix; or whether by reason of his death in her lifetime her residuary estate became divisible between the legatees named in the will and first codicil other than him; and whether the gift by the will of a share in the residuary estate to Thomas William Gaze was contingent upon his surviving the tenant for life.

Burt for the summons.

Fawcus for the surviving brother of the tenant for life.—I take a moiety of the estate, and the great-niece named in the codicil takes a share only in the other moiety with the three persons named in the will. But if it be held that the whole estate is divisible in equal shares, surviving the tenant for life is a condition of sharing in the case of the persons named, just as much as in the case of the brothers and sisters of the tenant for life, and the estate of T. W. Gaze is therefore not entitled to a share. The words "the share their deceased parent would have been entitled to" show that this is the true construction.

R. M. Pattison for the legal personal representative of T. W. Gaze.—The testatrix did not intend to divide the estate into moieties. This is clear even on the will, but, if necessary, the codicil can be referred to, and that puts the matter beyond doubt. There is nothing in the will to make surviving the tenant for life a condition of taking a share except in the case of the tenant for life's brothers and sisters.

G. S. Alexander for W. B. Parker.—I support the contention that T. W. Gaze's estate does not share because he died before the tenant for life. With regard to the share of F. T. B. Gaze, I contend that the gift is one to a class, and that his share therefore did not lapse. The older cases may favour the view that some blood or other tie between the named individual and the class is necessary to a class gift; but in Re Moss; Kingsbury v. Walter (81 L. T. Rep. 139; (1899) 2 Ch. 314) Romer, L.J. (1899) 2 Ch., at p. 319 lays down the principle that a gift to a class properly so called; and a named individual such as A. equally is prima facie a gift to a class. No doubt when the same case came before the House of Lords (84 L. T. Rep. 697; (1901) A. C. 187), Lord Davey (1901) A. C., at p. 193 disapproved of Romer, L.J.'s statement; but the House affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeal in which that statement was made and it was not argued before the House, and I contend that Lord Davey's disapproval was dictum only.

Fawcus replied.

JOYCE, J.—The question in this case is as to the mode in which the residuary estate of the testatrix is to be distributed among the persons named or referred to in her will and first codicil. [His Lordship read the passage in the will set out supra, and the first codicil, and continued:] Various difficulties arise. The first question is whether the trust estate is to be divided in moieties, one moiety going to the surviving brothers and sisters of the tenant for life and the other one to the persons named in the will together with the great-niece named in the codicil, or whether it is divisible in equal shares between all those persons. Taking the will alone, I am of opinion that on its true construction the division is not to be in moieties, but equally between all entitled; but I admit that on the will alone there is an ambiguity as to this, and that it is well arguable that the testatrix intended the division to be in moieties. If, however, I may refer to the first codicil to clear up the ambiguity, there is no doubt but that the estate is to be divided equally among all the beneficiaries. If there had been a recital of the will in the codicil which was obviously erroneous, no doubt that would not alter the construction of the will (see Skerratt v. Oakley, 7 T. R. 492; 4 R. R. 504); but, if the recital in the codicil is not absolutely erroneous, I have no doubt that I may refer to the codicil to clear up an ambiguity in the will. The principal authority is Darley v. Martin (13 C. B. 683). There Jervis, C.J., in delivering the considered judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, says (at p. 690): "And, as to the effect of the codicil, it was argued that an erroneous reference in a codicil to the dispositions of the will cannot constitute a new bequest in opposition to the will; and Skerratt v. Oakley (ubi sup.) was relied on. But it appears to us that the argument with respect to the effect of the codicil, when rightly considered, is not that the will is at all revoked or varied by the codicil; but rather that, the will and codicil being all one testament, the language of the will may be interpreted by that of the codicil; and that accordingly, the gift over in the will 'in default of such issue' being capable of importing a bequest over on failure of issue living at the death, it ought to be inferred that the testator employed it in that sense, because, in the codicil, he refers to it as if it were a gift over in default of his daughter's leaving no issue, which, as regards personalty, is tantamount to a gift on failure of issue living at her death. The argument, thus viewed, appears to us to be well founded." Now, Kindersley, V.C., than whom a more careful judge in regard to such matters never existed, did the same thing in Grover v. Raper, reported only in 5 W. R. 134. In that case there was an ambiguity in the words of the will; and the Vice-Chancellor, after expressing his opinion as to the meaning of the will, says that the codicil, however, put the matter beyond all doubt. I think, therefore, that I may, following the considered judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in Darley v. Martin (ubi sup.) and this decision of Kindersley, V.C., have recourse to the codicil to clear up the ambiguity; and I hold that the testatrix's residuary estate is divisible in equal shares among all who take. One of the persons particularly named, T. W. Gaze, died after the testatrix, but in the lifetime of the tenant for life. It is contended that his representatives are not entitled to share, on the ground that on the true construction of the will the gift is contingent on his surviving the tenant for life. There is not a word in the will to that effect, though no doubt the testatrix uses the words "would have been entitled to." This, however, is not enough for the purpose, especially as the supposed gift over would, in my opinion, apply equally to a case of death in the lifetime of the testatrix. I therefore hold that T. W. Gaze's representatives are entitled to a share. Then another point arises. F. T. B. Gaze died in the lifetime of the testatrix, and I have to determine what becomes of his share. Does it lapse to the next of kin, or does it pass to the other legatees? Having carefully read and considered the judgments of the House of Lords in Kingsbury v. Walter (84 L. T. Rep. 697; (1901) A. C. 187), I am of opinion that this cannot be construed as a class gift, and I therefore hold that F. T. B. Gaze's share has lapsed to the testatrix's next of kin.

Hereditaments were limited to the use of B. R. for life, with remainder to the use of his children, or other issue born in his lifetime, for such estates and in such shares as B. R. should by deed or will appoint, and in default to the use of his children in fee simple as tenants in common.

B. R. by his will appointed to his son W. for life, with remainder to his sons in tail male, with remainder to his daughters in tail male, with remainder to B. R.'s daughter for life, with remainder to her sons in tail male, with remainder to her daughters, with divers remainders over.

Held, that W. did not take an estate in tail general or in tail male, and that all the remainders subsequent to the life estate appointed to him failed.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

Certain hereditaments were by will limited to the use of Benjamin Rising for life, with remainder to the use of his children, or other issue born in his lifetime, for such estates and in such shares as he should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of his children in fee simple as tenants in common.

Benjamin Rising, by his will dated the 6th Dec. 1890, appointed the hereditaments to his son William for life, with remainder to William's sons born during his (Benjamin Rising's) life successively according to seniority for life, with remainder after the decease of each such son to his sons successively according to seniority in tail male, with remainder to the sons of William born after Benjamin Rising's death successively according to seniority in tail male, with remainder to William's daughters successively according to seniority, with remainder after the death of each such daughter to her sons successively according to seniority in tail male, with remainder to Benjamin Rising's daughter Ethel for life, with remainder to her sons successively according to seniority in tail male, with remainder to her daughters successively according to seniority, with remainder after the death of each such daughter to her sons successively according to seniority in tail male, with divers remainders over.

Benjamin Rising died on the 28th Aug. 1902 leaving two children—William, who was married and had no children, and Ethel, who was married and had an infant son.

The grandchildren not being objects of the power, this summons was taken out to determine whether William took an estate tail cy-près.

K. Wood for Ethel.—Subject to William's life interest, Ethel takes a moiety in default of appointment. It is not a case for cy-près.

Tomlin for Ethel's infant son.—The testator's intention would be carried out by giving William an estate tail, with remainder to Ethel for life, with remainder to her son in tail male. [SWINFEN EADY, J. referred to Monypenny v. Dering (2 De G. M. & G. 145).]

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 2.—SWINFEN EADY, J.—It was said that the effect of the appointment in Benjamin Rising's will was to give William an estate in tail general, or, at all events, an estate in tail male by cy-près, and that the court ought to adopt a construction of the will which would give effect, so far as possible, to the whole of the testator's intention. The extent and application of the doctrine of cy-près were explained by Lord St. Leonards in Monypenny v. Dering (ubi sup.) The object is to give effect to the general intent, but it is not (as in other cases) to be carried into effect at the expense of the particular intent; in applying the doctrine nothing is to be sacrificed, and neither by implication nor by the doctrine of cy-près can an estate be given to a class or a portion of a class for whom the testator did not intend to provide. In Hampton v. Holman (36 L. T. Rep. 287; 5 Ch. Div. 183) Jessel, M.R. treated Monypenny v. Dering (ubi sup.) as deciding that the doctrine of cy-près, which he considered was more properly described as a rule of construction, cannot be applied where the effect of so doing will be to make the estate devolve in a line of succession different from that which the testator has expressly designated. The particular intent is only sacrificed so far as may be necessary to carry out the general intent according to law. In the present case no kind of estate tail can be given by implication to William which would not sacrifice the particular intent and defeat the general intention of the testator, as expressed in his will, by excluding persons for whom he intended to provide, or by including a class or portion of a class for whom he did not intend to provide. I think that it would be going beyond any decided case, and that it would be contrary to the principles laid down in the cases I have referred to, if I were to hold that William takes an estate in tail general or in tail male under the appointment. All remainders subsequent to the estate for life which is validly appointed to him fail in the events which have happened.

Re HEATHCOTE; HEATHCOTE v. TRENCH. (a)

Will—Accumulation—39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98—Trust to pay debts—Debts paid out of capital moneys—Trust to recoup capital.

H., by his will made on the 22nd July 1881, gave certain annuities and devised and bequeathed the residue upon trust that the trustees should accumulate the rents and profits, until sufficient should be raised to pay off certain sums amounting in all to 116,000*l.*, for twenty-one years from the death of the last surviving grandchild living at his death. Under the will A. was the present tenant for life, and B. was tenant in tail in remainder.

The will provided that if the debts, directed to be paid out of accumulations, were paid out of capital moneys, the capital moneys should be recouped the sums so paid.

Until 1903 the annuities had exhausted the whole of the income, but on the death of an annuitant there was now a surplus income of about 5000*l.* per annum. One hundred thousand pounds of the debts directed to be paid out of accumulations had been paid out of the proceeds of sale of land sold under the Settled Land Acts, and 16,000*l.* had been paid out of the proceeds of sale of land sold by the trustees under a power of sale contained in the will. It was submitted by A. that he was entitled to the whole income, as the trust was not one to pay debts, but to recoup capital. For B. it was said that the trust to recoup capital was in fact a trust to pay debts.

Held, that, as to the 100,000*l.* paid out of capital moneys arising under the Settled Land Acts, it was clear that there was no right of recoupment. As to the 16,000*l.*, once debts were paid and satisfied out of capital moneys, a direction that capital should be recouped was not a direction for payment of debts.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will, dated the 22nd July 1881, Sir William Heathcote directed his trustees for twenty-one years from the death of the last surviving grandchild living at his death to accumulate rents and profits, after satisfying certain annuities, until sufficient to pay off charges amounting to 116,000*l.* should be raised, and directed that if the debts directed to be paid out of accumulations were paid out of capital moneys, the capital moneys should be recouped the sums so paid.

Sir William Heathcote died on the 17th Aug. 1881.

(a) Reported by G. B. HAMILTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 15th July 1882 an order was made for the administration of the estate.

Sir W. P. Heathcote died in Oct. 1903, and thereupon an annuity of 5000*l.* ceased.

The present tenant for life was Gilbert Redvers Heathcote.

One hundred thousand pounds of the charges had been paid by sales under the Settled Land Acts, and 16,000*l.* out of moneys raised by the trustees of the will under a power of sale.

The court had directed payment off, being satisfied that it was for the benefit of all parties.

The question raised by the summons was whether the present tenant for life was entitled to the income, or whether there must be accumulation until the 116,000*l.* was made good.

Sect. 2 of 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98, provides:

That nothing in this Act contained shall extend to any provision for payment of debts of any grantor, settlor, or deviser, or other person or persons, or to any provision for raising portions for any child or children of any grantor, settlor, or deviser, or any child or children of any person taking any interest under any such conveyance, settlement, or devise, or to any direction touching the produce of timber or wood upon any lands or tenements, but that such provisions and directions shall and may be made and given as if this Act had not passed.

Farrer for the trustees.

Eve, K.C. and Allen for the tenant for life.—Accumulation is directed for the purpose of paying debts. But there are no debts, so the direction is void. What is suggested is an accumulation to recoup capital.

Macnaghten, K.C. and Preston for a tenant in tail in remainder.—There is no case actually deciding that an accumulation such as this would not be good, but Hall, V.C. expressed an opinion it would be bad:

Tewart v. Lawson, L. Rep. 18 Eq. 490;

Norton v. Johnson, 30 Ch. Div. 649, 653.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—Two questions are raised by this summons. The first, as to the 100,000*l.* paid out of money arising under the Settled Land Act, is not arguable. As to the 16,000*l.* which was paid out of the proceeds of sale of land sold by the trustees, as the testator has been dead twenty-three years, further accumulation is forbidden by sect. 1 of 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98, unless it is an excepted case. In my opinion, when once debts are paid and satisfied out of capital moneys, a direction that capital moneys shall be recouped is not a provision for payment of debts. When the debts are once paid and satisfied, sect. 2 no longer applies. Where the object of the accumulation is to provide a fund to recoup the estate for sums paid for debts out of capital, the accumulation is not one authorised by the section.

rental of 550*l.* per annum for 5500*l.* This profit rental was secured upon two houses in Cheapside, the receipts from tenants amounting to 950*l.*, the ground rent being 250*l.*, and the rates and taxes on one of the houses being 150*l.* No deduction was made in respect of the other house, of which W. was the tenant, as there was no covenant by the landlord to pay rates and taxes. As a matter of fact the landlord had from 1876 until 1903 paid the rates and taxes on the house let to W.

On the 29th Sept. 1903 W. commenced an action for rectification of his lease, but the action was dismissed because he had granted an underlease of the term vested in him which amounted to an assignment.

W. wrote that he intended to take proceedings to make the underlessees join, and bring a fresh action.

The plaintiff said that, the action by W. having been heard and dismissed, the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance.

For the defendant it was said that the plaintiff knew W. said that he was not liable to pay rates and taxes before the sale, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to specific performance.

Held, that W.'s claim was an honest one, and that specific performance could not now be granted, because sufficient time had not elapsed to enable the court to say that no fresh action would be brought. The action was ordered to stand over till the 24th June, and, if W. had then taken no steps to obtain rectification, the court might then be in a position to treat his claim as shadowy.

ACTION.

By an indenture, dated the 12th April 1876, the lower ground floor of certain premises in Cheapside were leased to F. W. Farthing for forty-six years, less three days, from the 25th Dec. 1875, at 300*l.* per annum.

In 1877 this lease was assigned to Whiffin.

On the 21st July 1903, at a sale by auction, the defendant contracted to buy what was described as "a secured profit rental of 550*l.* from 118 and 119, Cheapside.

The receipts from tenants were 950*l.*, the ground rent 250*l.*, and the rates and taxes on one of the houses 150*l.* No deduction was made for rates and taxes on the premises held by Whiffin.

From 1876 to 1903 Whiffin had not paid rates and taxes, and on the 29th March 1903 Whiffin commenced an action for rectification of his lease. This action was dismissed because Whiffin had executed what purported to be an underlease, but was in fact an assignment of his whole term. His solicitors wrote that he intended to get the assignee to join, or to get the deed rectified, and bring another action.

The vendors brought this action for specific performance of the contract.

Eve, K.C. and Methold for the plaintiffs.—Whiffin's action has been heard and dismissed. Any further claim by him is too shadowy to be regarded, and the plaintiff is entitled to specific performance.

Vernon Smith, K.C. and Duke for the defendant.—There has been misrepresentation, for the plaintiff knew at the time of the sale that Whiffin said that he was not liable to pay rates and taxes.

A purchaser will not be compelled to complete a contract when litigation is pending :

Bentley v. Craven, 17 Beav. 204 ;

Pegler v. White, 33 Beav. 403.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—This is a vendors' action for specific performance. The property in question was offered for sale as an "amply secured ground rent," and certain figures were given showing a profit rental of 550*l.* The purchaser agreed to give ten years' purchase, 5500*l.* Before the date of completion the question arose whether rates and taxes were payable by the landlord or the tenant. On the title there is no obligation on the landlord to do so. The question arose whether in the lease Whiffin holds a covenant to pay rates and taxes had been omitted. It is not disputed that since the lease was granted up to 1903 the rates and taxes were in fact paid by the landlord. The suggestion is that they were paid in error, because there was no separate apportionment until Feb. 1903, when a copy of the lease was obtained. The vendors, relying on the title shown by the documents, have brought this action. The defendant is willing to complete subject to the question of rates and taxes. The plaintiffs are able to make a title, and the only question is whether Whiffin is entitled to rectification. Whiffin did bring an action and issued a writ for rectification. The action came on for trial, and it appeared that Whiffin purported to grant an underlease, but parted with such a term that it amounted to an assignment, and Buckley, J. held that Whiffin could not maintain the action. The action stood over for a fortnight to see if the assignee could be induced to join, but, as he did not, the action was dismissed. Whiffin's solicitors write that he insists on his claim to rectification, and that a fresh action will be instituted. In any case, the dismissal of Whiffin's action does not finally determine the action. The plaintiffs say that Whiffin's claim is shadowy, and that no attention should be paid to it. If the assignee refuses to join, it may be, he says, disregarded. Whiffin's claim may never be brought and may wholly fail. I have formed the view Whiffin's claim is an honest one, and for a long series of years the landlord paid the rates and taxes. I arrive at the conclusion I ought not to force specific performance, because sufficient time has not elapsed to enable the court to say that no fresh action will be brought. The proper course is to order the action to stand over to a day when the court can see whether Whiffin's claim is a substantial one or not. The court will not refuse specific performance when the only blot on title is a person saying a deed ought to be rectified, if he takes no steps to obtain rectification. I will adjourn the further hearing of the action until the 24th June. If Whiffin proceeds promptly, his claim may be judicially considered. If no steps have then been taken, the court may consider the claim shadowy.

CASE stated on a complaint preferred by the respondents under sect. 41 of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) and sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59) against the appellant for that on the 16th March 1903 a notice was served upon him requiring him to abate a certain nuisance in or on certain premises situate at No. 428, Liverpool-road, in the district of the respondents, and that he had made default in complying with the requisitions thereof within the time therein specified—that is to say, within fourteen days from the service thereof, and for that purpose to take up the existing defective yard and cellar drains and gullies and tops and in lieu thereof provide and lay down efficient drains constructed of glazed and socketed stoneware pipes, the joints to be properly made good with cement, the cellar drain to be embedded in concrete to a thickness of 6in. all around the pipes, and to provide efficient wash-out gullies with lipped tops.

The complaint was heard on the 28th Sept. and the 19th Oct. 1903, when the justices adjudged that the cellar drain complained of by the corporation (the respondents) was used by two or more houses belonging to different owners, and declared that such drain was a single private drain within the meaning of sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, and made an order for the defendant (the appellant) to abate the nuisance and to do any works necessary for that purpose within twenty-eight days.

Upon the hearing of the complaint the following facts were proved:—

The appellant is the owner of a block of seven houses numbered 426 to 438, Liverpool-road, in the borough of Eccles, of which the house No. 428, the subject of the complaint, is one.

The houses were built in 1875 and in accordance with plans deposited with the then sanitary authority, the Barton, Eccles, Winton, and Monton Local Board (predecessors of the respondents), and approved by them on the 4th March 1875.

Adjacent to the block of seven houses and only separated therefrom by a private passage giving access to the backs of the houses (but on the same side of Liverpool-road) are twelve houses belonging to one owner, Edward Johnson, and divided into two blocks of six houses each by a private passage giving access to the backs of the houses.

On the 6th March 1903 complaint was made to the respondents that a certain drain or sewer belonging to No. 428, Liverpool-road was a nuisance and injurious to health. On examination the drain or sewer was found to be in a bad condition and to require alteration or amendment, and the respondents thereupon served upon the appellants the notice of the 16th March 1903. The works specified therein were necessary for the purpose of abating the nuisance.

The notice was not complied with.

The drain or sewer was part of a joint drain or sewer running through and under the cellars of the seven houses belonging to the appellant, and receiving the drainage of each house before falling into the respondents' main sewer in Hampson-street, a street running off and at right angles to Liverpool-road.

The 9in. drain or sewer was a continuation of and received the drainage from a 6in. drain or sewer passing through and under the cellars of the two blocks of six houses belonging to Edward Johnson and received the drainage from each of the twelve houses before reaching the 9in. drain or sewer, as shown in the plan given below. The whole of the 6in. and 9in. drain or sewer was laid through private property until it reached the public sewer in Hampson-street.

It was admitted by the respondents that the notice required the appellant to make structural alterations in the drain or sewer.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that, as the drain of the house received the drainage of more than one building not within the same curtilage belonging to the same owner, it became a sewer under the provisions of sects. 4 and 13 of the Public Health Act 1875 as it conveyed the drainage of three separate blocks of dwelling-houses containing six in each in two blocks owned by one owner, Edward Johnson, and the other block containing seven dwelling-houses owned by the appellant, another owner, and was vested in the local authority, and it was the duty of the local authority to repair, cleanse, and keep it so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, and that the drain was not a single private drain within the meaning of sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890.

On the part of the appellant it was further contended that the words in sect. 41 of the Public Health Act 1875, "appear to be in bad condition or to require alteration or amendment," did not refer to defects in the structure, and did not empower the respondents to order structural alterations, and the notice of the 16th March 1903 was therefore ultra vires and bad.

On the part of the respondents it was contended that the drain or sewer at the place where the nuisance occurred was a single private drain, to which sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 applied, and, further, that, as the works specified in the notice were necessary for the purpose of abating the nuisance, the respondents were authorised to require the execution of the same under and by virtue of the provisions of sect. 41 of the Public Health Act 1875.

The attention of the justices was called to the following cases:

Travis v. Uttley, 70 L. T. Rep. 242; (1894) 1 Q. B. 233;
Kershaw v. Taylor, 73 L. T. Rep. 274; (1895) 2 Q. B. 471;

Beckenham Urban District Council v. Wood, 60 J. P. 490.

The justices found that the drain was used by two or more houses belonging to different owners, and that the drain was a single private drain within the meaning of sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, and they made an order upon the appellants to abate the nuisance and to do any works necessary for that purpose within twenty-eight days.

The notice referred to above was as follows:

To Mr. Thompson, of 41, Alexandra-road, Patricroft, in the county of Lancaster, owner of No. 428, Liverpool-road. Whereas on the 6th March 1903 application was made to the said local authority stating that certain drains on or belonging to certain premises situate at No. 428, Liverpool-road, in the said borough, were a nuisance and injurious to health; And whereas on the 6th March 1903 the inspector of nuisances to the said local authority, being duly empowered by the said local authority, entered the premises and caused the ground to be opened and examined the drains; And whereas the drains then appeared to be in bad condition and required alteration and amendment; And whereas you are the owner of the premises; Notice is hereby given to you that the said local authority require you to do the following necessary works and to complete the same within fourteen days from the service of this notice—that is to say, that you take up the existing defective yard and cellar drains and gullies and tops and in lieu thereof provide and lay down efficient drains constructed of glazed and socketed stoneware pipes, the joints to be properly made good with cement, the cellar drain to be embedded in concrete to a thickness of six inches all around the pipe, and to provide efficient wash-out gullies with lipped tops. And further take notice that if this notice be not complied with you will be liable to a penalty not exceeding 10s. for every day you make default, and the said local authority may, if they think fit, themselves execute the works and may recover the expenses thereof in manner provided by the said Acts.—Dated the 16th March 1903.—WM. HENRY HICKSON, Town Clerk, for and on behalf of the said authority.—Town Hall, Eccles.

By sect. 41 of the Public Health Act 1875 it is provided that:

On the written application of any person to a local authority stating that any drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ash-pit, or cesspool, on or belonging to any premises within the district, is a nuisance or injurious to health (but not otherwise), the local authority may by writing empower their surveyor or inspector of nuisances, after twenty-four hours' written notice to the occupier of such premises, or in case of emergency without notice, to enter such premises with or without assistants, and cause the ground to be opened and examine such drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ash-pit, or cesspool. If the drain, water-closet, earth-pit, privy, ash-pit, or cesspool on examination is found to be in proper condition, he shall cause the ground to be closed and any damage done to be made good as soon as can be, and the expenses of the works shall be defrayed by the local authority. If the drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ash-pit, or cesspool on examination shall appear to be in bad condition or to require alteration or amendment, the local authority shall forthwith cause notice in writing to be given to the owner or occupier of the premises requiring to forthwith or within a reasonable time therein specified to do the necessary works, and if such notice is not complied with the person to whom it is given shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 10s. for every day during which he continues to make default, and the local authority may, if they think fit, execute such works, and may recover in a summary manner from the owner the expenses incurred by them in so doing, or may by order declare the same to be private improvement expenses.

By sect. 4 of the Public Health Act 1875:

"Drain" means any drain of and used for drainage of one building only, or premises within the same curtilage,

K.B. Div.]

THOMPSON (app) v. MAYOR OF ECCLES (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

and made merely for the purpose of communicating therefrom with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed.

"Sewer" includes sewers and drains of every description except drains to which the word "drain" interpreted as aforesaid applies, and except drains vested in or under the control of any authority having the management of roads and not being a local authority under this Act.

By sect. 19, sub-sect. 1, of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 it is provided that:

Where two or more houses belonging to different owners are connected to a public sewer by a single private drain an application may be made under sect. 41 of the Public Health Act 1875 (relating to complaints as to nuisances from drains), and the local authority may recover any expenses incurred by them in executing any works under the powers conferred on them by that section from the owners of the houses in such shares and proportions as shall be settled by their surveyor, or in case of dispute by a court of summary jurisdiction.

And by sub-sect. 3 it is provided that:

For the purposes of this section the expression "drain" includes a drain used for the drainage of more than one building.

Rhodes for the appellant.—This 9in. pipe is a sewer, as it receives the drainage of more than one building not belonging to the same owner and not within the same curtilage. That brings it within sect. 4 of the Public Health Act 1875. It is not within sect. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890. It takes the drainage of twelve other houses, which are separated from the appellant's houses by a private passage, into the main sewer. The decision in Jackson v. Wimbledon Urban District Council (90 L. T. Rep. 417) governs this case, and it is clear from Travis v. Uttley (70 L. T. Rep. 242; (1894) 1 Q. B. 233) that although a pipe is placed entirely upon private ground it may be a sewer. He also referred to

Bradford v. Mayor of Eastbourne, 74 L. T. Rep. 762; (1896) 2 Q. B. 205;

Fulham Vestry v. Solomon, (1896) 1 Q. B. 198;

C. F. Pritchard for the respondents.—The question is whether this pipe is a sewer or a single private drain. The nuisance arose in the 9in. pipe under the appellant's premises, and at that point the 9in. pipe is a single private drain. He referred to Seal v. Merthyr Tydfil Urban District Council, 77 L. T. Rep. 303; (1897) 2 Q. B. 543.

Jackson v. Wimbledon Urban District Council (sup.) is in point, but in the respondents' favour, for it was conceded that the pipe which ran between the two properties, and on private ground, and took the drainage of different owners was a single private drain. He also referred to

Mayor of Eastbourne v. Bradford (sup.);

Reg. v. Mayor of Hastings, 75 L. T. Rep. 377; (1897) 1 Q. B. 46;

Southwold Corporation v. Croudy, 67 J. P. 273; 1 L. G. R. 899.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Speaking for myself, I can only repeat that I hope either the Court of Appeal or the House of Lords may be able to sweep away some of the decisions and put some logical system before us, or that the Act of 1890 may be amended by some definition of what a single private drain is. I have always felt that from the beginning there has been rather a wrong view allowed to become law, that a person can put upon a local authority the obligation to repair a drain simply because the owner of the drain has allowed another person to connect his drains with it. I doubt very much whether there is any distinct authority which supports that view directly, but it is involved in so many decisions that, at any rate in this court, I think it is quite impossible to hold that a structure, though made through private property, which does receive, in accordance with the language of sect. 4 of the Act of 1875, the drainage of more than one building or premises in one curtilage, becomes a drain and not a sewer. If it is possible even for the Court of Appeal or the House of Lords to go behind all this and say that the action of a private individual with regard to his own private drain is not enough to make it a sewer, a great many difficulties will be removed. It seems to me, therefore, prima facie that, having regard to the decisions and language of the Act of 1875, independently of the Act of 1890, this structure, which was made before the Act of 1890, did become a sewer because it fulfilled the conditions that made it a sewer after the Act of 1875. Mr. Pritchard in arguing this case frankly admitted that, and other learned counsel of great experience in these cases have admitted that, in this court at any rate, they would not argue that a thing was not a sewer but a drain simply because it passed through private property. There is the language of Cave, J. in more than one judgment which showed his opinion was, and he was of great learning in these matters, that that might and ought to have been the rule; but certainly that rule has not been followed. That being so, we get a structure made as this was, prior to the passing, or at any rate prior to the adoption, of the Act of 1890, a sewer. Now, it is said that the decisions in Bradford v. Mayor of Eastbourne (sup.) and Self v. Hove Commissioners (sup.) and some others have decided that simply because a pipe behind a number of houses received the drainage of houses belonging to different owners, that would still remain a drain for the purposes of sect. 41 although it would have been a sewer if the houses had all belonged to one person. Of course, that as a result is really ridiculous, as has been pointed out, and one hopes that there may be some means of avoiding that absurdity. To say that it is a sewer if twelve houses belong to one person and becomes a drain for the purpose of this section because he sells one is absurd and ridiculous, and that particular test of what would make a particular conduit in a particular condition of things a drain or a sewer, depending on the words "belonging to different owners," scarcely can be a sufficient principle on which to decide whether a particular conduit is at the time being a drain or a sewer. Then come the words "a single private drain." The facts in the Eastbourne case are very like this case. The finding or statement in that case is that there was a private pipe or drain which ran through private property which had been allowed to receive the drainage of a number of different houses, and under the circumstances the court thought that in that case the conditions of sect. 19 were fulfilled, and that pipe having become a nuisance (not the drain

THOMPSON (app.) v. MAYOR OF ECCLES (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

beyond it) it should be treated as being a single private drain. I myself am satisfied that whatever the Legislature intended, they did not mean a single private drain to be determined by the circumstances I have been referring to. They probably thought, as my brother Channell has pointed out, that a drain on private property draining more than one house would be a drain but not a sewer; but it is possible, of course, they may have had in mind other cases where a person has a single private drain not a sewer, and does allow different owners to drain through it by provision for value to himself or any other reason. I must follow the view I expressed in the course of the argument of the case, although I quite agree that the Wimbledon case is not an authority in this case. It was conceded by the counsel for the respondents in the Wimbledon case that he could not have argued the conduit behind the house was not a sewer but for the fact that it had come out into that which was a single private drain admitted to be so on the case. They contended that because at one end it was a single private drain, it did not cease throughout its length to be a single private drain. For reasons which I explained in the judgment, we held that, notwithstanding that, we must come to the conclusion that the conduit which drained the several houses of one owner or different owners still might be a sewer. I think, for the reasons I have endeavoured to explain (I know how difficult it is), this was a sewer, and that the appeal must be allowed on that ground. The other grounds of the appeal are not required, in my opinion. I think the Southwold case did decide, and the language of the section shows that, for the purpose of sect. 41, you have to look at the condition of the sewer as it exists at the time of the nuisance, and that the words "alteration and amendments" refer to alteration and amendment of the statu quo of the sewer at the moment. I think this appeal must be allowed, and that, on these grounds, they ought to have held that this was a sewer and not a drain.

DARLING, J.—I was going to say I am of the same opinion, but I will not say that. I assent to what the Lord Chief Justice has said. Really, to have any reasonable view that you can call an opinion upon these various Acts of Parliament and the cases decided upon them. I do not think it is possible. One follows the case when there is one of them, but ultimately there are a great many, some barely reconcilable to the others; and to follow one, the result is that one becomes involved in manifest absurdities from time to time. All sorts of cases are put from the bar in argument, which anyone has to admit at once can be supported by some case or another, and yet involve a manifest absurdity. I should be very glad if the Lord Chief Justice's idea could be reached, and there could be found a court of sufficient authority to make sense of these Acts of Parliament. I think much the simplest thing to do, and what ought to be done, really is to acknowledge that a mistake has been made in this legislation altogether, and that it is not possible to give a decision which will not result in all kind of difficulties or absurdities following from it because of the way in which this 19th section has been passed. The only reasonable and effective thing to do is to go back and legislate again, sweep away all these decisions, and put the matter upon a reasonable basis, and until that is done I think there will not be a reasonable basis at all. I do not profess to be able to give any kind of reason for the decision at which I have arrived. I think if anybody could explain these Acts of Parliament it is my brother Channell, and he has not yet said what his view about this case is, but I can only say that whatever it may be, feeling certain if anybody can explain it he can, I am content to say I agree with him.

CHANNELL, J.—I am afraid I must repeat what I have said, and I am afraid I shall not satisfy my brother. My opinion is that the problem really is an insoluble one. I should like to give the judgment that would most clearly secure that this case should go before another tribunal in order if possible to get an authoritative solution which would be the best that could be obtained. I do not think any Court of Appeal would say their decision was thoroughly satisfactory, yet we should get a decision for use in these courts, where this question is always turning up. The real problem is to reconcile somehow or other the provisions of the 19th section of the Act of 1890 with the general definition clause in the Act of 1875. To begin with, I get rid of one difficulty in this case as to the words "belonging to different owners" in sect. 19. As to that, I am perfectly clear that the true interpretation of the words "belonging to different owners" is "not all belonging to the same owner." It is quite clear from the purview of the section altogether that that is what is meant. It would not mean to make a difference in a row of nineteen or twenty houses that there was only nineteen owners because two of the houses somewhere or other along the row happened to belong to the same person. That is impossible. Whatever the object of the Legislature was in passing this enactment, it is quite natural they should say in reference to that which is a single private drain, it should not prevent the making of an order under sect. 41 of the Public Health Act 1875 because the houses do not all belong to the same owner. Whatever they meant by "a single private drain," I am quite satisfied that is the natural meaning of sect. 19. The most natural solution of it is that which I suggested during the course of the argument, that that section, which was passed by the Legislature and adopted by the Legislature, was in point of fact framed by somebody who was under the idea that a thing might be a single private drain although it drained different houses provided they all belonged to the same owner. That is not the general law, but there are such cases. Then there is another solution of the problem about how this Act of 1890 came to be passed, and that is this: It is an adoptive Act, and as a matter of fact, the large number of clauses in it are clauses which have been passed from time to time in various local Acts, and this particular clause, clause 19, is a clause that had been in local Acts. It has been discussed in Self v. Hove Commissioners and Hill v. Hair. I am not sure about it, but I know the clause under discussion was a clause in a local Act, and the fact is, as a matter of history, that this clause has been in local Acts for a considerable time. But then those local Acts in all probability and in all the cases where it was properly in, had definition clauses which differed from that in the Public Health Act of 1875. Certainly some of them had clauses somewhat similar to the metropolitan clauses about combined drainage under an order, and whenever you get a definition clause of that character and this 19th clause in the local Act the whole thing was perfectly easy to construe and there was no difficulty about it, but when it got into this Act and the only definition clause was the definition that there was in the Act of 1875, of course a difficulty was at once created. Personally, I do not think it is possible to give a perfectly satisfactory solution of the problem, but I suppose one has to set to work about it as best one can, and it seems to me that the best solution is that which was given by the late Cave, J. He pointed out that, although it was exceptional, yet, nevertheless, there might in law be a single private drain draining more than one house. There are, however, few cases in which the court have found the facts such as they could so hold. But there is a thing called a drain made for the owner's own profit, and there is at least one case where it was held that a drain was a drain made for a person's own private profit and so remained vested in the owner, although otherwise it would have been a sewer vested in the local authority. Now, assuming that to be a possible state of things, you have got a case in which there may be such a thing as a single private drain draining several houses—a thing that is not a sewer, but which drains more than one house and a thing that would have been so apart from this Act of 1890. Then you could apply a sensible interpretation to this sect. 19. You say provided that you can find such a thing as a single private drain, then, when you have got it, notwithstanding that all the houses do not belong to the same owner you may make an order under sect. 41. If that is the true interpretation, then when you have got before you any of these cases you have got to see what is the evidence, if any, that this particular pipe or thing that you are dealing with is a private drain. It will not be a private drain because it belongs to different owners. If it is a private drain you may get it under this section, although it does belong to different owners, but you must first show that it is in point of fact a private drain. You may show it in one way, at any rate, by showing that it was a drain made for profit within the meaning of that clause. That is one way it could be shown, and I do not say that there may not possibly be other ways. I should not like to say that an agreement between a local authority and a building owner that they would sanction such a system of drainage as he proposed upon the terms that the thing should remain a private drain would not be binding. I see no reason why it should not be, but then you must prove it if you want in any particular case to say that was a private drain, because it was built and made in that way. It seems to me that the only reasonable way in which you can reconcile sect. 19 of the Act of 1890 and the definition clause of the Act of 1875 is by saying that provided in any particular case you show that the thing is a private drain and not a sewer, which prima facie it will be if it drains more than one house, then you may make an order under sect. 41, notwithstanding that it drains houses which do not all belong to the same owner. That seems to me to be, on the whole, the most satisfactory solution of this problem, which all the same I think cannot quite satisfactorily be solved. If that is the fair meaning, and applying that to this present case, then in this present case there is no evidence that this thing in point of fact was a single private drain. There is nothing set out in the case to show that it was. The argument that was raised did suggest it is so, because it was said it does drain houses that did belong to different owners, but I do not think that is sufficient.

HILL (app.) v. PANNIFER (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

HILL (app.) v. PANNIFER (resp.). (a)

Poor rate—Distress—Sale—Charges in schedule—Further charges—Legality—57 Geo. 3, c. 93—7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 17—12 & 13 Vict. c. 14.

On a distress for poor rates the costs and charges are not limited to those provided by the schedule to 57 Geo. 3, c. 93, applied to a distress for such rates by 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 17, but the "reasonable charges of the taking, keeping, and selling the said distress" may be deducted as provided by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, s. 1.

These "reasonable charges" may include a charge for the fee of an auctioneer on the sale.

CASE stated on a complaint preferred by the appellant, Robert William Hill, against the respondents, or some or one of them, for that they (having sold or caused to be sold certain goods of the appellant to satisfy a poor rate for the parish of Bildeston, in the county of Suffolk, and certain costs and charges levied by distress upon the goods) on or about the 28th July 1903 levied, took, and received from the appellant and retained and took from the produce of such goods sold, or caused to be sold, or caused to be levied, taken, or received, or caused to be retained and taken, greater costs and charges than are mentioned and set down in the schedule to the Act 57 Geo. 3, c. 93, to wit, a charge of 14s. for the expenses of an "auctioneer," contrary to the provisions of that statute and of 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 17, and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14.

Upon the hearing of the complaint it was proved that the respondent Robert Pannifer is assistant overseer, and the other respondents, Robert Grimsey and Josiah Shipp, overseers of the poor for the parish of Bildeston.

On the 2nd July 1903 Pannifer obtained from two justices a warrant of distress against the appellant, directing him to make distress of the goods of the appellant and to sell the same if within the space of five days after making the distress the sum of 1l. then due and owing from the appellant in respect of poor rate and the further sum of 5s. 1d., the costs of obtaining the warrant, were not duly paid by the appellant.

HILL (app.) v. PANNIFER (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

Pannifer, acting under the warrant, duly made distress upon the goods and demanded the payment of the moneys referred to above.

On the 13th July the appellant paid to Pannifer the sum of 1*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.*, being the sum of 5*s.* 1*d.* in respect of the costs and 1*s.* in respect of the poor rate, but declined to pay the balance of 1*s.* claimed to be due in respect of the rate.

On the 28th July 1903 Pannifer, as directed by the warrant, sold the appellant's goods so distrained to satisfy the unpaid balance of the rate, and after the sale he gave the appellant a statutory notice of costs and charges as required by 57 Geo. 3, c. 93.

The sum realised by the sale was 1*l.* 5*s.*, from which the respondent took and retained, in addition to the sum of 1*s.* for the rate, the following costs and charges: Levy, 3*s.*; taking, keeping, and use of room, &c., 6*s.* 3*d.*; auctioneer, 1*s.*; and paid the balance of 9*d.* to the appellant.

The sum of 1*s.* was one-third of a fee of two guineas paid by the respondent to an auctioneer in respect of the sale at one time of the goods of the appellant and two other ratepayers against whom distress warrants had been granted.

In all these matters Pannifer acted with the knowledge and consent and under the authority of the other respondents.

It was contended by the appellant that the costs and charges to which the respondents were entitled were limited by the statute 57 Geo. 3, c. 93, as applied to the levy of a distress in respect of poor rates by 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 17, and that the charge of 1*s.* for the auctioneer's fee was an excessive and illegal charge.

The appellant further contended that 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, did not entitle the respondents to reimburse themselves by appropriating any higher or other costs or charges than those which were authorised by 57 Geo. 3, c. 93, as applied to proceedings for the recovery of poor rates.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the words of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, s. 1, and the express provisions of the warrant of distress which cited those words, entitled them (notwithstanding the earlier provisions of 57 Geo. 3, c. 93, and 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 17) to deduct and retain from the proceeds of the sale of the appellant's goods costs and charges, to wit, in the words of the Act, "the reasonable charges of selling," in excess of and other than those specified in the schedule to 57 Geo. 3, c. 93, and that the last-mentioned statute must be considered to be pro tanto revoked and amended.

The justices were of opinion that the respondents' contention as to the effect of the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, s. 1, was right, and they found that the charge of 1*s.* was a reasonable and proper charge, and one which by law could properly be made in the circumstances of the case, and they therefore dismissed the complaint.

By 57 Geo. 3, c. 93, s. 1, an Act to regulate the costs of distresses levied for payment of small rents, it is provided:

Whereas divers persons acting as brokers and distraining on the goods and chattels of others, or employed in the course of such distresses, have of late made excessive charges to the great oppression of poor tenants and others, and it is expedient to check such practices: Be it therefore enacted that from and after the passing of this Act no person whatsoever making any distress for rent, where the sum demanded and due shall not exceed the sum of 20*l.* for and in respect of such rent, nor any person whatsoever employed in any manner in making such distress or doing any act whatsoever in the course of such distress or for carrying the same into effect, shall have, take, or receive out of the produce of the goods or chattels distrained upon and sold, or from the tenant distrained on, or from the landlord, or from any other person whatsoever any other or more costs and charges for and in respect of such distress, or any matter or thing done therein, than such as are fixed and set forth in the schedule hereunto annexed and appropriated to each act which shall have been done in the course of such distress; and no person or persons whatsoever shall make any charge whatsoever for any act, matter, or thing mentioned in the said schedule unless such act shall have been really done.

This Act was extended by 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 17, to distresses for land tax, assessed taxes, poor rates, church rates, tithes, highway rates, sewer rates, or any other rates, taxes, impositions, or assessments whatsoever, where the sum demanded and due does not exceed 20*l.*

By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, s. 1, an Act to enable overseers of the poor and surveyors of highways to recover the costs of distraining for rates, it is provided:

Whereas provision is already made by law for the recovery of the sum or sums at which any person is rated or assessed to the relief of the poor or is rated or assessed in any rate for the highways, in England or Wales, by distress and sale of goods and chattels and in default of such distress by commitment to prison until the same shall be paid, but no provision is made for levying the costs and expenses incurred by the overseers of the poor or the surveyors of the highways in the recovery of the same respectively: Be it therefore enacted that it shall be lawful hereafter for all justices of the peace, if in their discretion they shall so think fit, in any warrant of distress they shall make and issue for the levying of any sum or sums to which any person or persons is or are now or may hereafter be rated or assessed in or by any rate or assessment for the relief of the poor or for the highways in England and Wales, or in or by any other rate or assessment which by law now or hereafter is or shall be directed to be enforced or recovered in the same manner as a poor rate, or in any warrant for the levying of any arrears of the same, to order that a sum such as they may deem reasonable for the costs and expenses which such overseers or surveyors or the persons applying for such warrant shall have incurred in obtaining the same shall also be levied of the goods and chattels of the person or persons against whom such warrant shall be granted, together with the reasonable charges of taking, keeping, and selling of the said distress.

The Act 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, by sect. 1, only allows the justices to order such sum as they deem reasonable for the costs and expenses of the overseers, together with the reasonable charges of the taking, keeping, and selling of the distress. The earlier statutes are not repealed by the Act of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, and this statute does not permit the respondents to take any more or any higher costs and expenses than those provided for by 57 Geo. 3, c. 93. They referred to

W. Stewart and Nolan for the respondents.—The warrant of distress here recites sect. 1 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14. The words, "the reasonable charges of the taking, keeping, and selling of the said distress," are not in any way cut down or limited by the Act of 57 Geo. 3, c. 93. If the earlier and later statute are so inconsistent that they cannot be read together, the earlier must be taken to be repealed pro tanto. No authority can be shown for the appellant's contention here. They referred to Law of Distress Amendment Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 21).

Under sect. 8 of that Act there is power to make rules, and there are two scales, one for distresses for rent over and one for the like distresses under 204.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the appeal fails. I think that we have here, for the purposes of this proceeding, to construe sect. 1 of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, and the other sections of that Act and the schedules therein referred to. The preamble of the Act says: "Whereas provision is already made by law for the recovery of the sum or sums at which any person is rated or assessed in any rate for the highways, in England or Wales, by distress or sale of his goods and chattels and in default of such distress by commitment to prison until the same shall be paid, but no provision is made for levying the costs and expenses incurred by the overseers of the poor or the surveyors of highways in the recovery of the same respectively." If it be a just criticism to say that that is not an accurate recital, because it ought merely to have referred to the costs of the issuing of the summons, I do not think, to my mind, it affects what the true construction of the enabling words must be. Of course the preamble may be looked at and ought to be looked at for the purpose of forming a guide to any construction which is doubtful, or to decide between two constructions which may be put upon the words. It seems to me, even if Mr. Robson is right, there is a clear enactment that "it shall be lawful hereafter for all justices of the peace, if in their discretion they shall so think fit, in any warrant of distress they shall make and issue for the levying of any sum or sums to which any person or persons is or are now or may hereafter be rated or assessed in or by any rate or assessment for the relief of the poor or for the highways in England or Wales, or in or by any other rate or assessment which by law now or hereafter is or shall be directed to be enforced or recovered in the same manner as a poor rate, or in any warrant for the levying of any arrears of the same, to order that a sum such as they may deem reasonable for the costs and expenses which such overseers or surveyors or the persons applying for such warrant shall have incurred in obtaining the same shall also be levied of the goods and chattels of the person or persons against whom such warrant shall be granted." That deals with the particular point that Mr. Robson said had been left unprovided for by the existing enactments. Then the section goes on, "together with the reasonable charges of the taking, keeping, and selling of the said distress." When you look at the warrant, that warrant of distress again says, "together with the reasonable charges of taking, keeping, and selling the said distress," and if they—the rates—shall not be paid, then you do sell the said goods and chattels, rendering the overplus on demand, the reasonable charges of taking, keeping, and selling the said distress being first deducted. Mr. Robson says that the earlier statute—57 Geo. 3, c. 93—was still in force, and that it had been extended to a great many other rights. It extended to tithe, land tax, poor rate, church rate, tithes, highway rate, sewer rate, or any other rates and assessments whatsoever. Therefore it may be regarded as a general statute. Notwithstanding the existence of that Act being borne in mind, Mr. Robson suggests this statute means one of two things; it either means reasonable charges within the statutory maximum, or else it means the statutory charges. I think that it would require much clearer words than there are in this statute and much clearer expression of an indication that the old statutory maximum was to be applied to enable us to put that construction on the later Act. It seems to me you either must find words which said the charges are limited or are provided by law as now existing or charges not exceeding those that are already provided in respect of the levying of distress by virtue of those earlier statutes. I cannot help feeling that this is a special statute with regard to poor rates. It is a statute which is enacted in reference to poor rate, and it does not seem to me to be of necessity governed by the same considerations as those referred to when you are dealing with the overseers of the poor, who are to a certain extent public officers, public unpaid officers, and the persons who were considered by the earlier legislation with regard to the broker's charges. Mr. Stewart has properly admitted that the charges in this respect would be charges which would be in the same position as the broker's charges, but I can well imagine the Legislature in dealing with the poor rate meant to give the overseers, subject to the charges being reasonable, a protection against the costs and charges they had to pay. I am satisfied that this construction has been put upon the charges which have been allowed to be levied under a summons for poor rates, and I can find no trace, except the ingenious argument of Mr. Robson, of any authority which says, with regard to 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, the maximum scale of 57 Geo. 3 was intended to apply. I think the language of the statute is too strong for that. I think the statute did mean to say that the overseers of the poor should be entitled to have their reasonable charges for levying and selling goods. The magistrates have found the charge of 14s. is a reasonable charge, and I think that that was in accordance with the statute enacting that the overseers should have their reasonable charges, and therefore I think this appeal should not be allowed.

KENNEDY, J.—On the whole, though not, I confess, without very great doubt, I think that the view my Lord has taken is the preferable one. I think where there is no direct reference in any shape or form in a later Act to an earlier Act, but you have directions or enactments in the later Act which seem, at any rate, to differ from those in the earlier Act, it is not very easy to say whether the proper inference is that the later Act has overruled the earlier Act and abolished it so far as its directions or enactments are concerned, or whether one ought not to find some way in which both statutes can be applied to a certain extent, the one merely being treated as modifying the other. The argument, which I confess seems to me an argument of considerable power, which Mr. Robson has used in this case is this: That while this last Act of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, provides that the magistrates may make an order for a distress which shall include the reasonable charges of taking, keeping, and selling the chattels, yet that ought to be read with an Act which has certainly never been specifically repealed, 57 Geo. 3, c. 93, and with a later Act, 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 17, which in cases of distress for poor rate, amongst other things, have enacted that those charges for taking, keeping, and selling shall not exceed a certain sum. It is suggested that the fair construction of the later Act is that the charges are to be reasonable, but not to exceed that which by those two Acts of George III. and George IV., which have been referred to have been thought by the Legislature to be sufficient. They are to be reasonable within those statutory limits, those limits being imposed by unrepealed Acts of Parliament. It is true that even the later of those Acts is now an old Act, and costs and charges will and must vary; but, on the other hand, it does seem to me that there is a good deal, at any rate, to be said in favour of the appellant's argument where Parliament passes a later Act without reference to an earlier Act, and that earlier Act is one which has been in force for a long time and therefore well known. It seems reasonable that one should try to construe the two consistently if it is possible. The question is, is it reasonable for us to do so in this case? That seems to me to be the whole matter. Another, it seems to me, still weightier argument was this: In regard to poor rate, it affects a number of poor people, very often people not of great means—people with regard to whom Parliament has, as long back as these earlier statutes show, given a protection in the form of a limitation of the costs. Apparently the procedure for questioning the reasonableness of the charges has disappeared, as far as the magistrates are concerned, if the view of the respondents is right. So far as I can see, and so far as the argument has called our attention to the sections, the right of a person who has unreasonable charges attempted to be forced upon him in the levying would be by bringing an action to recover money which had been obtained by a sort of duress—in other words, driving him to the courts instead of a speedier and cheaper method of going to the magistrate by such a summons as was taken out in the present case. I think, on the whole, we ought to face the conclusion that the Legislature has done two things which are inconsistent. It may be said, on the other hand, how very easy, when the limitation in the latter Act is merely of a reasonable charge, to have said if you intended to retain the old and well-known maximum and the reasonable charges of taking, keeping, and selling shall be charges not exceeding those at present by law allowed. They have not said that. Therefore, on the whole, although I think there is a good deal to be said for the contention as regards the protection of those upon whom these distresses are made, which seems to me a serious matter, I think that the case is strong enough to make one say, if Parliament has chosen in the latter Act to use the words "reasonable charges" without reference to the past or the limitation, we must consider that to be the law now, and therefore inferentially the earlier sections, so far as poor rate is concerned, have been repealed.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I think the only question we have to consider is whether the words of the operative part of the statute 12 & 13 Vict. are inconsistent with the continued existence of a statutory limit of the charges of these distresses which had previously existed. It seems to me it is inconsistent with there being a limit of maximum of charges to be charged to say that a man is to have his reasonable costs. The present case shows it. Here are costs which do exceed that maximum limit, and which are found to be in point of fact reasonable. It seems to me, therefore, that the second statute is necessarily inconsistent, not with the continued existence of the other statute as a whole, but of the other statute as applicable to the poor rate which is the subject of the sale.

Appeal dismissed.

REX v. JUDGE OF THE BIRMINGHAM COUNTY COURT AND ANOTHER; Ex parte ROGERS. (a)

County Courts—Jurisdiction—Specific performance—Sale of equity of redemption—Purchase money less than 500l.—Value of property exceeding 500l.—County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 67, sub-s. 4.

Sect. 67, sub-sect. 4, of the County Courts Act 1888 gives the County Court jurisdiction in actions for specific performance of any agreement for the sale or purchase of any property where the purchase money does not exceed 500l.

Held, that under this sub-section the County Court has jurisdiction to hear an action for specific performance of an agreement for the sale of an equity of redemption in any property where the actual purchase money agreed to be paid for such equity of redemption does not exceed 500l., although the property itself may be of a value exceeding 500l., or may be subject to a charge exceeding 500l., the test of the jurisdiction in such cases being, not the value of the property or the amount of the charge, but the actual amount of the purchase money to be paid.

RULE calling upon the judge of the Birmingham County Court and H. C. Humphreys, the defendant in a certain action in the County Court brought by one John Henry Rogers, to show cause why the judge should not proceed to hear and determine the matter of the action.

The action was one brought by John Henry Rogers, a chartered accountant in Birmingham, as trustee for the creditors of one Edward Clissold, against the defendant H. C. Humphreys, for specific performance of an agreement. The particulars of claim in the action set out that by an agreement made verbally at an interview on the 3rd Feb. 1903, the plaintiff, as trustee for the creditors of Edward Clissold, agreed to assign, and the defendant agreed to purchase, the interest of Edward Clissold in twelve leasehold houses erected in Newcombe-road, Handsworth, in the county of Stafford, numbered 231 to 253 (odd numbers), the agreed price being a sum sufficient to pay a composition of 3s. 6d. in the pound to the creditors of Edward Clissold, under and by virtue of a deed of assignment dated the 30th Jan. 1903, and the costs and expenses of the deed and the distribution of the composition.

The plaintiff claimed specific performance of the above agreement, and in the alternative damages, and in the further alternative the plaintiff claimed 19l. 10s. 3d., money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff, the particulars of this latter sum being rents of the houses from the 28th March to the 6th July 1903, 20l. 8s. 6d., less credit for rates 18s. 3d.—19l. 10s. 3d.

The plaintiff in his affidavit in support of the rule set out the following facts:—

On the 5th Nov. last the action came on for hearing before His Honour Judge Whiteborne, in Birmingham County Court.

The purchase money payable to the plaintiff under the agreement (specific performance of which was claimed in the particulars of claim) was admitted by both parties to amount to 76l. 1s.

Counsel for the defendant took the preliminary objection that the action was outside the jurisdiction of the County Court, on the ground that, although the purchase money payable to the plaintiff under the agreement sought to be enforced was only 76l. 1s., yet as the property sold for such sum was subject to certain equitable charges given by Clissold in favour of one Mr. Newcombe and another to the extent of about 1696l., this sum of 1696l. should be added to the purchase money for the purpose of deciding the question of jurisdiction under sect. 67, sub-sect. 4, of the County Courts Act 1888, and that if this were done the limit of 500l. prescribed by that section would be exceeded.

The plaintiff's counsel, in reply to that contention, opened so much of his case as was necessary to show the circumstances of the dispute so far as they touched the question of jurisdiction, and admitted the facts stated by the defendant's counsel—namely, that the purchase money payable to and recoverable by the plaintiff was 76l. 1s., and that the property agreed to be sold was subject to the equitable charge for 1696l.;

but he contended that, inasmuch as the amount of the purchase money which would pass from the purchaser to the vendor was only 76l. 1s., the case was clearly within the jurisdiction of the court.

The agreement between the parties was verbal, and the plaintiff relied on the part performance of the contract by the parties as taking the case out of the operation of sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds. The judge did not deal with that or with the other points in the case by reason of the above preliminary objection and his decision thereon. He gave judgment on the preliminary objection on the following day, and decided that he was bound in law to take into consideration not only the actual purchase money which would have passed between the parties, but also the charges subject to which the property was to be sold, even though neither the plaintiff nor the defendant would be liable therefor, and that he therefore held that the case was beyond his jurisdiction and refused to hear it.

The learned judge afterwards stated that he also decided that the proper course for him to adopt was to order that the action be transferred to the Chancery Division of the High Court pursuant to sect. 68 of the County Courts Act 1888, which he accordingly did, notwithstanding the protest of the plaintiff's counsel; and he also refused to hear the plaintiff's alternative claim for money had and received, and ordered that the whole action should be transferred as above described.

The County Courts Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43) provides:

Sect. 67. The court shall have and exercise all the powers and authority of the high court in the actions or matters hereinafter mentioned; (that is to say)

(4) For specific performance of or for the reforming, delivering up, or cancelling of any agreement for the sale, purchase, or lease of any property, where in the case of a sale or purchase the purchase money, or in the case of a lease the value of the property, shall not exceed the sum of five hundred pounds.

Henry Sutton, for the County Court judge showed cause against the rule.—The learned judge was right in refusing to hear the action. The question arises upon the construction of sect. 67, sub-sect. 4, of the County Courts Act 1888, and the ground upon which the judge refused to hear the action was that he came to the conclusion that on the facts the limit of the jurisdiction of the County Court (namely, 500l.) had been exceeded. The contract was a contract for the sale of the equity of redemption only, and the judge thought that, although the equity of redemption was only a small sum (76l.), yet that he had no jurisdiction because the whole value of the property far exceeded the limit of 500l. The word "purchase money" in sub-sect. 4, when used in a case like the present, is used in a technical sense, and does not mean the actual amount fixed or agreed upon for the sale of the equity of redemption, and does not mean the amount of the money appearing on the face of the contract; but the "purchase money" means the "purchase money" in the sense in which it is used in the Stamp Acts. This jurisdiction in actions for specific performance was originally given to County Courts by the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99), a. 1, and was extended by the County Courts Acts Amendment Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), s. 9; and at the time this jurisdiction was originally given the Stamp Act in force was the Stamp Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 59), and by sect. 10 of that Act, where any lands or other property were sold and conveyed subject to any mortgage or other debt, the mortgage money was to be deemed to be part of the "purchase or consideration money," whether agreed to be paid by the purchaser or not. So that at that time, when property was sold subject to a mortgage, the mortgage debt had to be added to the purchase money actually paid, to arrive at the "purchase money" upon which the stamp duty had to be paid. The wording of the Stamp Act on this point has been altered since that time, but it has been decided that when property is sold subject to a mortgage debt the ad valorem stamp duty is payable on the money actually paid, plus the mortgage debt. The corresponding Stamp Act in force when the County Courts Act 1888 was passed was the Stamp Act 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 97), and sect. 73 of that Act provided: "Where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in part, of any debt due to him, or subject either certainly or contingently to the payment or transfer of any money or stock, whether being or constituting a charge or incumbrance upon the property or not, such debt, money, or stock is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty." Those were the considerations upon which the judge relied in deciding as he did. The consideration for this contract would be, not the mere 76*l.* which was actually paid over, but that sum added to the amount of the charge upon the property, and that sum would far exceed the 500*l.* and therefore would be far beyond the County Court jurisdiction. That total sum would be the sum in respect of which the stamp duty would be payable upon the conveyance. All the questions of title which could be raised in an action for specific performance of an agreement for the sale of the whole property could be raised on a claim for specific performance of an agreement for the sale of the equity of redemption; and if an owner had a doubtful title he could mortgage the property for nearly its whole value, leaving a small sum in respect of the equity of redemption, and then, if the contention on the other side is right, by selling the equity of redemption for a small sum he could give the County Court jurisdiction, although the property itself might be worth a very large sum. The object of the statute was to confer upon the inferior court only a very limited jurisdiction in these matters, and therefore we ought to give such a meaning to the words "purchase money" as will carry out that object.

McCardie in support of the rule.—The County Court judge had jurisdiction to hear the case. All the risks that have been referred to are safeguarded by sect. 126 of the Act, because those who framed the Act assumed that cases of importance of this kind might arise, and sect. 126 was inserted to meet the difficulty. That section gives the High Court power to remove into the High Court any action or matter in the County Court if it is deemed desirable that the same shall be tried in the High Court. That power of removal by certiorari meets any difficulties of this kind that may arise. In sect. 67, sub-sect. 4, we find the distinction taken between the case of a sale of property and a lease of property, and whereas in the case of a lease of property what is taken as the test is "the value of the property," which must not exceed 500*l.*, in the case of a sale of the property what is taken as the test is, not the value of the property, but "the purchase money," and so long as the "purchase money" in the case of a sale does not exceed 500*l.*, the County Court is given jurisdiction. So that in the case of a sale and purchase the Act assumes that the parties themselves have fixed that which is to give the County Court jurisdiction. The word "purchase money" is to be taken in the ordinary sense of the term as the sum which is actually given or agreed to be given for the purchase. We have thus a clear test laid down as to that which is to give the County Court judge jurisdiction; and if any difficulty arises as to the amount or value of the property involved, there is always the remedy of removal by certiorari under sect. 126. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In effect, in such a case as the present, the County Court judge might be trying the title to property worth, say, 10,000*l.*] Yes, that is conceded, and the remedy for that is by certiorari under sect. 126. The sub-section itself lays down the test of the actual purchase money, and if we depart from that all kinds of difficulties arise, and in the present case the actual purchase money was 76*l.* The particulars of claim set out the agreement, specific performance of which is claimed, and in any event the judge was bound to try that part of the claim which was within his jurisdiction. He referred to sects. 57, 60, and 68, under which latter section the judge has power, during the hearing of the action, to transfer it to the Chancery Division, if it is made to appear that it exceeds the limit.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I can well understand the learned County Court judge raising the point that has been raised in this case. I think the case does call attention to what I will not call a defect, because it may very likely be right as to jurisdiction, but to a point which may require further consideration—namely, the question whether or not it was intended or is desirable that the County Court judge should have jurisdiction in a case where the subject of the contract, the purchase money of an equity of redemption, is below the 500*l.*, but the value of the property which is actually being transferred subject to a charge may be very much larger. It seems to me that in this question of undoubted difficulty the only safe guide and rule that we can follow is to give the best construction we can to the language of the section, by giving that language its natural construction, and that we ought not to put an artificial construction upon the section, unless we see that the consequences are such that we are driven to the conclusion that the Legislature has used the words in a limited sense. As has been pointed out by the learned counsel on each side, the section is a general section relating to all classes of property, and, including chattels as well as real property; therefore it is not specially directed to the cases in which the purchase money of land only would be the subject of consideration. The language of the sub-section is: "For specific performance of . . . any agreement for the sale, purchase, or lease of any property, where in the case of a sale or purchase the purchase money, or in the case of a lease the value of the property, shall not exceed the sum of five hundred pounds." It seems to me that as the section contemplates all kinds of property being sold, land, chattels, interests of all kinds, shares, choses in action, and so on, we must assume prima facie that the words "purchase money" refer to the price, and mean the purchase money for that which was the subject of the purchase and sale; and to a certain extent that view is fortified, though I do not think it is very materially fortified, by the following words, "or in the case of a lease the value of the property," being an especial exception where the Legislature could not ascertain, so to speak, any standard of purchase money. Under those circumstances, though it may be that indirectly the County Court has been given prima facie (subject, of course, to the power of removal under sect. 126) a jurisdiction in cases in which the questions will really affect property of a much larger value than 500*l.*, I do think it would not be safe to put an artificial construction on the words "purchase money," and that we must read those words as referring to that which was the actual purchase money of the subject matter of the contract sought to be specifically performed, or to be reformed or cancelled. The facts of this case show that what was being sold was the equity of redemption for 76*l.*, and that therefore the learned County Court judge had prima facie jurisdiction; and I think it is not immaterial, as has been pointed out, that there are powers of removal under sect. 126, which can be exercised if it should turn out that the interest in much more valuable property is at stake. I quite follow the line of argument which impressed the County Court judge, which counsel has very clearly brought before us, that for a long period of years, when property is sold subject to any charge, for the purposes of the Stamp Act and of the stamp duty the consideration or purchase money has been taken to be the total amount of the value of the property, including the charge. I do not, however, think that the statutes dealing with the stamp duty can be said to be in pari materia with the County Courts Act; but whether they be so or not, if it was intended to draw the distinction, I think it should have been done in clearer language than is used in this section, and I feel constrained to give the natural meaning to the words, "the purchase money," in construing the words, "where in the case of a sale or purchase the purchase money . . . shall not exceed the sum of five hundred pounds," and to say that the County Court judge had jurisdiction. I can quite understand his entertaining a doubt upon the matter, and I think we ought to give him assistance by saying that we are of opinion that in such a case as this the jurisdiction exists and ought to be exercised unless the case has been removed by certiorari. If it is thought that the result of our judgment is to give the County Courts a jurisdiction which they ought not to have, then the Act must be altered by amending it so as to make this matter clearer than the language of this present section makes it.

THE ARNE.

[ADM.]

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that there is nothing to guide us as to what the meaning of the Legislature is except the words they have used in this specific sub-section, because to my mind the Stamp Acts do not throw any light upon the present question. The Stamp Acts are Revenue Acts, and they are always, or generally, framed with a view to getting as much out of the subject as can possibly be got, and therefore it is very natural that they should use language which will cover the whole amount as the amount upon which duty is to be charged—namely, the whole value of property, including that sum by which its real value is diminished, which is the charge upon it. Therefore I do not feel that the Stamp Acts give us any assistance whatever in dealing with a case like the present. That being so, there is only one safe rule to apply in construing an Act of Parliament where we have nothing but the bare words to guide us, and that is to give those words their natural meaning. "Property" is a very large word, and certainly would include an equity of redemption, and I think if anybody were asked with respect to this transaction what property was being sold his answer would be the equity of redemption. And, moreover, that is made rather more clear by the use of the words "the purchase money." That means the purchase money for the property sold, and the reference to the purchase money makes the sum which has been agreed between the parties to be given the standard of what the property is worth—the property which is the subject of sale; and in that way it throws a reflected light upon the interpretation which ought to be given to "property." In my opinion, therefore, this really was a contract for the sale of the equity of redemption for 76*l.*, and the action is therefore within the jurisdiction of the County Court judge.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me very much as my brother Wills has put it, that the proper rule in this case is, as far as we can, to follow the natural and fair meaning of the words in their position as used in the sentence. Now, if anybody had said in this case "What money did you purchase the equity of redemption for?" he would have been told "76*l.*," and the section says that if the purchase money does not exceed a certain limit the County Court judge has jurisdiction. In this case, apparently, that limit was not reached.

provided: "The goods to be taken from the ship by the consignees (at their expense) immediately after arrival, and as fast as steamer can deliver or the same will be transhipped into lighters, or landed, or warehoused at the expense and risk of the proprietors of such goods." On arrival of the vessel the consignees neither took delivery nor did the master exercise his option of landing or lightering the goods.

In an action by the charterers against the consignees for damages for detention of the vessel: Held, that the plaintiffs were not deprived of their remedy because the master had not exercised his option as to landing or lightering the goods, and were entitled to recover.

Held, further, that the plaintiffs having made out a prima facie case of delay in taking delivery by the defendants, the onus was upon the defendants to show that the delay arose from no default on their part, and was due to the want of appliances in the port, and that they had failed to do so.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a judgment of the judge of the Swansea County Court in favour of the defendants.

The plaintiffs were Gebruder van Uden, of Rotterdam, the time charterers, and J. Roebe, the master of the steamship Arne, and claimed 51*l.* 5*s.* damages for detention of the steamship.

The defendants were W. Gilbertson and Co. Limited, the indorsees of bills of lading and consignees of the cargo.

The cargo was shipped in two parcels. The first parcel consisted of about 1078 tons of pig iron and 28 tons of old rails, and the second of about 910 tons of pig iron. It was shipped on board the Arne at Antwerp for Swansea by the same shipper in each case.

By the bills of lading, which were dated the 6th April and the 28th April 1903 respectively, it was stipulated:

The goods to be taken from the ship by the consignees (at their expense) immediately after arrival and as fast as steamer can deliver, or the same will be transhipped into lighters, or landed, or warehoused at the expense and risk of the proprietors of such goods. All goods consigned to "order" will be delivered upon the quay, or into lighters, or warehoused at the option of the agents of the steamer, such delivery to be for account and risk of owners of the goods.

The discharge took place out of the ship direct into railway trucks.

According to the admission of facts the respondents commenced to take delivery of the first consignment of cargo at 9 a.m. on Tuesday the 14th April, but did not complete taking delivery until 12 30 p.m. on Saturday, the 18th April, making altogether 99½ hours. The respondents commenced taking delivery of the second consignment of cargo at 7.45 a.m. on Monday, the 4th May, and completed taking delivery at 10 p.m. on Thursday, the 7th May, making 86½ hours in all.

The appellants contended that a reasonable time for taking delivery of the first consignment of cargo expired at noon on Thursday, the 16th April, and of the second consignment at noon on Wednesday, the 6th May. The appellants claimed two days at 15*l.* per day making 30*l.* as damages for the first voyage, and one day ten hours for the second voyage, making 21*l.* 5*s.*—51*l.* 5*s.* in all.

On the hearing of the appeal these damages were reduced to 41*l.*

The appellants alleged that their vessel was capable of delivering about 500 tons a day, and that the cause of the delay was that the defendants failed to see that a sufficient number of railway waggons were provided.

The respondents alleged that a reasonable amount to discharge per day based on averages in the case of previous steamers would be from 250 to 300 tons.

The learned County Court judge gave judgment for the defendants. His judgment was as follows:

I consider that the defendants are entitled to judgment on the construction of the clause in the bill of lading.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Meager for the appellants.—It is submitted the respondents did not on the arrival of either cargo take delivery within a reasonable time. The clause enabling the shipowners to land the goods is discretionary; it does not bind them to do so. It is inserted for their own protection, and their omission to do so is no answer to a claim for detention. As Lindley, L.J. put it in Hick v. Rodocanachi (65 L. T. Rep. at p. 303; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 100; (1891) 2 Q. B. at p. 632): "These clauses are obviously inserted in the interest and for the benefit of the shipowner, and they give him an additional remedy for the recovery of what is due to him, and not a remedy in substitution for any which he would have apart from these clauses. The master is under no obligation to land the goods and assert his lien instead of allowing the consignee to land them, and leaving him to be sued for the payments he ought to make. The master is empowered to do this, but he is under no obligation to exercise the power. He is the person to decide whether he will exercise it or not." The ship could have delivered 500 tons of cargo a day, and the consignees ought to have provided sufficient trucks. He also referred to the case of Modesto Piniro and Co. v. Dupré, 86 L. T. Rep. 560; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 297.

Balloch, for the respondents, contra.—If there was no unreasonable delay the shipowner has no cause of complaint, and if he had one he could by exercising the power given him by the bill of lading compel the consignees to take delivery as there provided. The ordinary course of delivery is into railway trucks, and the evidence goes to show that under this method only 200 to 300 tons of cargo could be received per day. The supply of trucks is dependant on the railway company, over whom the respondents have no efficient control. The words "as fast as steamer can deliver" only mean as fast as the facilities of the port where delivery is taken will allow of:

Wyllie v. Harrison, 13 Sess. Ca. (4th), 92.

In that case the vessel had been chartered to carry iron ore "to Glasgow General Terminus or Queen's Dock, in charterer's option," and then "deliver as customary." It was also provided by the charter-party, "cargo to be discharged as fast as steamer can deliver after being berthed." At the general terminus the customary mode of discharge was into trucks, and the only trucks permitted were those of the Caledonian and North British Railway Companies. The Court of Session held the charterers were not responsible for the delay caused by want of trucks. As the Lord Justice-Clerk (Lord Moncreiff) said: "The place of delivery may be a port which is subject to regulations which are not within the powers of the charterer, and which must be complied with before delivery can be given at all. Where these regulations, which are incorporated into the charter-party, provide that goods shall not be laid down on the quay, but put into trucks, I think the whole obligation of delivery is subject to the possible contingency of trucks being available." This decision was approved by the Court of Appeal in Good v. Isaacs (67 L. T. Rep. 450; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; (1892) 2 Q. B. 555). There a vessel with a cargo of fruit went into a fruit berth, but the cranes which had to be used for the discharge were under the control of Government officials, who refused to allow them to be used at once. It was held that the charterers were not liable for the delay. See also Hulthen v. Stewart, 88 L. T. Rep. 702; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; (1903) A. C. 389.

In The Jaederen (68 L. T. Rep. 266; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 260; (1892) P. 351) the vessel was "to be discharged as fast as she can deliver." The custom of the port was then imported into the contract, and the defendants succeeded because the plaintiffs failed to make out any breach of the contract to discharge as fast as the ship could deliver. In Lyle Shipping Company v. Cardiff Corporation (83 L. T. Rep. 329; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 128; (1902) 2 Q. B. 638) it was held that as the charterers had done their best to obtain sufficient waggons for the railway company they were not liable. Smith, L.J. expressed the opinion (83 L. T. Rep., at p. 333; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 133; (1900) 2 Q. B., at p. 643) that it did not matter whether the words "as customary" were in the contract or not, "for if not they would be implied." He also referred to Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 42 L. T. Rep. 845; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 5 App. Cas. 599; Carver on Carriage by Sea, 3rd edit., sect. 619 (a).

Meager in reply.—It is really a question of fact whether delivery was taken within a reasonable time or not under the circumstances:

Metcalfe v. Thompson, 18 Times L. Rep. 706.

The PRESIDENT.—I thought at first that we had not the materials before us for deciding the whole of the case; but, on considering the matter carefully, it seems to me that we are in a position to deal with it as it stands. I have no doubt that the learned judge's decision was based on the view that on the true construction of the bill of lading the shipowners had their remedy, and their sole remedy, in the power to land the goods on the quay or in lighters if they were not taken away by the consignees. In addition to the words "I consider that the defendants are entitled to judgment on the construction of the clause in the bill of lading," the learned judge says that counsel for the plaintiffs contends that that condition was optional, showing that what he based his decision on was, not that there was no right of action in the case, but that the sole remedy for a breach of the condition as to taking delivery was in the terms provided by the bill of lading. I am unable to agree with the learned judge that that view is correct. It seems to me clear that the words in the bill of lading do not take away the ordinary right of bringing an action if the terms of the bill of lading are departed from. It seems to me that it would be unreasonable to say that the landing of these goods was the sole remedy. Supposing the sole cause of the non-delivery was that the trucks were not ready, it would be hard to throw upon the master the responsibility of saying that the delay was so great that he could not allow it to continue; and, on the other hand, if the trucks could not be supplied by the railway company, I am by no means sure that the hardship would not be on the consignees of the goods. It would be far more reasonable to say that the ordinary remedy of the shipowner remained the same, but that he had an alternative option which he could have exercised. In this case he does not seem to have exercised it, and I do not think the learned judge was right in holding that that debarred him from bringing an action to enforce his ordinary rights under the bill of lading. Then comes the question whether or not we are able under the circumstances to enter judgment for the plaintiffs. I think we are, because what is said now is that judgment ought not to be entered for the plaintiffs because there is some defence which the defendants either have set up or might have set up. I do not know that they might not possibly have raised in the court below a defence other than that which they have raised; but in the court below they did raise the defence as to the non-supply of trucks by the railway company, and clearly also raised a further defence—namely, that they were justified in taking the average quantity of goods discharged per day of similar cargoes as a test of their own obligations under the bill of lading—and I think it is too late for them now to come forward and say that a totally different defence might have been raised. It appears to me clear that no such defence ought to be successful. The plaintiffs showed, without contradiction, what the capacity of their steamer was, and then it was shown further that the delay arose from the dearth of waggons. That, I think, made out a prima facie case in favour of the plaintiffs. It may well be that the obligation of the consignee was to take delivery as fast as the steamer could deliver, having regard to the mode of delivery and the state of the appliances with which delivery could be taken; but then if their answer was that they had done all they could, and that the delay arose from no default on their part, and that they did everything on their part, then they ought to have shown that. It was upon them to do so. But the moment the plaintiffs showed that but for the want of waggons they could have delivered at a certain rate, then, if the defendants could have shown that by no fault of theirs, but by the fault of other people, such as the want of railway trucks, the delay was caused, it would have been a different matter; but they did not attempt to show that. I do not agree that the question of average quantity was material here, though, in taking into consideration what the steamer could do, you have to consider the actual state of things—the appliances of the port, and the mode of delivery; still, that does not relieve the defendants from their liability to show that they have done all they could, and that it was not their fault. A prima facie case is made out against them, and there is no answer either set up, or which, to my mind, can be set up, to meet the case of the plaintiffs. In these circumstances I am prepared to give judgment for the plaintiffs. The figures work out at 41l. as the amount, on the plaintiffs' evidence, which they are entitled to recover. I think, therefore, the proper course will be to reverse the judgment of the court below, and give judgment for the plaintiffs.

BARNES, J.—I agree with the learned President as to the construction of the bill of lading, and also, on the facts, I think with him that the plaintiffs made a prima facie case of non-acceptance or non-taking of delivery from the ship by the consignees, immediately after arrival, as fast as steamer can deliver, whether the words "as customary" are implied or omitted. They made a prima facie case that they were ready to deliver, and to deliver easily at a rate which they say could have been exceeded. No answer is made to that by the defendants upon the facts. No explanation is given, and there is nothing to show that they could not have discharged the ship as fast as customary, assuming those words to be inserted in the bill of lading. All that they have done is to attempt to set up a case of delivery of average quantities of similar cargoes, the contracts respecting which are not dealt with in the evidence before us, and there is an attempt to make out a case of a fair and reasonable amount. They do not seem to have answered the prima facie case made out by the plaintiffs, and, therefore, I agree that there should be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Port of Liverpool—Vessel proceeding through the port to Manchester—8 Anne, c. 8—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Acts 1858 and 1899 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 92 and 62 & 63 Vict. c. 172)—Upper Mersey Navigation Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 104) ss. 4, 51—Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 188)—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 605, 633.

Pilotage is compulsory on a vessel inward bound from the sea through the port of Liverpool to Manchester until she enters the Ship Canal at Eastham.

Sect. 128 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 requires that "the pilot in charge of any inward bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at anchor in the river Mersey, and shall pilot the same into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool."

The fact that a vessel anchors for the purpose of waiting for the tide does not put an end to the compulsory services of the pilot.

(a; Reported by CHRISTOPHER HEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Seamble, pilotage is also compulsory on vessels going out from Eastham through the port of Liverpool to the sea.

ACTION for damage by collision brought by the owners of the Swedish steamship Bifrost against the owners of the steamship Mercedes de Larrinaga.

The Bifrost was a steamship of 2122 tons gross register, and at the time of the collision was on a voyage from Skutskar to Manchester with a general cargo on board, and manned by a crew of twenty-five hands all told. The Mercedes de Larrinaga was a steamship of 4154 tons gross register, and was on a voyage from Galveston to Manchester with a cargo of cotton, and manned by a crew of thirty-four hands all told. While on her way up the Mersey she stopped and anchored in order to wait for the tide before entering the Eastham Docks.

The collision occurred in the Eastham Channel, river Mersey, near the No. 4 buoy. Both vessels at the time were in charge of pilots.

Barnes, J. came to the conclusion on the facts that the collision was caused by the negligent navigation of the Mercedes de Larrinaga, and held that the fault was that of the pilot alone.

The defendants alleged that the pilot was compulsorily in charge at the time, and that they were not therefore liable for the collision.

The material sections of the various Acts of Parliament dealing with the question are as follows:

By sect. 3 of 8 Anne, c. 8—an Act for making a convenient dock or basin at Liverpoole for the security of all ships trading to and from the said port of Liverpoole—the limits of the port are defined as:

The limits and extent whereof are as far as a certain place in Hoyle-Lake called the Redstones, and from thence all over the river Mersey to Warrington and Frodsham Bridges.

Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 92):

Sect. 118. The board shall have the whole and sole regulation and management of pilots and of pilot boats, and of the pilotage annuity fund, and one of the committees to be appointed by them under or by virtue of the powers vested in them by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1857, and of this Act, shall consist of not less than twelve persons, who shall be called the pilotage committee.

Sect. 121. The board may examine any person, being of the age of eighteen years and upwards, who shall have served as an apprentice in any of the Liverpool pilot boats for not less than three years . . . and every such apprentice or other person who upon any such examination shall be found to be qualified to act as a pilot, and shall be approved of by the board, shall receive a licence in writing, signed by the secretary of the board, certifying that he is duly qualified to act as a pilot for the port of Liverpool.

Sect. 123 provides for a penalty on persons acting as pilots without a licence.

Sect. 124 provides that pilots misbehaving themselves are to have their licences recalled.

Sect. 125. If any pilot, after being personally required, or after a proper signal shall be made by the master of any inward bound vessel, shall refuse to take the charge of such vessel . . . or shall without reasonable cause refuse to afford any extraordinary assistance required by the master of any vessel in distress from the boat of such pilot or the crew thereof, such pilot shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty of not exceeding ten pounds, and may, at the discretion of the board, be deprived of his licence.

Sect. 127. Every pilot taking upon himself the charge of any vessel shall, if so required by the master thereof, pilot such vessel, if sailing out of the port of Liverpool, through the Queen's Channel, so far to the westward as the buoy commonly called or known by the name of the Formby North-west Buoy, or Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel; and, if sailing through the Rock Channel, pilot the same so far to the westward as the north-west buoy of Hoyle; and any pilot who shall in any case refuse to pilot such vessel to such distances as aforesaid shall forfeit his right to receive any sum of money for piloting such vessel, and may also at the discretion of the board be deprived of his licence.

Sect. 128. The pilot in charge of any inward bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at anchor in the river Mersey, and shall pilot the same into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool, whether belonging to the board or not, without making any additional charge for so doing, unless his attendance shall be required on board such vessel while at anchor in the river Mersey, and before going into dock, in which case he shall be entitled to receive five shillings per day for such attendance.

Sect. 130. In case the master of an inward bound vessel, other than a coasting vessel in ballast or under the burthen of one hundred tons, shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, such pilot having offered his services for that purpose, such master shall pay to such pilot, or if more than one then to the first of such pilots who shall have offered his services, the full pilotage rates which would have been payable to him if he had actually piloted such vessel into the port of Liverpool.

Sect. 133. The board may from time to time determine, vary, and alter and fix rates of pilotage to be paid to pilots for piloting vessels, such rates to be according to the draught of water of such vessels, and to be within the limits following—that is to say, . . .

Sect. 138. If the master of any vessel shall require the attendance of a pilot on board any vessel during her riding at anchor, or being at Hoylake, or in the river Mersey, the pilot so employed shall be paid for every day or portion of a day he shall so attend the sum of five shillings and no more; provided that the pilot who shall have the charge of any vessel shall be paid for every day of his attendance whilst in the river; but no such charge shall be made for the day on which such vessel, being outward bound, shall leave the river Mersey to commence her voyage, or being inward bound shall enter the river Mersey.

Mersey Docks (Pilotage, &c.) Act 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 172).

Sect. 3. Where a vessel outward bound from the port of Liverpool calls at any stage in the river Mersey to the northward of an imaginary straight line drawn from the Dingle Point on the Lancashire shore of the Mersey to the New Ferry Slip on the Cheshire shore or anchors or moors in the river to the northward of such line . . . the duties of the pilot shall extend to and include the taking her to and from and attending her at every such stage or mooring.

Sect. 4. The duties of a pilot in charge of any vessel inward bound shall extend to and include the taking her to and from and attending her to any stage, anchorage, or mooring in the river Mersey to the northward of the imaginary line hereinbefore mentioned to which she may go for the purpose of discharging any passengers, crew, animals, or cargo, or while waiting for tide or weather, or otherwise for any purpose incidental to the voyage before entering any wet dock, and the obligation of the master to employ a pilot when inward bound shall extend to and include an obligation to employ a pilot to perform the duties above mentioned.

Sect. 5. When a vessel is neither inward bound nor outward bound the master shall be obliged to employ a pilot (a) For her navigation or movement. Provided, further, that this section shall not apply to any vessel when passing to or from any place lying to the northward of the said imaginary line from or to (i.) Garston Weston Point or Ellesmere Port; (ii.) any of the Manchester Ship Canal Company's docks at Runcoorn; (iii.) any dock, quay, or wharf lying to the southward of the said imaginary line and being within the jurisdiction of the Upper Mersey Commissioners.

Schedule.—Pilotage rates.—(2) In the case of vessels referred to in the section of this Act of which the marginal note is "Pilots to be employed when moving vessel in the river," for each time a vessel is navigated or moved in the river Mersey northward of the imaginary line hereinbefore mentioned, a sum not exceeding . . . 2s.

Upper Mersey Navigation Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 104):

Sect. 4. This Act shall apply to that part of the river Mersey lying between an imaginary straight line drawn across that river from the Eastham Ferry Slip to a point on the north-east bank of that river distant twenty chains measured along that bank in a south-easterly direction from the lighthouse at Garston, and another imaginary straight line drawn across the river at a place called Bank Quay in Warrington in the county of Lancaster, and which part of the river Mersey is in this Act referred to as the Upper Mersey.

Sect. 51. Saving always and reserving to the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board . . . all their several and respective rights and interests, in as full and ample a manner as they or any of them could or might have held or enjoyed the same if this Act had not been passed, except so far as by this Act is declared.

Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 188):

Sect. 3. From and after the completion and opening for traffic of the canal by this Act authorised the said canal and so much of the navigable waters of the rivers Mersey and Irwell as lie between Hunt's Bank in the township and parish of Manchester and the limit of the port of Liverpool at Warrington, and all channels, canals, cuts, docks, and works of the company within those limits shall be and are hereby constituted the harbour and port of Manchester, and the company shall be the harbour authority of that harbour and port.

Sect. 211. Nothing in this Act shall take away, alter, or prejudicially affect any power, jurisdiction, or authority of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60):

Sect. 605 (1). The master and owner of any ship passing through any pilotage district in the United Kingdom on a voyage between two places both situate out of that district shall be exempted from any obligation to employ a pilot in that district, or to pay pilotage rates when not employing a pilot within that district. (2) The exemption under this section shall not apply to ships loading or discharging at any place situate within the district or at any place situate above the district on the same river or its tributaries.

Sect. 633. An owner or master of a ship shall not be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law.

The following is the "Notice to Pilots" issued by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board:

Piloting of vessels inward bound.—The pilots are hereby reminded that it is the duty of the pilot in charge of any inward bound vessel to pilot her into some one of the wet docks within the port, whether belonging to the board or not, without making any additional fee for so doing. Note.—Wet docks within the port include (inter alia) the docks at Garston and the locks to the Ship Canal at Eastham. If, before pilotage is completed, a master wishes to supersede the pilot, the pilot must warn the master that he and any unqualified person he may intend to employ will be committing a pilotage offence, and the pilot must also distinctly offer to complete his pilotage services. If the master still persists, the pilot must then take such course as he may deem best, and report the circumstances at the first possible opportunity.—By order, (Signed) MILES K. BURTON, General Manager and Secretary, Dock Office, Liverpool, July 22, 1902.

Evidence was called from which it appeared that the river Irwell, which enters the canal at Woden-street Bridge, is absorbed into the river Mersey at Mersey Weir. The Manchester Docks are on a portion of the river which has availed itself of the bed of the Irwell, and the docks are entirely supplied by water from that river.

Aspinall, K.C. and Noad for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted that the port of Manchester, as it is connected with the port of Liverpool by a canal, is not situated "on the same river or its tributaries" within the meaning of sect. 605 (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. The case is not covered by the provisions of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, because that Act only deals with vessels inward bound to or outward bound from the port of Liverpool. The terminus must be the port of Liverpool, and beyond that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board have no power to impose terms. If the terms "outward bound" and "inward bound" were given their unfettered meaning they would include vessels bound to Manchester and far beyond the limits of the port of Liverpool. The intention of the Act of 1858 was to deal with the class of larger vessel which did not, and could not at the time the Act was passed, go beyond Liverpool. The sections form a complete code based on the requirements of the port of Liverpool, and it is submitted none of the provisions apply when the port is not used for business purposes. As soon as the Mercedes de Larrinaga came to anchor the duties of the pilot were at an end:

The Servia and Carinthia, 78 L. T. Rep. 54; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 353; (1898) P. 36.

The Mercedes de Larrinaga anchored when she was to the northward of the imaginary line laid down in sect. 3 of the Mersey Docks (Pilotage, &c.) Act 1899. She was not proceeding to a wet dock, for she was out of the region of wet docks, and therefore the compulsory services of the pilot were at an end as soon as she had come to anchor. The Eastham Locks cannot be said to be in any sense a wet dock. Wet docks must mean docks of such a nature that they can be used for loading and discharging cargo in or repairing ships. It is a straining of words to say the locks could be a wet dock. The Legislature has expressly granted exemptions to vessels passing through pilotage districts. See sect. 605 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 and sect. 5 of the Mersey Docks (Pilotage, &c.) Act 1899. The whole scheme of the latter Act deals with vessels to the northward of the imaginary line laid down in sect. 3. The pilot can refuse to take the vessel on any further, or if he does take her on he is entitled to demand further payment. The case is within the principles laid down in The Charlton (73 L. T. Rep. 49; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29). In that case and the earlier case of General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (20 L. T. Rep. 581; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 237; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238) it was held that the owners were not responsible for the fault of the pilot because at the time of the collision it was not established that the relationship of master and servant existed at the time of the collision between the owners and the pilot. Sect. 5 of the Act of 1899 deals with a vessel that is being moved within the limits of the port—that is to say, northward of the imaginary line there laid down. The area of the pilot's duties in The Charlton (ubi sup.) went much further than this. Unless an Act of Parliament says so in clear language the courts are always slow to say that there is an obligation to take a pilot. The obligation in this case ceases when there are no longer any wet docks, and when these have been passed there cannot be any.

Pickford, K.C. and Dawson Miller, for the defendants, contra.—According to the plaintiffs' contention if a ship bound to Manchester arrives off the bar at a time when she may get through to the Eastham Locks without having to stop and anchor for the tide then she is under compulsory pilotage, but if she does stop and anchor, then pilotage is not compulsory after she has come to anchor. Sect. 128 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 is not a complete code of the duties of the pilot. All that it provides is that the pilot shall move and take a vessel into a wet dock. The works at Eastham are a wet dock within the meaning of the Act. See the notice to pilots issued by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. As an inward bound vessel the Mercedes de Larrinaga was bound to take a pilot, and she was no less an inward bound vessel because she was bound through the port. Mere temporary anchorage does not put an end to the terms of service on which the pilot is employed:

The Rigborgs Minde, 49 L. T. Rep. 232; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 123; 8 P. Div. 132.

If the plaintiffs' contention is right, the words "inward bound" must be limited to a vessel bound to a wet dock in the port of Liverpool. The code can only be a complete one as far as compulsion goes. They also referred to

The Maria, 16 L. T. Rep. 717; L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 358;

The Annapolis, 4 L. T. Rep. 417; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 69; Lush. 295;

The London Gazette, Jan. 2, 1894, setting out the Treasury warrant of Nov. 21, 1893, defining the limits of the port of Manchester.

Aspinall in reply.—The works at Eastham were expressly taken out of the limits of the port of Liverpool by sect. 3 of the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885, and therefore the locks cannot be said to be a wet dock within the limits of the port of Liverpool.

BARNES, J.—This case is one which one may say bristles with points, and in giving my judgment I have to deal with it in the way it stands and after such argument as I have had. I feel, however, that there may be some points which may have escaped my attention, and possibly the attention of counsel, too. My opinion of the case has been come to upon the argument which I have had, and I now proceed to deliver it. The collision in this case took place between the Bifrost and the Mercedes de Larrinaga on Monday, the 21st Dec. last, in the Eastham Channel of the river Mersey, near a buoy which is marked No. 4 on the chart. I think it is the last buoy in coming in towards Eastham before the Eastham Ferry is reached. Of course, the place where this collision took place is material. Both the vessels were proceeding to the Eastham Locks on the way to Manchester, and both of them were in charge of duly licensed Liverpool pilots. The conclusion of fact to which I came on hearing the case, with the assistance of the Elder Brethren, was that so far as the navigation was concerned the Mercedes de Larrinaga was alone to blame for the collision, and that the fault was the fault only of her pilot, and as the defendants, the owners of the Mercedes de Larrinaga, had pleaded a plea of compulsory pilotage, the point was then raised as to whether, the fault having been the fault of the pilot alone, he was compulsorily in charge of the ship so as to exclude the owners from responsibility. Therefore the question now to be determined is whether the pilot of the Mercedes de Larrinaga was compulsorily in charge of the ship. The main point that was made on behalf of the plaintiffs was that a vessel inward bound from the sea to Manchester, viâ the Ship Canal, is not subject to compulsory pilotage in the port of Liverpool. That is a point of very considerable importance, because it appears to me that it affects the whole question of pilotage of ships, other than coasting vessels in ballast or under 100 tons burden, inward bound from the sea to Manchester, viâ the Ship Canal, and that, although not directly, yet indirectly, it practically touches upon the question of pilotage of vessels outward bound from Manchester, viâ the Ship Canal, to sea. The place which I have mentioned as being the place of the collision is in the port of Liverpool. I noticed—this was one of the reasons for further discussion—on looking at the plan of the Manchester Ship Canal and river Mersey, that there is a line to distinguish the limits of the powers of the Upper Navigation Commissioners, and drawn across the river from Eastham Ferry to a point above Garston. But that does not affect this case at all, because I have been informed by counsel that practically those powers deal with the buoying and so forth of part of the Mersey which is in the port of Liverpool. Then, again, there is another line drawn across the same map from a point on the Lancashire side called Dungeon Point to a point on the opposite side called Ince Ferry—one side being in the port of Liverpool and the other in the port of Manchester, and that, I understand, is only a line drawn for Customs purposes, and does not affect the question in this case at all. The point that has to be considered turns principally, if not entirely, on the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act of 1858. Now, one of the early Acts relating to the port of Liverpool is the statute of 8 Anne, c. 8, and the port is there defined in sect. 3. [His Lordship then read the section.] I need not concern myself with Frodsham, because, if I understand rightly, that is on the Weaver. So that the port includes the whole of the river Mersey from the sea, according to this definition, up to Warrington. One of the contentions that was made in this case was in connection with the suggestion that Eastham Locks at the end of the canal might be treated as in the port of Liverpool, and as a wet dock in the port of Liverpool. But, since the matter was first discussed, it was yesterday pointed out that the Manchester Ship Canal Act of 1885 has made a difference about this, because sect. 3 of that Act is as follows: [His Lordship then read the section.] I do not know what that latter proviso really preserves. It is suggested by Mr. Pickford that, notwithstanding the provision that the canal is in the port of Manchester, it still remains in the port of Liverpool for certain purposes, because of the proviso that "nothing in this Act shall be deemed to affect any of the rights or privileges of the port or harbour of Liverpool," &c. It seems to me difficult to construe exactly what this was intended to do, but I can hardly regard that which is part of the port of Manchester as still being within the port of Liverpool. There is another section which was referred to in the Manchester Ship Canal Act of 1885—namely, the 211th section. I do not myself at present see that that section really affects the present question. Now, the sections of the Mersey Dock Act of 1858 which bear directly upon the present question come under part 6 of the Act, which is headed, "With respect to pilots and pilot boats"; and the sections which deal with inward bound vessels were considered by me in the case of The Servia and Carinthia (ubi sup.). Some of those sections cover the cases both of inward and outward bound vessels, and some only relate to outward bound vessels. Considering for the moment that I am dealing with an inward bound vessel, the sections that are material are the 121st, which gives power to the board to licence persons to act as pilots for the port of Liverpool, the 123rd, which imposes a penalty upon any person who shall pilot any vessel into or out of the port of Liverpool without a licence, and the 124th section, which imposes penalties upon any pilot who shall refuse to take charge of any inward bound vessel upon a proper signal being made for a pilot, and of any outward bound vessel upon the request of the master thereof. Those sections apply to both inward and outward bound ships, but the 125th section applies only to inward bound ships. That section imposes a penalty upon any pilot refusing to conduct an inward bound vessel. I think that clearly refers to a vessel bound from sea into the port of Liverpool, having regard to the terms of the 123rd section. The 128th section is as follows—and this gives rise to one of the arguments addressed to me—"The pilot in charge of any inward bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at anchor in the river Mersey and shall pilot the same into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool, whether belonging to the board or not, without making any additional charge for so doing, unless his attendance shall be required on board such vessel while at anchor in the river Mersey and before going into dock, in which case he shall be entitled to receive 5s. per day for such attendance." Sect. 130 provides that in case the master of any inward bound vessel other than a coasting vessel in ballast, or under the burden of 100 tons, shall refuse to take on board or employ a pilot, such pilot having offered his services for the purpose, such master shall pay the full pilotage as if the vessel had been piloted into the port of Liverpool. That, again, clearly applies to inward bound ships coming in from the sea, and coming into the port of Liverpool. Sect. 133 gives power to the board to fix rates for pilotage as stated in it. There are rates for piloting distances from Great Orme's Head to the port of Liverpool, at not less than 5s. and not more than 8s. per foot, according to the draught of water, and from any greater distance into the port of Liverpool at not less than 6s., nor more than 9s. per foot. Those are the sections which I think deal with the inward bound ships, and it has been held that under those sections vessels, other than the small coasting vessels which are referred to, are obliged to employ pilots coming into the port of Liverpool; and, as I have already said, the principal question in the case is whether the present case comes within those sections. I think it is desirable to refer to the sections which apply to outward bound vessels, because they throw light upon the "inward bound" sections. The 1st section which deals more particularly with the outward bound vessels in addition to those I have already referred to, which seem to cover and deal also with the case of inward bound vessels, is the 127th, which specifies the distance to which vessels are to be piloted when they are sailing out of the port of Liverpool. It makes no mention of where the pilot is to take charge. I have had already to refer to the 126th section. It does not matter very much in this case. The next section which deals with outward bound vessels is the 133rd, which gives, again, power to the board to fix rates for pilotage, and gives the rates for piloting a vessel out of the port of Liverpool. The 139th section also deals with the case of outward bound ships, and in that the provision is that in case the master of any vessel being outward bound and not being a coasting vessel in ballast, or under the burden of 100 tons, for which provision is otherwise made, shall proceed to sea and shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, he shall pay the full pilotage rates. Those seem to be the material sections which deal with both inward and outward bound vessels, and I think it is to be observed in fact that generally the wording of the sections does not confine them to vessels which are bound to or from Liverpool. I am now using them in a general sense, but I think if all the sections are examined that general sense, which is one which pervades them, is that those sections deal with vessels which are either coming out of or going into the port of Liverpool, without saying what is to become of those vessels after they have come into the port of Liverpool, or where they are to start from in the port of Liverpool. There seems no doubt that the general effect of those sections is that every vessel, with the exception of the small vessels which are dealt with otherwise, coming into the port of Liverpool is bound to take a pilot; and so also it seems to me that every vessel outward bound which goes out of the port of Liverpool is bound to take a pilot for that purpose, although that is not a point which has to be determined in this case. The view which I take of the broad point put forward by the plaintiffs is that the pilotage is not to be confined to vessels which simply come out of some dock or anchorage through the port of Liverpool, or are bound into some dock or anchorage in the port of Liverpool; because it seems to me to make no difference with regard to these sections whether the vessel, after having come into the port of Liverpool, passes into some other jurisdiction which is not to be treated as being in the port of Liverpool. I cannot help thinking that that is the correct view to take of these sections, although, of course, it is obvious that one is applying these sections to a state of things which did not exist at the time when the Act of 1858 came into force. Whatever the view which may be entertained about compulsory pilotage, and I am quite aware that many people object altogether to the law of compulsory pilotage as administered in England, I am not here to express an opinion upon such a question. It is urged that it would be better to allow ships to be navigated by their masters and officers, and that although it might be desirable to compel them to employ a pilot and have him on board for the purpose of advice, yet it is not a satisfactory state of things that he should take charge, and they should be compelled to leave him in charge. Whichever view is the correct view to take as to what is advantageous, the law is that the pilotage is compulsory; and again, whichever view you take about it, whether it is to be compulsory in the sense that he is in charge, or only in the sense that he is put on board as adviser, the general consideration for having a pilot on board at all applies with equal force for the purpose of navigation, whether the ship is coming simply into a dock, or anchorage in any port of the river Mersey which is in the port of Liverpool, or whether she is going through the same waters and afterwards going on to Manchester. The difficulties of navigation are precisely the same, and the advantage of having someone on board who knows the locality is precisely the same in each case. So my conclusion with regard to this first point, this main point, is that the Mercedes de Larrinaga, was compelled to take a pilot into the port of Liverpool. The next contention which the plaintiffs put forward was based on sect. 605 of the Merchant Shipping Act. They contended that this vessel was passing through a pilotage district between two places outside that district—namely, the sea on the one hand and the port of Manchester on the other. I am not quite sure whether that section strictly applies where the employment is not compulsory in the district in the sense in which the matter was discussed yesterday; because in some cases one finds that the pilotage is made compulsory for a district, and in others, like this Mersey case, one finds it is made compulsory on ships doing certain things—namely, moving in or out. But if the first part of the section does apply then the question would be whether the exemption under the section does or does not apply to this ship, because she was discharging at a place situate above the district on the same river or its tributaries. Now, one has with regard to this question to look at the facts, and I have had evidence which shows this state of things—first of all that the Irwell is a tributary of the Mersey. The Irwell pours its waters into the Manchester Ship Canal Docks at Manchester, and the waters then run down to a place where the Mersey joins the canal, and I understand that the canal really

THE MERCEDES DE LARRINAGA.

[ADM.]

THE MERCEDES DE LARRINAGA.

[ADM.]

[ADM.]

THE MERCEDES DE LARRINAGA.

[ADM.]

runs along the old bed of the Irwell till it joins the Mersey. Then the waters of the Mersey and the Irwell run on together until they come in the canal to a place called Rixton Junction, where they pour out into the Mersey as it still exists, and the only water which goes on down the canal from that point is the water which is used for lockage purposes. This matter was dealt with by the engineer of the Ship Canal, who was called as a witness by the plaintiffs. The effect of that is to leave the Manchester Docks as situate on a tributary of the river Mersey, and the result is that this vessel was going to discharge at a place above the port of Liverpool on a tributary of the river Mersey, and so it seems to me that the exemption which is referred to in the 605th section cannot be brought into force. In fact, Mr. Aspinall, who argued the case for the plaintiffs, although he contended that the 605th section applied, was candid enough to admit that he did not think there was any argument of weight which would support that contention. The third point is a minor point, but one of very considerable difficulty, and is this: If a vessel bound in from sea into the port of Liverpool is bound to take a pilot into the port, yet in a case like the present, where the ship anchored before she got to Eastham, the compulsory service then comes to an end. Of course this argument assumes that there was compulsion to begin with, as I have already held. In this case the vessel anchored off Laird's yard, which is, if I remember rightly, just a little above the Woodside Ferry, and she did so to await a suitable tide, in order to go on to Eastham. I think, speaking from recollection of the evidence, that the plaintiffs' vessel did something of a similar character. Both vessels had to anchor for a similar object, and the collision happened afterwards when they were going up to the entrance to the Eastham Locks. The point made about this is made under the 128th section of the Act of 1858, and the point is that the compulsory services ceased so soon as the vessel came to an anchor, because it is said that that section only requires a pilot to moor a ship at anchor in the Mersey and to pilot her into one of the wet docks of the port of Liverpool, whether belonging to the board or not, without making any additional charge for doing so. The argument was that as she was brought to anchor in the river Mersey the compulsory pilotage finished, because she was not going on to a wet dock in the port of Liverpool, and therefore the pilot had nothing more to do. The way in which that argument was met by the defendants at first was this: That the ship was bound to a dock in the port of Liverpool, because the Eastham Locks might be treated as being a wet dock within the port of Liverpool. But that now seems rather to be got rid of by the section of the Manchester Ship Canal Act, which seems to make the end of the canal within the port of Manchester. I think if this case were to turn simply upon the construction of sect. 128 it would be very difficult to say that this was a wet dock within the port of Liverpool, within the meaning of that section, although the term wet dock might not unreasonably in such circumstances be held, according to the definition in the dictionaries and so forth, to include a place which admitted ships and then excluded the tide if required. But the argument for the plaintiffs was further supported by reference to the case of The Servia and Carinthia (ubi sup.), to which I have already referred, and it was contended that the decision in that case had the effect of showing that compulsory services must in such a case as this come to an end at any rate when the vessel anchored. I remember that case very well, and I have also read the judgment in it, and it does not, in my opinion, really determine the case in the way the plaintiffs contend, because the question there was as to additional remuneration in circumstances which are stated shortly in the headnote to that case. The headnote is as follows: "The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, as the pilotage authority for the port of Liverpool, has under sect. 221 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 power to fix, in addition to the ordinary compulsory pilotage rates, a reasonable charge by way of 'extra' remuneration for a pilot licensed by the board taking an outward bound vessel from a dock alongside a landing stage to complete her loading, as in the case of embarking passengers, their baggage, and the mails. The board has also power to fix an additional charge as extra remuneration (besides the charge per day for attendance whilst a vessel is necessarily lying in the river in the course of her navigation inward or outward) in the case of an inward bound vessel taken by a pilot to a landing stage to land passengers, baggage, and mails, before discharging the rest of her cargo, including the case of vessels disembarking cattle and sheep at certain landing stages in pursuance of the orders made under the provisions of the Diseases of Animals Act 1894. Semble, that in the case of an outward bound vessel compulsory pilotage will not commence until the vessel proceeds from the stage to sea, and that, in the case of an inward bound vessel, the employment of the pilot by compulsion of law will cease or be suspended as soon as the vessel deviates to the stage from the route which she would otherwise follow to the dock." The real point that was raised in that case was simply a question as to extra remuneration of pilots, and it arose in the case of inward bound ships, in consequence of the vessels bringing cattle to Liverpool going first of all into the river, then to a stage where the cattle was landed, and then into one of the docks, and, with regard to outward bound vessels coming out of dock first and then proceeding to one of the stages—I think the Prince's Landing Stage—for the purpose of taking up passengers, cargo, and mails, and then proceeding to sea. It was contended that these were onerous and difficult duties for the pilots and they were entitled to extra remuneration, and that in such circumstances they were doing something which was not contemplated as part of the pilot's duties without extra remuneration. It does not appear to me when that case is examined very carefully, that it really affects in any material degree the question which I have to decide now. Going back to the 128th section, I think it is necessary to construe it in connection with the other sections, and one must face this sort of point. First of all, with regard to a vessel which comes in from the sea and is going straight up to the Eastham Locks, she is an inward bound vessel, bound in from the sea to the port of Liverpool. She does not come to an anchor at all, and it seems to me she is bound to take a pilot coming in.

THE MERCEDES DE LARRINAGA.

[ADM.]

Then the question must be raised, if so, where does his duty as compulsory pilot cease? I put that point to Mr. Aspinall, and I do not think, with the greatest deference to his argument, that it was answered in any way satisfactorily, because all I could get from him in substance was that compulsory pilotage ought to cease when the vessel had passed the position in which she would be going into any wet dock in the port of Liverpool. But that, it seems to me, is not a satisfactory answer, and leaves such a serious difficulty open as to the determination of the services. It certainly does not cover the case of a vessel which is bound up to Garston. The answer to that probably is that such a vessel is within the 128th section because she is going to a wet dock which, although not belonging to the board, is within the words, "Whether belonging to the board or not." But it seems to me that, with regard to a vessel going straight up to Eastham, the only sensible conclusion is that the pilot taking charge at sea must take her on to Eastham, where her navigation in the port of Liverpool is to cease. I cannot come to any other reasonable conclusion upon the matter. I myself am not able to see how it can reasonably be argued in practice or dealt with under the sections in any other way than that. It is taking the ship to a spot in the river Mersey which is at the end of her necessary navigation in the port of Liverpool; and it does not seem to me to put any undue strain upon the sections which have been considered in this case. Then that gets rid of anything, such as was suggested in the course of the case, as to whether the compulsion is to exist in case a vessel goes to Eastham direct, or is to exist up to the time that she anchors, because assuming that there was compulsion to begin with the plaintiffs would contend, as I understand, that if the vessel is going up to an anchorage the compulsion would last till she anchored, but if she was going to Eastham direct there would not be any compulsion at all, and how is anybody to elect that when the pilot comes on board outside the bar. It is impossible to be certain in all cases whether a vessel would have to anchor or go straight on. A thick fog, for instance, might prevent her going straight on. Then, again, with regard to the argument about anchorage, it is said that if the vessel comes to an anchor she has finished her navigation so far as the river is concerned, and that therefore the pilotage ceases to be compulsory. That may be true enough if the anchorage is the final point of destination, so far as navigation at that time is concerned, but I do not see how it can be treated as coming to an end if the anchorage is only anchorage in the itinerary towards the destination which it is necessary to get to in the ordinary course of navigation. Because if that were to be held, the moment a vessel dropped her anchor in the Mersey, even though she did so compulsorily, and yet was going to a second anchorage as her final destination, according to Mr. Aspinall's argument that first anchorage would put an end to the compulsory services. This vessel came to an anchor for navigation reasons until the tide permitted her to proceed, and it seems to me that such temporary anchoring is only in the itinerary towards the destination in the river to which she is entitled to have a pilot to take her. I have already referred to the point made with regard to this question of the wet dock, and that difficulty I do not think I need say anything more about, because the Ship Canal Act appears to have altered the position with regard to that point. It may be possible to hold that for pilotage purposes the end of the canal is still to be treated as within the port of Liverpool, and for such purposes is a wet dock, but I do not feel that it is necessary to base my decision upon it, and I feel great difficulty because of the Manchester Ship Canal Act of 1885. There is this matter to be observed with regard to outward bound vessels, that no point of departure is mentioned in any of the sections which deal with the employment of pilots on outward bound ships. It seems to me, having regard to their generality, that any vessel proceeding to sea out of the port of Liverpool would have to take a pilot, and there is no such difficulty, as suggested with regard to inward bound vessels in consequence of the terms of sect. 128, in applying compulsory pilotage to vessels proceeding to sea from Eastham. They would have to take a pilot on leaving Eastham, and it would be strange if one had to construe the Act in such a way that inward bound vessels would not have to employ a pilot right up to Eastham. There are other points which possibly require, and possibly may have at some future time, some further consideration, but at present it does not seem to me that any of the points which have been somewhat slightly touched upon affect the view which has been taken upon the general sections. There is, for instance, the 114th section of the Act of 1858, which deals with who is liable to pay pilotage. If that section had in any way restricted the recovery of pilotage as against persons who were in the port of Liverpool or against ships in the port of Liverpool, one might have felt that pilotage ought only to be applied to such ships as the rates could be recovered against and such persons as were connected with those ships in the port of Liverpool. But the section is quite general, and, although there may be difficulties about enforcing it against persons or ships not in the port of Liverpool, I cannot see myself that it affords sufficient answer to the argument which contends for the pilotage being compulsory in the way I have thought that it is. There is one other matter to consider, and that is the effect of the statute of 1899. That Act was passed in order to meet the difficulty which was pointed out in the case of The Servia and Carinthia (ubi sup.). It recites that "whereas by the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 the masters of vessels inward bound for and outward bound from the port of Liverpool are, subject to the exemptions by the said Act granted, required to employ pilots." Then it deals with the difficulties raised in the case of The Servia and Carinthia (ubi sup.), and it proceeds to legislate so as to get rid of those difficulties and free the matter from the doubt which that case raised. Counsel for the plaintiffs relied upon this recital as showing that the Act of 1858 was only dealing with vessels inward bound to and outward bound from the port of Liverpool. But if one compares that recital with the terms of the Act of 1858 it cannot be said, I think, that the recital is strictly correct, because one does not find in the Act of 1858 the words "inward bound for and outward bound from" the port of Liverpool, but it deals with vessels "bound into and out of" the port of Liverpool. That does not seem to admit so readily, as if that recital were correct, a consideration that the Legislature was only dealing with vessels which had Liverpool for their termination a quo and ad quem. I do not think that Act has any real bearing upon the present case. Of course it may be that under sect. 5 it may deal with vessels passing from Manchester to Liverpool, or simply from Liverpool to Manchester. I am not concerned to consider that point at all. Counsel for the plaintiffs suggested, broadly speaking, that there was great difficulty in working out this matter if it was held that pilotage was compulsory. I myself see no difficulty whatever. It is a simple matter. Every vessel, if I am right, bound in from the sea, except small vessels exempted, to the port of Manchester and going into the canal at Eastham is to take a pilot; and so, though I have not to decide that, has, apparently, every vessel going out from Eastham to the sea. There is no difficulty whatever in the application of the Act. If I am right, the result is that although the fault in this case was the fault only of the pilot of the Mercedes de Larrinaga, the defendants' plea of compulsory pilotage, it appears to me, is established. The plaintiffs' claim will, therefore, be dismissed without costs, and the defendants' counter-claim dismissed with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, March 22.

(Before COLLINS, M.R., ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ.)

PRINCE OF WALES DRY DOCK COMPANY (SWANSEA) LIMITED v. FOWNES FORGE AND ENGINEERING COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Damages, measure of—Sale of goods—Disclaimer of responsibility for bad workmanship—Costs of action by sub-vendee against purchaser reasonably defended.

The plaintiffs having undertaken the repairs of a steamship for the owners, employed the defendants, an engineering company, to construct a new crank shaft. The defendants agreed to do so, upon the terms of their not being responsible for failure of material or workmanship beyond the replacement of faulty work supplied by them.

In an action by the plaintiffs against the ship-owners to recover the price of the shaft which had been supplied by the defendants, the ship-owners counter-claimed for damages for breach of contract in consequence of the shaft having broken down on a voyage.

The plaintiffs, after communicating with the defendants, who thereupon repudiated all responsibility, defended the counter-claim.

The shipowners succeeded on their counter-claim, the shaft being found to have been of faulty workmanship.

In an action by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants the costs of the shipowners' counter-claim, as damages resulting from the defendants' breach of contract:

Held, that the terms on which the defendants had supplied the shaft did not relieve them from paying these costs; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the costs of the counter-claim except so far as they were increased by any issue other than the faultiness of the material or workmanship of the shaft.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Kennedy, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover from the defendants the costs which had been incurred by the plaintiffs in defending a claim made against them by the owners of the steamship Alcester.

In Jan. 1902 the steamship Alcester, being out of repair and needing a new crank shaft, was intrusted by the owners to the present plaintiffs, the Prince of Wales Dry Dock Company (Swansea) Limited, to have the necessary work carried out.

The plaintiffs, not being manufacturers of crank shafts, ordered one of the defendant company.

The defendant company agreed to supply a double throw ordinary built crank shaft for the steamship Alcester for the sum of 150*l.*, and their letter which constituted their acceptance of the plaintiffs' order contained in a postscript the following clause:

NOTE.—We do everything in our power to insure good material and workmanship, together with quick dispatch, but disclaim all responsibility for failure of either, beyond the replacement of faulty work as supplied by us (if practically possible to do so).

The defendants then manufactured and supplied the plaintiffs with a crank shaft, and the plaintiffs put it into the ship.

The Alcester, on the completion of the repairs, started on a voyage, but, in consequence of the breaking of the crank shaft, had to put into Naples for temporary repairs, and on her return to England she had to be fitted with a new crank shaft.

The owners of the ship refused to pay the plaintiffs for the crank shaft which had broken down.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought an action for the price of the shaft.

The shipowners delivered a counter-claim alleging a breach of the plaintiffs' contract in supplying a faulty shaft, the amount of damages claimed being based not only on the value of the crank shaft, but also on the detention of the ship consequential on the failure of the crank shaft.

Upon the counter-claim being delivered, the plaintiffs at once communicated with the present defendants for their opinion as to the course which should be taken.

The defendants gave the plaintiffs the most complete assurance that there was nothing faulty in the material or workmanship of the shaft, and suggested that the reason of its breaking down

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

APP.] PRINCE OF WALES DRY DOCK CO. (SWANSEA) v. FOWNES FORGE, & CO., CO. [APP.]

was the bad design, for which they were not responsible.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs defended the counter-claim raised by the shipowners.

At the trial of that action the judge found that there was no fault in the design, and that the cause of the breakdown of the shaft was faulty material and workmanship, and he gave judgment in favour of the shipowners for 356*l.* damages and costs.

Thereupon the plaintiffs commenced the present action to recover from the defendants the costs of the counter-claim on which the shipowners had obtained judgment.

At the trial of this action without a jury, Kennedy, J. gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Bailhache for the plaintiffs.—The costs of the counter-claim made by the shipowners which the plaintiffs have incurred are damages which might reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the present plaintiffs and defendants, at the time of the contract between them, as the probable result of a breach of the contract; and prima facie the plaintiffs are entitled, therefore, to succeed in this action:

Hammond v. Bussey, 30 Q. B. Div. 79.

The postscript to the defendants' letter accepting the plaintiffs' offer does not relieve the defendants from that common law liability to pay the damages now claimed. The effect of the postscript is merely to relieve the defendants, if they should supply a new crank shaft, from the natural and direct damages arising from a breach of contract to supply a good shaft. He referred to Agius v. Great Western Colliery Company, 80 L. T. Rep. 140; (1899) 1 Q. B. 413.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (Lewis Noad with him) for the defendants.—The defendants did not request the plaintiffs to defend the counter-claim. They repudiated all liability. They are protected by the postscript, which relieves them from the liability to pay these costs as being damages arising from their breach of contract to supply a properly made crank shaft. The object of the clause in the postscript is to relieve them from all damages in respect of a breach of the contract beyond the liability to replace faulty material or workmanship.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kennedy, J., and it certainly raises a point of some nicety. It is perfectly clear law, since the decision of Hammond v. Bussey (ubi sup.) in this court, that, unless there is some special bargain between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover these costs from the defendants, and the only point in this case is whether the terms of the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants were such as to exclude the liability of the defendants to pay the costs in question. That depends upon the terms of the postscript to the defendants' letter, by which they said that they did everything in their power to insure good material and workmanship, but disclaimed all responsibility for failure of either beyond the replacement of faulty work if practically possible to do so. Now, it seems to me that that clause is not introduced with any reference or relation whatsoever, either express or implied, to costs under any possible circumstances. What the clause is addressed to is the substitution for the general liability to pay general damages consequential upon the breakdown of the machinery, of an obligation to replace the shaft, but that obligation is just as much a binding obligation as was the obligation upon them, in the first instance, to furnish a good shaft. That obligation is certainly undertaken by them in their letter, but it is qualified by the postscript, with the result that an immunity is secured for them from what are called general damages—i.e., loss of time and so on—incidental to and following upon the delivery of a bad shaft. They have secured that immunity and have taken upon themselves the responsibility of replacing faulty or defective work by the substitution of another shaft. But when that liability has been substituted for the other, the clause has accomplished its purpose. It was essential to the determination of the question whether or not that liability existed that it should be ascertained whether the shaft supplied was defective in material or workmanship. That point has been ascertained in the action brought by the shipowners, at the expense of the plaintiffs in the present action, and, according to the law as laid down in Hammond v. Bussey (ubi sup.), they are clearly entitled to be reimbursed by the defendants, unless the defendants have contracted themselves out of that liability. In my judgment the defendants have not limited [their liability in that way, and they stand unprotected from their common law liability. It is clear to me that the rule laid down in Hammond v. Bussey (ubi sup.) must be read, as is repeatedly stated in the judgment, with reference to the facts of that case. The court in that case held that the liability of the defendant to pay the plaintiff's costs was not a liability which attached under the first part of the rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Ex. 341), which refers to damages arising naturally from the breach of contract. The court held that the liability came under the second branch of the rule, that the damages were such as might reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties, when they made the contract, as the probable result of a breach of it. That, I think, justifies me in saying that this clause does not prima facie, and cannot be taken prima facie to, relieve the defendants from an obligation to pay these costs, which do not flow directly from the original breach of contract, but arise necessarily from the conduct of the parties after the breach. The conduct of the defendants after their breach of contract was such as to make it most reasonable on the part of the plaintiffs to defend the claim made against them by the shipowners. It would even have been unreasonable for them not to do so. They trusted to the assurances given them by the defendants that the shaft had been properly constructed, and, having therefore defended the claim and thereby incurred costs, it seems to me that the liability which they then incurred is altogether outside the conditions of the clause on which the defendants rely. I think that on the true construction of the contract the parties stand with their common law rights, upon the point now in dispute, quite unimpaired. On these grounds, though I recognise the difficulty of the case, I feel bound to differ from the conclusion arrived at by Kennedy, J., and in my judgment the appeal ought to be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—This case depends upon the construction of a postscript to a letter written by the defendants, and the postscript is so loosely framed that I am not surprised that it has given rise to a difference of judicial opinion. It has puzzled me a good deal, and I cannot say that my doubts are wholly removed, but, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the appeal ought to succeed. The meaning that I attach to the postscript in question is this: The defendants contracted that, in case of the failure of the shaft that they sold, by reason of faulty material or workmanship, they were to be liable at any rate to the extent of replacing the faulty work, but were not to be liable further by way of contract; that is to say, they were not to be liable for further loss beyond the cost of replacing the shaft for the faulty work. But then what flows from the fact of there being a contract of this limited kind? Suppose that the shipowners had brought an action against the present plaintiffs in respect of the failure of the shaft, but limiting their claim to damages to the value of a new shaft; and suppose that the plaintiffs informed the present defendants that the action had been brought against them, and then, upon the assurance of the defendants that there was nothing faulty in the workmanship of the shaft, had defended the action in the interests both of themselves and of the defendants. Then at the trial of that action it is found that the workmanship is faulty, and accordingly a new shaft has to be delivered. In such a case I should say that, within the meaning of the decision in Hammond v. Bussey (ubi sup.), the costs of the defence could be said to be damages which might reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the time when they made the limited contract that I have indicated, and for that reason I think that the costs in such a case as that could be recovered by the plaintiffs from the defendants. Now, apply that to the present case. Here was an action against the plaintiffs on the ground of faulty workmanship, and the relief included a claim for damages for the price of a new shaft; in other words, for delivery of a new shaft as part of the damages resulting to the ultimate purchasers of the shaft because of its faulty construction. It is true that the action also contained a claim for further damages, but, when the defence had to be put in, the then defendants (the present plaintiffs) had to consider that, as to a great part of the action, it obviously concerned the present defendants on what I have called their limited contract, and they accordingly consulted with the defendants. The defendants then claimed the protection of this clause, and said that the shaft was not faulty in material or workmanship. Thereupon the present plaintiffs defended the action brought against them, and under the circumstances I think that their defence was reasonable and proper so far as concerns their costs in defending that part of the action in which a claim was made for a new shaft. Those costs were reasonably incurred, and the plaintiffs are entitled to say, as against the present defendants, that these costs must be taken to have been in the contemplation of the parties as damages reasonably likely to flow from a breach by the defendants of their limited contract. Then the question arises, How are those costs to be ascertained? It appears to me that the right order to make is that the plaintiffs are entitled to the costs of the action except so far as those costs were increased by any issue other than the issue I have mentioned.

MATHEW, L.J. concurred.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C.—Will your Lordships make an order that the costs should be divided in the proportion which the plaintiffs' interests bear to the defendants' interests? The shipowners recovered 356*l.* from the present plaintiffs, and the present defendants are interested in that sum, as your Lordships hold, to the extent of only 150*l.*

COLLINS, M.R.—We think that the order suggested by my brother Romer is the right one, and the plaintiffs will have the costs of the shipowners' counter-claim, except so far as they were enhanced by other issues, if any.

Appeal allowed.

SEARLE v. LUND. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Shipping—Bill of lading—Liberty to over-carry goods if discharge cannot be effected without undue detention—Discharge prevented by delay at previous port—Delay caused by negligence of shipowner's agent—Remoteness of damage—Liability of shipowner.

A bill of lading contained the following clause: "If in the opinion of the master discharge cannot be effected without undue detention, the steamer shall have liberty to over-carry the cargo to London at merchant's risk, and deliver there to consignees or their assigns."

The ship was delayed at a port of call in the course of her voyage by the negligence of the shipowner's agents, with the result that, on her arrival at the port where the goods were to be discharged, the master found that the discharge could not be effected without undue detention, and he therefore over-carried the goods to London.

In an action by the consignees to recover damages for the over-carriage of the goods:

Held, affirming the decision of Kennedy, J. (88 L. T. Rep. 863), that the damage was not so remote from the negligence of the shipowner's agents as to disentitle the consignee from succeeding in the action.

APPEAL by the defendant from the judgment of Kennedy, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought against the owner of the steamship Yarrowonga to recover damages for the breach of a contract contained in a bill of lading.

SEARLE v. LUND.

[CT. OF APP.]

The Yarrowonga was one of a line of steamers, known as the Blue Anchor Line, regularly running between Australian ports, of which Melbourne was one, and London, and calling on the way at Durban and Cape Town.

In Sept. 1901 the plaintiff shipped on the Yarrowonga at Melbourne forty-five cases of merchandise and 1750 bales of fodder, to be delivered at Cape Town.

The bills of lading contained an option for the consignees to require delivery at Durban, and also contained the following clause:

If in the opinion of the master discharge cannot be effected without undue detention, the steamer shall have liberty to over-carry the cargo to London at merchant's risk, and deliver there to consignees or their assigns.

On the 25th Oct. the Yarrowonga arrived at Durban.

On the assumption that she would leave Durban and arrive at Cape Town in due course four days later, the plaintiff secured a berth for her at Cape Town for the day when she ought to arrive there.

The ship was, however, delayed at Durban.

This delay was caused to some extent by bad weather, and by a strike of the labourers there, but chiefly by a blunder on the part of the defendant's agents, who directed the plaintiff's cargo to be discharged. The mistake was discovered and the cargo was reshipped on the Yarrowonga.

In consequence of this delay the ship arrived at Cape Town several days later than had been expected, and on her arrival there the berth that had been secured for her was occupied by another vessel.

The South African war was at that time being carried on, and the harbour at Cape Town was consequently in a very congested condition.

The master was honestly and reasonably of opinion that the cargo could not be discharged there without undue detention of the ship, and he decided to carry it on to London.

This he did, and the cargo had then to be brought back to Cape Town at considerable expense.

At the trial of the action before Kennedy, J. without a jury, the learned judge said it was the fact that there would have been no need for undue detention at Cape Town but for what happened at Durban, and that, but for the want of reasonable care on the part of the defendant's agents there, the vessel might have been discharged without undue delay at Cape Town. He held that the damage suffered by the plaintiff by the over-carriage of the cargo to London was not too remote from the negligence of the defendant's agents at Durban, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover in the action.

The case is reported 88 L. T. Rep. 863.

The defendant appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Loehnis for the defendant.

Scrutton, K.C. and Leck for the plaintiff.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Kennedy, J., who gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff in an action against a ship-owner to recover damages for negligently over-carrying the plaintiff's cargo. The cargo in question was shipped on the defendant's steamship, which performed round voyages between Australia and London, calling at Durban and

Cape Town on the way. It appears from the evidence that these voyages are accomplished with great regularity, and the times of the ship's arrival at the various ports can be calculated with considerable nicety. The cargo in question was shipped in Australia for delivery at Cape Town, with an option for the consignees to require delivery at Durban. The vessel arrived at Durban on the 25th Oct., which was the exact day that she was expected there. The plaintiff did not exercise his option to require delivery there, but, by a blunder on the part of someone for whom the defendant is responsible, the cargo was discharged at Durban. The mistake was then discovered, and the cargo was reshipped. Now, on the 25th Oct., when the vessel arrived at Durban, the plaintiff made arrangements on the footing of the vessel's departure for Cape Town on the following Tuesday, and he secured a berth at Cape Town for the following Saturday where his cargo might be discharged. At Durban the ship met with some difficulties both from the weather and from labour disputes, but Kennedy, J. at the trial, after making allowance for the delay thus caused, came to the conclusion that, if the ship had not been delayed also by the blunder which resulted in the cargo in question being discharged and then reshipped, the vessel might have left Durban on the Tuesday, and have arrived at Cape Town in time to make use of the berth which the plaintiff had secured. The learned judge found that this blunder in fact caused a delay of two or three days. There were other things which caused delay, but, if it had not been for the delay caused by this blunder, the vessel would have arrived at Cape Town in time to get the benefit of the berth that had been secured. That is the finding of the learned judge, and there was ample material before him upon which he might fairly come to that conclusion. When the vessel arrived at Cape Town the berth that had been secured was no longer available. The bills of lading contained a clause providing that if in the opinion of the master discharge could not be effected without undue detention, the steamer was to have liberty to over-carry the cargo to London at merchant's risk and deliver them to the consignees or their assigns. The master, in the exercise of what was found by Kennedy, J. to be a sound judgment, was of opinion that, having regard to the congestion of shipping in the harbour at Cape Town, the discharge of the cargo could not be effected without undue detention, and he decided to carry the cargo on to London. The cargo was accordingly carried to London, and then had to be brought back to Cape Town, and these proceedings very naturally involved the plaintiff in considerable expense. The action is brought to recover the damages caused by the over-carriage of the goods. The question is whether the chain of causality between the negligence at Durban in discharging the plaintiff's cargo, which caused the vessel two or three days' delay, and the late arrival at Cape Town which resulted in the loss of the berth and the carrying on of the cargo to London has been sufficiently established. In my opinion it has, and none the less because the master in the exercise of his discretion elected to make use of the option of carrying the cargo on to London. There was no negligence or improper conduct on his part. I think that the damage all resulted from the negligence which occurred at Durban, and which caused the vessel to lose the berth that had been secured at Cape Town. The consequence is one that might reasonably be anticipated and regarded as following naturally on the act of negligence. That seems to me to be the legal and practical view of the matter. The ship made the voyages so regularly that the day of her arrival at Cape Town could be calculated with considerable exactness, and a berth was secured for her there in view of the voyage there from Durban being completed in the usual time. The vessel did not arrive at Cape Town as soon as she ought to have done in consequence of the blunder at Durban, and this blunder was made by someone for whom the defendant is responsible. The defendant now says that the damage is too remote, but from the correspondence it appears that he himself took the view which was afterwards taken by Kennedy, J. I think that the decision of Kennedy, J. was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—The circumstances of this case are somewhat complex, but I am not prepared to differ from Kennedy, J., who has held that the non-discharge of the plaintiff's goods at Cape Town was caused by the negligence of the defendant's agents at Durban. The damage of the plaintiff is not too remote. He is entitled to succeed in this action, and the appeal must fail.

NORMAN AND BURT v. WALDER. (a)

APPEAL UNDER THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897.

Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Review of award—Profits of trade carried on by workman—"Average amount which he is able to earn after the accident"—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), sched. 1, par. 2.

Upon an application to review an award of a weekly payment to an injured workman under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, the fact that since the accident the workman has started a trade or business of his own from which he is deriving profits should be taken into consideration for the purpose of deciding whether the weekly payment should be ended or diminished.

APPEAL by the employers from the decision of the late Judge Martineau at Hayward's Heath County Court refusing to make any order upon an application by them for the review of an award for a weekly payment to an injured workman under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

Charles Walder had been a machinist in the employment of Messrs. Norman and Burt, who carried on business as builders and contractors.

His wages were 37s. a week.

In May 1901 he met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, by which he lost the top joint of one of his fingers.

In Aug. 1901 he obtained an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 for a weekly payment of 18s. 6d.

In May 1903 the employers made an application under sched. 1, par. 12, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 for a review of the weekly payment.

At the hearing of this application it appeared that soon after the accident the workman had set up a small baker's business, which he carried on with the help of his wife, his son, and his daughter, and that he was still carrying on the business and making a profit out of it.

The County Court judge delivered the following judgment:

This is an application by an insurance office asking me as arbitrator to suspend or reduce the compensation awarded to the respondent by the award. The ground of the application is that since the award was made the respondent's earnings have increased to such an extent that he is no longer entitled to any compensation. The earnings are not wage earnings, nor anything in the nature of wage earnings, but are the profits of a trade business carried on by the respondent at Dane Hill. I reserved judgment to consider whether the earnings of a trade business can be treated as "earnings" within the meaning of sched. 1, par. 2, of the Act. The word in the Act no doubt is "earnings," but I am clear that, according to the true construction of the schedule, wage-earning capacity alone is to be taken into account. I may mention here that the earnings of the business carried on by the respondent are obtained in a peculiar manner. The respondent carries on the business in question with the labour and assistance of his wife, who has the principal share in the work, his daughter who serves in the shop, and his son who goes out with the horse and cart. He himself goes out with the horse and cart and has a general control of the business. As head of the family he appropriates the labour and assistance of his wife, son, and daughter, and takes the whole of the profits and maintains them. He does not receive any wages, nor is he in the service of any employer. It would be difficult to say what proportion of the total earnings in the business ought to be attributed to the respondent's own labour. I have had some difficulty in arriving at the total earnings in the business, but I estimate them at 2l. a week. In the view that I take of the case, it is immaterial. It is to be observed that the compensation to the workman for personal injury is, in my opinion, clearly assessable with reference to weekly wages or earnings earned before the injury and weekly earnings or wages earned after the injury, and, in my opinion, trade profits in a business are no more to be taken into account than income of real estate. It may well be that the work in respect of which wages are earned after an accident need not be ejusdem generis with the work in respect of which wages were earned before the accident, and there is authority in the Court of Appeal for that view, but, in my opinion, earnings in trade are not earnings within the meaning of sched. 1, par. 2, of the Act. The application fails, and must be refused with costs.

Against this decision the employers appealed.

The Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37) provides as follows:

Sched. 1, par. 1. The amount of compensation under this Act shall be . . . (b) where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, a weekly payment during the incapacity after the second week not exceeding fifty per cent. of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months, if he has been so long employed, but if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer, such weekly payment not to exceed one pound.

Par. 2. In fixing the amount of the weekly payment, regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident, and to any payment not being wages which he may receive from the employer in respect of his injury during the period of his incapacity.

Arthur Powell, K.C. (W. Addington Willis with him) for the employers.—Under sched. 1, par. 2, the question with regard to the workman that the County Court judge had to consider was what is "the average amount which he is able to earn" after the accident. The learned County Court judge said that those words ought to be limited to mean "the average amount of wages which he is able to earn." But the words of the paragraph are quite general, and there is nothing to justify the limitation that the learned judge imposed on them. Here the workman has worked since the accident in the baker's business he has started, and in that business he has earned money. Though he is not in the employment of anyone but himself, yet he is able to earn money, and it is only fair that the amount of his earnings should be taken into consideration in assessing the compensation he is entitled to. Par. 1 (b) has reference to the earnings received by a workman as wages from an employer, because the very foundation of a claim for compensation is that the injury has been received while in the service of an employer. But the same considerations do not apply to par. 2. Under that paragraph the question is as to the general ability of the workman to earn money, whether as wages or not. The court has several times held that the earnings of a workman after the accident, which are to be considered, are not limited to wages at the same work as that on which he was employed before the accident, or even at work ejusdem generis :

Irons v. Davis, 80 L. T. Rep. 673; (1899) 2 Q. B. 330;

Chandler v. Smith and Son, 81 L. T. Rep. 317; (1899) 2 Q. B. 506;

Pomphrey v. Southwark Press, 83 L. T. Rep. 468; (1901) 1 Q. B. 86.

Stuart Bevan for the workman.—Par. 2 directs regard to be had between what the workman earned before the accident and what he is able to earn afterwards. That means that his wage-earning capacity before the accident is to be compared with his wage-earning capacity after the accident:

Crossfield and Sons Limited v. Tanian, 82 L. T. Rep. 813; (1900) 2 Q. B. 629.

There Smith, L.J. said that sched. 1, par. 12, means that in cases where a weekly payment has been ordered and the injured workman gets better in health "and earns better wages," the employer may apply for a review. If the employers are right in this case, and par. 2 applies to earnings other than wages, these applications to review will lead to the incurring of great trouble and expense. It will be open to employers to argue all sorts of points as to what course it is possible for an injured workman to pursue with the view of making money. Moreover, there will be great difficulties with regard to the medical examination which is provided for by par. 11, as all sorts of questions as to the general capabilities of the workman will have to be gone into. The arbitrator will also have to go into discussions as to any property the workman may have, and how he could usefully employ it with a view to earning money by putting it into some trade or otherwise.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal by the employers from a decision of the late Judge Martineau. An award for a weekly payment was made under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and the question is whether, upon an application under sched. 1, par. 12, to review that award, the fact that the workman was making money by means of a trade or business conducted by himself ought or ought not to be taken into consideration. The learned County Court judge held that it was not an element to be taken into consideration, and that, however prosperous the trade or business of the workman might have become, it afforded no ground for reducing the amount of the weekly payment that had been originally awarded as compensation. That conclusion was arrived at by the County Court judge on the construction of the Act. Now, par. 1 (b) of sched. 1 provides thus: [His Lordship read it.] As was pointed out in the course of the argument, that clause assumes that up to the time of the injury the workman has been earning wages from an employer. Then comes par. 2, which is the paragraph on which the question in dispute really turns. It is this: [His Lordship read it.] In the present case the workman was earning wages at 37s. a week at the time of the accident, and the compensation awarded to him was a weekly payment of 18s. 6d. Now, it appears that since the accident he has started a small business as a baker, out of which he gets a weekly return of 40s. He is helped in the business by his wife, his son, and his daughter. The County Court judge has not found with any exactness the amount of the actual profit derived from the business which can be considered as due to the workman's own exertions, because he held that that amount had nothing to do with the question that was really being discussed before him. He was of opinion that the amount, whatever it was, was not "wages" earned by the workman from one employer, and was therefore not a matter which ought to be taken into consideration. It seems to me that the County Court judge has put too narrow a construction upon the Act. The words of par. 2 do not expressly exclude any earnings other than wages received from an employer. It is true that the average weekly earnings earned before an accident mean wages earned from an employer. But the Legislature's intention was to compensate an injured workman for his loss—that is to say, his loss of earning power—and therefore, I think, the average amount which the workman is able to earn after the accident ought not to be limited in its meaning so as to exclude everything except what he receives by way of wages from an employer. The highest weekly payment that the Act allows to be awarded as compensation is half the average weekly earnings earned before the accident, which shows that compensation under the Act was not intended to be a complete compensation. If a review of the weekly payment is desired under par. 12, the whole situation must be looked at. The arbitrator should find out how far the workman's money-earning capacity has been altered; and, if it is as good as it was before the accident, the fact should not be ignored, even though the money made by the workman is not received by him as wages paid him by an employer. In the present case, therefore, the County Court judge should have taken into consideration the earnings of the workman in his trade or business and given them their due weight. The appeal must be allowed, and the case will go back to the County Court judge to consider it upon all its merits.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear upon the evidence that the workman is getting something from his baker's business. How much he himself is earning should be inquired into, and the case must therefore be sent back to the County Court judge. The words in par. 2, "the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident," are not limited in meaning to the amount which can be earned as wages paid by a master. A man may be his own master.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The workman in this case has been employing himself since the accident, and it seems to me that the money that he is earning in this way should be taken into consideration upon the application for a review.

Appeal allowed.

PLEWS v. SAMUEL. (a)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Vendors' possession—Receipt of rents due from tenants before date of contract after date for completion—Allocation of receipts.

Where a vendor remains in possession after the date fixed for completion of the purchase, the completion having been delayed by no fault on the purchaser's part, and receives interest in lieu of rents by his own choice after the date for completion but still receives the rents, he is not at liberty as against the purchaser to allocate any part of such rents so received to arrears of rents due to himself from tenants either before the date of the contract, or subsequently before the date fixed for completion of the purchase.

ACTION by the vendors for specific performance by the defendant of an agreement, dated the 24th Feb. 1902, for the sale of leasehold premises, Nos. 172, 173, and 174, Bute-street, Cardiff.

There was a counter-claim by the defendant asking for an account of rents received by the plaintiffs, or which would have been received but for their wilful default.

The 13th condition of sale, stated to be part of the "General Conditions of Sale of the Incorporated Law Society for Cardiff and District," provided that:

The rents, profits, or possession, of the property will be received, or retained, and the outgoings discharged, by the vendor up to the time appointed for completion, and as from the same time the rents and profits (if any) shall belong to the purchaser, and all outgoings shall be paid by him, but he shall not be let into the actual possession, or receipt of the rents and profits, until the completion of the purchase. All current rents and outgoings shall, for the purposes of these conditions, be apportioned between the vendor and the purchaser, and paid with or deducted from the purchase money, such apportionment in case of dispute being made by the auctioneer . . . whose decision shall be final.

The action now came before the court upon an agreed "statement of facts" between the parties in the following terms, in which the facts and questions for consideration by the court are set out:

1. By an agreement made the 24th Feb. 1902 the plaintiffs agreed to sell and the defendant agreed to purchase certain leasehold properties described in the particulars of sale therein referred to and being Nos. 172, 173, and 174, Bute-street, Cardiff, subject to the conditions of sale therein referred to so far as the same applied to a sale by private contract. The said agreement was contained in a memorandum of that date signed by the defendant.

2. The said premises Nos. 172 and 174, Bute-street were stated in the said particulars of sale to be then let at the respective rents of 11. 2s. 6d. per week and 11. 7s. 6d. per week, the landlords paying all outgoings.

3. The said conditions of sale provided, amongst other things, that the purchase should be completed on the 18th March 1902, and that, if the purchaser should not complete the purchase at the time appointed and the sale should not be annulled, he should pay interest on the unpaid purchase money after the rate of 6l. per centum per annum from that day until the same should be paid, or the vendors might, at their option, take the rents of the property for the same period.

4. Under the circumstances next hereinafter stated the defendant did not complete the purchase on the 18th March 1902. Shortly after the date of the said agreement, the defendant contended that he was entitled to a conveyance of certain other premises in addition to those comprised therein. The plaintiffs in consequence issued a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act 1874, and as the result it was decided that the said contention was not sustainable. Pending the decision of the said summons the plaintiffs remained in possession of the premises comprised in the said agreement.

5. At the date of the said agreement sums amounting to 311. 1s. and, at the date fixed for completion, sums amounting to 341. were owing by tenants of the said premises for arrears of rent. This the defendant did not know till long after, but he did not make any inquiries of the plaintiffs on the subject.

6. Subsequently to the date fixed for completion and while they were in such possession as aforesaid, the plaintiffs received from the said tenants the rents appearing by the apportionment account rendered by the plaintiffs.

7. The defendant has long since accepted the plaintiffs' title.

8. The plaintiffs have long since elected to receive interest on the unpaid purchase money.

9. On the 9th March 1903, when completion was about to take place, the plaintiffs rendered an apportionment account made out on the footing that they were entitled as against the defendant to apply, out of the sums received from the said tenants, the sum of 341. in payment of the said arrears. The defendant refused to acknowledge the claim, and tendered the full amount of the purchase money on the footing that the plaintiffs were not entitled so to apply the said sum of 34l. or any part thereof.

PLEWS v. SAMUEL.

[CHAN. DIV.]

10. On the 1st May 1903 this action was brought. The defendant by his defence pleaded that his liability to pay the 34l. aforesaid was the only question in dispute, and that he had tendered all other moneys and brought all such other moneys into court accordingly.

11. On the 16th Aug. 1903 the plaintiffs for the first time informed the defendant that 2l. 19s. of the 34l. aforesaid accrued between the 24th Feb. and the 18th March 1902.

12. To the agreement and other documents aforesaid, and to the pleadings, the parties are at liberty to refer, and the judge is to be at liberty to draw any inference of fact. The questions for the decision of the court are: (1) Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to retain out of the sums so received as aforesaid the said sum of 34l., or, alternatively, the said sum of 34l. less the said sum of 2l. 19s. (2) By whom the costs of this action ought to be paid.

This statement was signed by the agents for the solicitors for the respective parties to the action.

The plaintiffs furnished an account showing they had collected 97l. in respect of rents of the property sold.

MacSwinney for the plaintiffs. — The vendors are only constructive trustees of the rents, and, being in possession, are entitled to appropriate them to wipe off the arrears due to them before the date of the agreement according to the rule in Clayton's case (1 Mer. 585):

Lysaght v. Edwards, 34 L. T. Rep. 787; per Jessel, M.R., at pp. 789, 790; 2 Ch. Div. 499.

The defendant had no interest in the property before the date of the agreement for sale, and is wrong in charging the plaintiffs with wilful default before that date. The 34l. may be regarded as outgoing in respect of the property. The legal position of a vendor remaining in possession is shown in Foster v. Deacon (3 Madd. 394). He is not to be held liable for wilful default, as in the case of a mortgagee in possession: (per Knight Bruce, L.J. Sherwin v. Shakspear, 5 De G. M. & G. 517, at p. 531). In the case of a trustee, a special case ought to be made out to charge him with wilful default. Wilful default will not be presumed, and here there is no evidence that the vendors have not dealt properly with the property. Further, one case of wilful default must be proved:

Fry on Specific Performance, p. 590 et seq., 4th edit.

It was, as your Lordship held, through the purchaser's default that the purchase was not completed before. There is no evidence that the rents were paid to the vendors in respect of current rents. They were only bound to pay the outgoing out of the estate, not from their own pockets. This is really a question of which of two innocent parties should suffer for the default of the tenants. The purchaser says that, the vendors being entitled to interest, rents and interest are mutually destructive. The purchaser is only entitled to so much of the 34l. as accrued between the dates of the contract and that for completion of the purchase, if he is entitled to anything.

P. Ogden Lawrence, K.C. and Ashton Cross for the purchaser. — The legal position of a vendor remaining in possession after the time fixed for completion of the contract is laid down by your Lordship in Royal Bristol Permanent Building Society v. Bomash (57 L. T. Rep. 179; 35 Ch. Div. 390). The rule laid down by Lord Selborne, L.C. in Phillips v. Silvester (27 L. T. Rep. 840; L. Rep. 8 Ch. 173), where his Lordship in substance says that the vendor in possession under a contract of sale is a trustee for the purchaser, is preferable to that in Sherwin v. Shakspear (ubi sup.). Inferences of fact may be drawn under the statement in this case. The vendors admit the receipt of rents after the date fixed for completion of the agreement, and they must show that they have been paid in respect of rents accruing before the 18th March 1902. They suggest that we ought to lose the arrears of rent. That is absolutely contrary to the cases as to where a trustee is in possession of the trust estate. Lord Selborne, L.C. likens the position of the vendor to that of a trustee who has been farming the estate in such a way that the defendant will lose his money. It is for the vendors to show that these tenants could have been ejected. From the date for completion the vendors' position changed from that of a beneficiary or tenant for life to that of a trustee, and the purchaser does not carry the account further back than that date. Up to then the vendors could forego arrears of rent. On electing to take interest they became trustees of the rents and profits. They could have elected to take the rents up to the date of actual completion. From that time they became trustees of the rents and corpus of the estate.

MacSwinney in reply. — The vendors do not deny that they are trustees, but only in a modified sense:

Royal Bristol Permanent Building Society v. Bomash (ubi sup.);

Dart's Vendors & Purchasers, 283, 284, 6th edit.

Plaintiffs might have distrained for arrears, even if they could not eject. The vendors need not tell their purchaser that there are rents in arrear, and the 13th condition of sale gives them the right to charge them against the purchaser.

KEKEWICH, J. — The statement of facts in this case raises a nice point, and one which is certainly not covered by authority. There are some older cases touching on the question, but there are also some more modern cases laying down what is the relation of vendor and purchaser, or rather of vendor and purchaser in cases in which the vendor remains in possession of the property he has sold after the date in the contract fixed for the completion of the purchase. One of the more instructive cases is that of Lysaght v. Edwards (ubi sup.), in which the Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel) examines many authorities and lays down a rule of his own. There the question was whether land included in a contract for sale passed under a devise by the vendor of trust estates, and it was held that it did so pass, and that raised a further question whether a vendor might be properly called a trustee after the date of the contract. I will not really refer to the case further than to say that Sir George Jessel held that he was a trustee, and he says at p. 789: "In the same way a correlative liability applies to the vendor in possession. He is not entitled to treat the estate as his own. If he wilfully damages or injures it, he is liable to the purchaser, and, more than that, he is liable if he does not take reasonable care of it. So far he is treated in all respects as a trustee, subject, of course, to his right to be paid the purchase money and his right to enforce his security against the estate." The relation of vendor and purchaser is further illustrated by the case of Phillips v. Silvester (ubi sup.), a case of considerable importance, and there are other cases showing that a vendor may be made liable, as he there was, for neglect to take care of the property; and by cases which show that he can be charged with wilful default, a deduction which follows from Phillips v. Silvester (ubi sup.). All those cases dealt with contract of sale, the relation constituted by a contract capable of being enforced in proceedings for specific performance, and in them everything is laid down subject to the contract being eventually performed. Then, of course, if the contract is not performed by the purchaser, if the vendor was in possession, it may be for many months or years, as trustee for the purchaser, that relation is discharged between them, and nothing could be said against the vendor for neglect or misfeasance. If the vendor obtained a judgment for specific performance and that was set aside by the House of Lords, he would be and remain owner of the estate in possession free from liability. That illustrates the very peculiar position in which he stands. He is a trustee, and under obligations, in a very modified sense. The present case, however, raises a new question, and I am bound to consider his position and the relations subsisting after the expiration of the time before the day "fixed for completion" when he no longer remains in unqualified possession, but from the time from which the purchaser is entitled to the rents and profits—that is usually, according to the common form, the day fixed for the completion of the purchase—not necessarily, however, for they can fix another day. Thus in commercial contracts it is very usual to fix another day, and one even prior to the date of the contract, as when a purchaser takes a business from January which is sold in July. So, too, it might be fixed as regards lands. There is no reason why, if the parties find it convenient so to contract, they might not say the time "fixed for completion" should be an earlier day than usual, and the purchaser should be entitled to the rents and profits. Here it was the 18th March 1902 from which the purchaser was entitled to the rents and profits and liable to pay interest on unpaid purchase money. But completion did not—as happens in very many cases—take place on that day. The vendors still remained in possession. There was no default in them, or, in a legal sense, in the purchaser either. The point the purchaser raised was a proper one to take. From that date, the vendors being still in possession, they elected to receive interest in lieu of rents and profits as they were entitled to do, but they continued to receive the rents. The property was let to weekly tenants, and after that date they received the rents which they say they are entitled to appropriate or allocate to rents in arrear, and, as a result, to put into their own pockets the rents so received. And that involves a difference in the accounts of some 34l. This raises an important question. If there were nothing else in it, I should have thought that the vendors could properly say—the tenants not having appropriated the payments made by them—"We can appropriate the rents to any part we please of the rents due to us. We appropriate them to the weeks before the 18th March." It is argued that, even if this is so, they might be liable and the purchaser entitled to recover because at the time of payment the vendors were liable for wilful default. I need not say any more about that. What the plaintiffs really say is that they may appropriate as they are only trustees in a modified sense. Their duty—I am considering nothing about wilful default—was to get in and hold the rents for the purchaser, to whom they belong, but their interest is to appropriate to the prior arrears. Beyond that they have an interest as absolute owners in case the purchaser failed to complete. Their interest is to say that the rents in question were paid them in respect of the period before the 18th March 1902. Clearly their duty lies the other way. There is a conflict between interest and duty. When there is a conflict of duty and interest as between trustee and cestui que trust, duty must prevail. And if duty has not prevailed in fact, the court will insist upon the duty being performed. The matter being open, I am to see that the result is as it would be if duty prevailed, if the vendors really received these rents for the purchaser to whom they belonged. They did not intend to hand them over, but they cannot set up their interest against their duty. They must account for the rents to the purchaser. The plaintiffs are entitled to the costs of the counterclaim; the purchaser to the general costs of the action.

JOHNSON v. WHITAKER.

JOHNSON v. WHITAKER. (a)

Practice—Discovery—Production—Privilege—Further affidavit—Sufficiency—Omission of statement by party that documents for which protection is claimed contain nothing impeaching his own case.

In an action to enforce the right to profit made upon an alleged joint purchase and resale of land and an account, defendant had counter-claimed for specific performance of an alleged agreement between him and the plaintiff as to certain properties purchased by defendant and, as alleged, by the plaintiff and defendant jointly and payments to be made, for a sale, and the execution of a proper conveyance.

Defendant in an affidavit of documents had sworn that he objected to produce certain documents on the ground that they related only to his own case, and did not tend to prove or support the plaintiff's case.

Held, that the affidavit, according to the dicta in the case of Morris v. Edwards (63 L. T. Rep. 26; 15 App. Cas. 309) in the House of Lords, as followed by the Court of Appeal in Attorney-

JOHNSON v. WHITAKER.

[CHAN. DIV.]

General v. Mayor and Corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne) 81 L. T. Rep. 311; (1899) 2 Q. B. 478) was technically sufficient, although not containing the statement that the documents for which privilege was claimed contained nothing impeaching his own case.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

This was an application on behalf of the plaintiff, John Harral Johnson, that the defendant might be ordered within seven days after service of the order to file a further full and sufficient affidavit of documents.

Plaintiff and defendant had, prior to 1900, been engaged in several transactions consisting of the buying and selling of land at a profit on their joint account, the plaintiff doing the commercial work and the defendant, a solicitor, the legal without charge, expenses to be repaid, and net profit divided equally between them.

A property known as the Gower-street property at Leeds had been purchased about July 1900, and conveyed to plaintiff as trustee and agent for himself and defendant by deed of the 31st July 1900, expressed to be made between Richard Thomas Otley Robinson and the plaintiff. Defendant agreed to resell at a profit, and it was conveyed by plaintiff to the purchaser, Israel Morris. Defendant had, as plaintiff alleged, received the purchase money upon trust for himself and the plaintiff on their joint account, and refused to account for the balance of profits.

The plaintiff by his statement of claim claimed a declaration that he was entitled to one moiety of the net profit on the purchase and resale of the Gower-street property, an account, damages, and costs.

Defendant by his statement of defence denied that plaintiff was entitled to any part of the purchase money of the Gower-street property, and he counter-claimed for specific performance of an alleged agreement as to the proceeds of other lands conveyed to the plaintiff, and of arrangements made between the parties as to other property in which they were alleged to be jointly interested, as to some of which he required the execution of a conveyance to himself or his nominee.

Defendant in his affidavit of documents filed on the 11th Dec. 1903 admitted that he had in his possession or power documents relating to the matters in question in the action set forth in the 1st schedule, but stated that he objected to produce those set forth in the second part of that schedule, on the grounds that "they relate only to my own case, and do not in any way tend to prove or support the plaintiff's case."

The second part of the 1st schedule contained (inter alia): "13th Sept. 1900.—Draft conveyance J. H. Johnson to Israel Morris."

Plaintiff accordingly took out a summons for a further and better affidavit of documents.

W. H. Cozens-Hardy for the applicant.—The defendant has not sworn that the documents he objects to produce contain nothing impeaching the case or title of the defendant: (Minet v. Morgan, 28 L. T. Rep. 573; L. Rep. 8 Ch. 361, which followed the case of Combe v. Corporation of London, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 631; affirmed 10 Jur. 57). The point is most elaborately dealt with in Bray on Discovery, p. 494. Coming down to Combe v. Corporation of London (ubi sup.), it may be fairly stated that only in actions of ejectment can the statement that the documents do not impeach his own case be omitted with impunity. The allegations that the documents do not support his adversary's case and do not impeach his own ought to be coupled: (Attorney-General v. Emerson, 48 L. T. Rep. 18; 10 Q. B. Div. 191, the case which is always quoted in discovery cases). Lindley, L.J.'s dictum in Budden v. Wilkinson (69 L. T. Rep. 427, at p. 429; (1893) 2 Q. B. 432) that "the words 'and do not tend to impeach the plaintiff's title' may apparently be omitted in the affidavit; but their omission does not affect the sufficiency of the affidavit" is relied on by the other side. Attorney-General v. Mayor and Corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne (81 L. T. Rep. 311; (1899) 2 Q. B. 478), where the Court of Appeal, varying the order of the Divisional Court, held that the affidavit need not state that the documents for which the claim of privilege is made do not contain anything impeaching the case of the defendant, was, like Morris v. Edwards (63 L. T. Rep. 26; 15 App. Cas. 309), in substance an action of ejectment (vide argument at p. 313, 81 L. T. Rep.). If that is so, it has no bearing on the present case, for it is admitted that in actions of ejectment and other similar cases the words in question need not be inserted. Smith, L.J., at p. 313 of 81 L. T. Rep., states that Attorney-General v. Mayor and Corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne (ubi sup.) was so decided in deference to the generality of the expressions of the noble and learned Lords in Morris v. Edwards (ubi sup.). It is quoted in the Annual Practice for 1904, at p. 394. Vaughan Williams, L.J. does confine his remarks in that case to such a case as that before his Lordship. After the decision in Minet v. Morgan (ubi sup.), the form of affidavit in use contained the words as to not tending to impeach the defendant's case. Budden v. Wilkinson (ubi sup.) was decided as not being a case in which the plaintiff's possession of the locus in quo was in dispute, and that therefore the plaintiff could not succeed by the weakness of the defendant's title. Lord Selborne, L.C. gave the form in Minet v. Morgan (ubi sup.) his sanction, and James, L.J. followed the case in Hastings Corporation v. Ivall (L. Rep. 8 Ch. 1017). There is nothing in the cases reported since 1842 to alter the practice of 1842 as to the necessity for inserting the words as to impeachment. Applicant asks for production, not only for a further and better affidavit. He says the Gower-street property is partly his; defendant says it is altogether his. Order XXXI., r. 19, A (2), was also referred to.

Warrington, K.C. and H. M. Humphry were not called upon on this point.

KEKEWICH, J.—There are three questions raised for decision. The first relates to whether privilege is sufficiently claimed as to documents set out in the second part of the schedule in the following language: "The grounds of my objection to produce the said documents set forth in the second part of the said first schedule are that they relate only to my own case and do not in any way tend to prove or support the plaintiff's case." It is said that that is not enough, because there are no words that these documents do not impeach the defendant's case. Words of that character, not varying very much in their nature, are to be found in all the text-books and in very many authorities from the time of the decision of Knight-Bruce, V.C. in Combe v. Corporation of London (ubi sup.). That is unquestionable, and probably in a carefully prepared affidavit they ought not to be omitted. It is impossible to say, after what has been said this morning, that they can be safely omitted. I have Mr. Bray's book—Digest of the Law of Discovery—before me in which he explains in a summary brought down to the present time (at p. 40) the form of claim for protection of documents and says, "It is doubtful whether it can now be insisted upon in any case." I agree with him that it would be doubtful how the matter would be decided. But, having regard to the decision of the House of Lords in Morris v. Edwards (ubi sup.) and of the Court of Appeal in Attorney-General v. Mayor and Corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne (ubi sup.), I am not at liberty to treat the question as being open. It is quite true that in that case the Attorney-General was treated as suing primarily as a plaintiff in an action of ejectment, and that the established exception only covers actions of ejectment, also that Morris v. Edwards (ubi sup.) was an action of ejectment, and therefore what is said there, and by the members of the Court of Appeal in Attorney-General v. Mayor and Corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne (ubi sup.), was with reference to the cases before them. But the expressions used by Lord Halsbury, L.C. and Lord Herschell have no limit at all. They go to the whole practice and not simply as to actions of ejectment, and their Lordships express themselves in the plainest way as to the necessity of having these words. But I will not pause to quote Morris v. Edwards (ubi sup.) further because I have the interpretation of that decision by the Lords Justices in Attorney-General v. Mayor and Corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne (ubi sup.). They do not say, so far as I can see, that the decision had any reference to the peculiar character of the action of ejectment. Smith, L.J. lays it down in general terms. His Lordship is reported to have said: "I well remember that when I was at the Bar the practice after the decision of the case of Minet v. Morgan (ubi sup.) used to be that a party to an action who claimed that documents in his possession were privileged from production had to state in his affidavit that they contained nothing tending to impeach his own case." And later (81 L. T. Rep. 313: "Now we are absolutely bound by that decision." Vaughan Williams, L.J. makes remarks to the same effect as reported. It seems impossible for me to get over the decision of the House of Lords if the Lords Justices could not. It would not be respectful in me to say that, the Lords Justices having said the decision of the House of Lords is binding on them, it is not to bind me. I am bound by the decision of the House of Lords. I cannot say, in the face of that, this affidavit, although it does not follow the common form and, notwithstanding the dictum of Lindley, L.J. in Budden v. Wilkinson (ubi sup.), is not sufficient. I cannot hold that this affidavit is insufficient. I do, however, venture to express the hope that Mr. Bray will be able to say in a future edition of his book that there is no doubt that the words either must, or need not be, inserted.

Re KINNEAR (deceased); KINNEAR v. BARNETT. (a)

Will—Construction—Gift to tenant for life with remainder to a class, their children to take by substitution—Occurrence of events not contemplated by testator.

A gift by will to a class to take effect after a life estate, with a substitutional gift to the children of deceased members of the class, expressed in words of futurity, does not let in the children of a member of the class in a case where, he having survived the tenant for life, both die after the date of the will during testator's life.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will, dated the 10th April 1876, which was duly proved in the Principal Probate Registry, on the 5th March 1900, by Henry James Kinnear, the sole executor therein named, the testator, John James Kinnear, after certain bequests to his wife, Mary Ann Kinnear, as to the residue of his estate devised and bequeathed the same unto his wife, Mary A. Kinnear, and appointed his son Henry J. Kinnear executor and administrator thereof upon trust to permit testator's wife to have the use and enjoyment of all such parts thereof as should not yield income, and to invest the residue of such of his estate as should not have been applied in payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies and pay the produce thereof and of such other parts of his estate as should yield income to his wife during the term of her natural life; and from and after her decease testator gave, devised, and bequeathed the same and every part thereof unto and among and to be equally divided between all and every his children, both sons and daughters, who should be living at the time of the decease of the testator's wife and the issue of such of them as "shall be dead" (such issue nevertheless taking only the share which their deceased parent would have been entitled to in the event of such parent surviving testator's wife) to and for their own use and benefit absolutely.

The testator died on the 7th Jan. 1900. His wife died on the 7th April 1891. They had five children—viz., William Charles Kinnear, who died on the 31st Jan. 1899, and who married the plaintiff Annie Dove in 1886, and by her had three children, the infant plaintiffs by their next friend; Henry J. Kinnear, who died on the 24th June 1902; John William Kinnear, who died on the 31st Oct. 1900; and Eleanor Mary Ann Barnett and Mary Ann Sophia Parr, the defendants.

The plaintiff Annie Dove became the wife of her present husband on the 1st May 1899.

One-fifth of testator's estate remained unadministered.

Annie Dove, in right of the infant plaintiffs, applied to the Probate Registry for grant of administration to the testator in order to obtain payment of this one-fifth share, which was claimed on their behalf as substituted residuary legatees in place of their father, William C. Kinnear, deceased.

The registrars of the Probate Division thereupon desired the opinion of this honourable court as to whether the three infant plaintiffs were substituted residuary legatees under testator's will, in the place of their late father.

This summons asked for a declaration accordingly.

H. Cloughton Scott, for the children of William C. Kinnear, stated the facts as above. It is a pure question of construction as to the intention of the testator to be gathered from his will. [KEKEWICH, J.—The difficulty arises from testator not having contemplated the one event which took place.] The words "shall be dead" refer to the distribution of the fund. If the children of William C. Kinnear cannot take by substitution to their father, I am afraid they cannot take at all, as it is a case of a gift to a class. Olney v. Bates (3 Drew, 319) at first sight is entirely against me, but at the bottom of p. 319 testator recites the decease of another daughter, Harriet. Testator had provided for that event by a codicil in favour of her issue. That would have been unnecessary if he did not intend by his will that the issue should not take: (per Kindersley, V.C., at p. 323). The facts there are analogous to those of the present case. In this case the word "then" is not found in the substitutionary gift. Re Potter's Trust (20 L. T. Rep. 649; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 52) is some authority for saying we may construe "dead" as dead at the period of distribution, whenever that happens. If William C. Kinnear had died at an earlier or later date he would have taken.

P. M. Walters for testator's remaining four children.—William C. Kinnear's children cannot take this fifth, as he, having died before testator, could not take under such a gift as that in the present will. [KEKEWICH, J.—Testator uses the words "would have been entitled to if he or she had survived my said wife." The gift is to the children living at the death of the wife and the issue of those then dead. It must mean then dead. He means the issue of those who died before the testator's wife. Olney v. Bates (ubi sup.) is in point. The reference to the codicil there was an afterthought of the Vice-Chancellor. This is not a case where your Lordship has to struggle to avoid an intestacy. It is analogous to cases like Jones v. Westcombe (1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 245, pl. 10), in which a gift during widowhood and then over has been held to extend to death as well as marriage.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is impossible not to surmise in the case of this will, if we were at liberty to surmise, that the testator, if the matter had been present to his mind, would have provided for these children, because the general intention of the will is to provide for his children and those who claim through his children. But unless I can find it stated within the four corners of the document, I have no right to surmise as to what it might have contained. I must take the will as being the last will and testament of the testator. He gave his residuary estate to his sons and daughters who should be living at the decease of his wife. This particular child predeceased the testator, though he survived the wife. Of course his children could not have taken under sect. 33 of the Wills Act, because this has been held not to be applicable to gifts to a class. Look also at the gift to the issue. It reads: "And the issue of such of them as shall be dead (such issue nevertheless taking only the share which their deceased parent would have been entitled to in the event of such parent surviving my said wife)"—without putting in the word "then." He means at the death of the wife. The word "then" is not here, but the testator uses words of futurity. A careful draftsman might have put in the word "then." It is the issue of children who shall be then dead who are to take. I might go further; the issue are to take the share their deceased parent would have taken in the event of the parent surviving "my said wife." As a matter of fact the child did not survive the wife. I do not see how his children can come in in any way. I declare that the testator's residuary estate, including the one-fifth unadministered, passed in fourths.

Re LONGBOTHAM AND SONS (Solicitors). (a)

Costs—Taxation—Third party liable—Mortgagee and mortgagor—Solicitors Act 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 38.

On a taxation by a mortgagor of his mortgagee's solicitor's bill of costs in respect of a suggested further advance, and a transfer of the security, the taxing master disallowed more than one-sixth of the amount of the bill, consisting of items for work done and letters written for the protection of the security without consultation with the mortgagor.

On a summons to review, the senior taxing master having certified that since the decision in Re Gray (84 L. T. Rep. 24; (1901) 1 Ch. 239) the practice had been to tax, apart from the order, as between the solicitor and the party or estate liable to pay, the court refused the application by the solicitors.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to review taxation of costs under an order dated the 19th Aug. 1903.

Messrs. Longbotham and Sons were the solicitors for Miss Taylor, holder of a mortgage upon an interest vested in Samuel B. Crossley, the petitioner, which was subject to a second charge.

The costs were incurred by the mortgagor, who applied to Messrs. Longbotham and Sons for a further advance by Miss Taylor on the mortgaged property, but such further advance was not made as the mortgagor made arrangements by which he paid off Miss Taylor's mortgage, the bill of costs including charges in respect of the transfer of the mortgage.

As the sole question was, as appears below, whether Messrs. Longbotham and Sons' bill of costs was made out on a wrong principle, the taxing master stating that it contained but one instance of a small overcharge, no purpose would

(1) Reported by W. P. PAIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CHAN. DIV.]

Re LONGBOTHAM AND SONS (Solicitors).

[CHAN. DIV.]

be served by setting out the bill of costs and charges and particulars of the items taxed off, some of which were, however, afterwards allowed by the master. It may be stated, however, that the total amount of the bill, as sent in for taxation, was 12l. 9s. 8d., from which more than one-sixth—namely, 2l. 10s. 8d.—was ultimately taxed off, the items disallowed consisting of attendances not made at the request of the mortgagor, but for the convenience of the mortgagee, and unnecessary letters. The petitioner was given his costs of the taxation.

Detailed objections were carried in by the respondents to the taxation, the following grounds and reasons being alleged to the disallowance made by the taxing master: (1) That the items were properly chargeable against the mortgagee, and, if so, the mortgagor was not entitled to have any of them disallowed. (2) If any of them were not properly chargeable against the mortgagee, they were properly chargeable against the mortgagor, and therefore ought to be allowed.

The taxing master, in his answers on respondents' objections, stated that he had taxed this bill upon the principles laid down in Re Gray (84 L. T. Rep. 24; (1901) 1 Ch. 239), and that he thought all the points raised by the respondents were really governed by this statement, and, after dealing with the objections in detail, stated that the bill was made out on a wrong principle, the old practice being present to the minds both of the solicitor and his London agent, and consequently more than one-sixth had been disallowed. He further added that if the present practice had been followed, and the bill drawn accordingly, he was satisfied that there would have been no question raised, as the bill did not contain overcharges except in one instance, and that a small one; but it was sought to charge the mortgagor with more than he was liable to pay as between him and the mortgagee, and such bills were of very frequent occurrence.

George Lawrence for the applicant solicitors. —This summons raises a question as to whether the decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., in Re Gray (84 L. T. Rep. 24; (1901) 1 Ch. 239) affects the principle on which on a third party taxation of the mortgagee's solicitor's costs by the mortgagor should be carried out. According to the present practice, it appears that all items which cannot be charged as between mortgagor and mortgagee are struck out, as I submit, erroneously, according to the earlier decisions. A mortgagor has not the right to have the bills of costs of the mortgagee's solicitor taxed on a different principle from that which the mortgagee himself has (per Lord Langdale, M.R. in Re Fyson (9 Beav. 117, at p. 119); and in Re Bignold (9 Beav. 269), his Lordship lays down the principle that the mortgagor may tax as against the mortgagee's solicitor for the purpose of reducing the amount claimed. In Re Baker (8 L. T. Rep. 566) Lord Romilly, M.R. lays down that the mortgagor must pay the amount due to the solicitor from the mortgagee. Re Jones (8 Beav. 479) is to the same effect. The cases are collected in Daniell's Chancery Practice, p. 1728, 7th edit., and their result similarly stated. Cozens-Hardy, J. deals with the question of law in Re Gray (ubi sup.), which was a case between lessor and lessee, at p. 25 of 84 L. T. Rep., where his Lordship refers to the law of mortgagor and mortgagee. The basis on which the items were there disallowed was because they would have been disallowed as between mortgagor and mortgagee, and Re Fyson (ubi sup.) is cited. His Lordship professed to follow Chitty, J.'s decision in Re Negus (71 L. T. Rep. 716; (1895) 1 Ch. 73), and it is stated that the third party by obtaining an order to tax does not render himself liable to pay the whole bill. The difficulty in understanding Re Gray (ubi sup.) is that the learned judge does not intend to lay down a new rule, and mentions the old cases referred to above. "On a third party taxation," it is said, "the taxing party stands in the position of the party chargeable; but this general rule does not prevent the taxing master taking into account where the third party is in fact liable." This latter remark is founded on Re Brown (L. Rep. 4 Eq. 464), a case of a cestui que trust taxing the bill of the solicitor to the trust estate. [KEKEWICH, J.—The solicitor never charges the trust estate.] In the same way that Re Gray (ubi sup.) is founded on Re Negus (ubi sup.), so Re Negus is founded on Re Brown (ubi sup.). There is a great difference between the case of a mortgagor and a cestui que trust as a third party taxing. Both, however, by obtaining the order to tax come under a certain liability:

Holliday v. Godlee, 58 L. T. Rep. 301.

Neither Cozens-Hardy, J. nor Chitty, J. intended to overrule any authority. Arguing elsewhere, it would be respectfully contended that these decisions are not law, and that the judicial expressions of opinion to be found there are, as between mortgagor and mortgagee, merely obiter dicta.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the petitioner, was not called on to address the court. [KEKEWICH, J. expressed the intention of consulting the taxing masters in order to ascertain what is the rule of the taxing office in third party taxations by a mortgagor.]

March 24. — KEKEWICH, J. — This summons raises a very important question under the third party clause. It was an application to review a certificate of the taxing master made on the taxation by a mortgagor of the bill of costs of the mortgagee's solicitor under sect. 38 of the Solicitors Act 1843. These cases are of frequent occurrence, and therefore, apart from the question of the proper practice, it is a matter of very considerable importance. The point was this: Counsel in support of the summons insisted that under certain authorities, of which he only cited a few, but which he said were numerous, the taxation of a bill of costs of a solicitor of a mortgagee by the mortgagor must proceed according to the rules which would govern the taxation of the same bill by the mortgagee—the taxation by a client of his solicitor's bill. That seems on the face of it to be a rather useless way of dealing with a bill of costs, because the mortgagor on repayment does not care to know what the mortgagee owes to his solicitor, but what is his own liability to the mortgagee's solicitor—that is to say, through the mortgagee to the solicitor. He wants to know what he has to pay for principal, interest, and costs, and he wants to ascertain what ought to be charged against him, so there is very little advantage to him in knowing what is to be charged against the mortgagee. But the cases which were decided upon the construction of the Solicitors Act 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 38, clearly went to this: that the taxation must proceed as between solicitor and client—that is to say, between the mortgagee and his solicitor—and the cases are necessarily to be found in Beavan's Reports. They are very numerous, and they establish the practice. But not long ago, Cozens-Hardy, J., as he then was, in the case of Re Gray (ubi sup.) gave a decision which, though not purporting to overrule the cases which are to be found in Beavan, certainly directed taxation on an entirely different footing, and what seems to me to be a useful footing, but whether that is the right and true construction of the Act is another question. Cozens-Hardy, J. would not say that the construction of the Act adopted by Lord Romilly, M.R. was wrong, but he certainly came to a different conclusion. But, after hearing counsel for the applicants and before hearing counsel for the petitioner, I thought that for the assistance of the Profession I would desire a certificate from the taxing masters as to what the practice is, and I therefore prepared a short case raising the point, and I gave the taxing masters an opportunity of seeing the papers to see exactly how the point arose. I have received from the senior taxing master a certificate in the following terms: "To the Honourable Mr. Justice Kekewich.—Your Lordship having desired a certificate from the masters of the Supreme Court (Taxing Office) of the practice generally in cases between the mortgagor and the solicitor of the mortgagee, I beg respectfully to report to your Lordship: That the practice followed by the masters in taxations under sect. 38 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73 (the Solicitors Act) up to within recent years was to tax as between the solicitor and the client (the party chargeable in the first instance), and not as between the solicitor and the party liable to pay, effect, however, being given, as far as possible, to the cases of Re Negus (1895) 1 Ch. 73 and Re Abbott (4 L. T. Rep. 576) and the observations of Cotton, L.J. in Re Morcroft (29 Sol. Jo. 471, C. A.). The principles, however, laid down by these cases were, in the opinion of the masters, considerably extended by the case of Re Gray (1901) 1 Ch. 239, and since that case the practice in the taxing office in taxations under this section has been to tax, apart from the order, as between the solicitor and the party, or estate, liable to pay.—(Signed) M. SPOFFORTH, Senior Master." So that I have the practice thus certified in that way, and I have the statement of the master in this particular case that he has taxed according to Re Gray (ubi sup.). My duty is, after that certificate, to follow the practice laid down, subject, of course, to my decision being reversed by the Court of Appeal, and to refuse the application with costs.

George Lawrence.—I suppose your Lordship will give me leave to appeal if necessary?

KEKEWICH, J.—Yes.

Re LORD WIMBORNE AND BROWNE'S CONTRACT AND VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT 1874. (a)

Vendor and purchaser—Settled land—Original settlement—Compound settlement—Life estate under original settlement extinguished—Charge for jointure and portions under original settlement—Sale by tenant for life under powers of original settlement—Trustees of original settlement.

A testator settled his land on his eldest son for life, with remainder to the son's sons in tail male in strict settlement, with power for each tenant for life on his marriage to create charges thereon for jointure for his wife and portions for his younger children. Land was purchased by the trustees of the will and added to the settled land, and the tenant for life married and charged the land subject to the settlement with jointure and portions. By successive deeds of resettlement, family arrangement, and appointment, to which the tenant for life and tenant in tail male were parties, the life estate given by the testator's will was extinguished and a compound settlement was created; but the charge for jointure and portions made under the powers given by the testator's will still subsisted. The tenant for life, with the concurrence of the tenant in tail, then agreed to sell part of the settled land in exercise of his power of sale under the original settlement created by the testator's will alone, the purchase money to be paid to the trustees of the will.

On a summons by the purchaser for the determination of the question whether the tenant for life could sell under the original settlement created by the will alone, or whether trustees of the compound settlement created by the will and subsequent deeds must be appointed:

Held, that, as the charge for jointure and portions made under the powers given by the will was still subsisting, the original settlement created by the will alone was still existing side by side with the compound settlement created by the will and subsequent deeds, and that the tenant for life could sell under the will alone, so that it was unnecessary to appoint trustees of the compound settlement.

Re Cornwallis-West and Munro's Contract (89 L. T. Rep. 351; (1903) 2 Ch. 150) explained.

SIR JOSIAH J. GUEST, who died on the 26th Nov. 1852, by his will, dated the 9th Sept. 1850, devised certain freehold estates to the use of his eldest son Lord Wimborne for life, with remainder to the use of his first and every other son successively according to seniority in tail male, with divers remainders over in strict settlement; and the testator empowered each tenant for life of the settled land to charge the same with a jointure for his wife and portions for his younger children and to limit terms to secure the same; and provided that any tenant for life in possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the settled land might, with the consent of the trustees, sell the same, and that the trustees should invest the purchase money in the purchase of (inter alia) freehold land to be settled upon the trusts to which the land sold had been subject; and the testator directed that his trustees should stand possessed of the proceeds of the sale and conversion of his residuary personalty upon the same trusts, so far as was material in the present case, as if such proceeds had been produced by sale of the settled land, and declared that the receipt of his trustees for any money payable to them should be a sufficient discharge for the same.

On the 14th June 1865 the trustees invested certain proceeds of conversion of the testator's residuary personalty in the purchase of an estate called the Fifehead estate, which was conveyed to them upon the same trusts, so far as material, as those to which the settled land was subject.

In May 1868 Lord Wimborne, the tenant for life of the settled land, married, and by his marriage settlement charged the Fifehead estate and other settled lands with a jointure for his wife and portions for the younger children of his marriage, and limited terms therein to secure the same.

By a disentailing assurance dated the 17th Jan. 1895, and made between Lord Wimborne of the first part, the Hon. Ivor Churchill Guest, his eldest son, then tenant in tail male of the second part, and Samuel Bircham of the third part, after reciting that Lord Wimborne and the Hon. I. C. Guest were desirous of barring the entail created by the testator's will (but without prejudice to the uses and estates thereby limited prior to the estate of the first son of Lord Wimborne) and of assuring the premises in manner hereinafter mentioned without prejudice as aforesaid, except that the joint power of appointment hereinafter limited to Lord Wimborne and the Hon. I. C. Guest should overreach the estate limited by the will to Lord Wimborne and the powers annexed to that estate, the Fifehead estate with the lands settled by the testator's will was limited, subject to the charge for jointure and portions and to the incumbrances therein mentioned and to the terms for securing the same and to the uses and estates limited by the testator's will prior to the estate thereby limited to the first son of Lord Wimborne, but freed from the estate in tail male of the Hon. I. C. Guest and from all estates in remainder, to such uses as Lord Wimborne and the Hon. I. C. Guest should jointly appoint, and in default to the uses, trusts, and powers which under the testator's will were subsisting immediately before the execution of the disentailing assurance so as to restore and confirm the same.

By a deed of resettlement dated the 19th Jan. 1895, and made between Lord Wimborne of the first part, the Hon. I. C. Guest of the second part, and trustees of the third part, the Fifehead estate with other settled lands was appointed, subject to the charge for jointure and portions and to the term for securing the same, to such uses as Lord Wimborne and the Hon. I. C. Guest should by deed jointly appoint, and in default to the use that the Hon. I. C. Guest during their joint lives might receive a yearly rentcharge of 1500*l.*, and subject thereto to the use of Lord Wimborne for life in restoration and confirmation of his estate for life limited by the testator's will or subsisting under the disentailing assurance, and so as to restore all powers annexed or appendant thereto, and after his death to certain uses for raising money for payment of certain debts, duties, and costs therein mentioned, and subject thereto to the use of the Hon. I. C. Guest for life, with divers remainders over in strict settlement.

By a deed of family arrangement dated the 20th July 1895, and made between Lord Wimborne of the first part, the Hon. I. C. Guest of the second part, and S. Bircham of the third part, Lord Wimborne as to his life estate granted the Fifehead estate with other settled lands to S. Bircham for the terms therein mentioned for securing the payment of certain charges thereon, and subject thereto to the use of the Hon. I. C. Guest, his heirs and assigns, and the Hon. I. C. Guest released the annual rentcharge of 1500*l.* granted to him by the resettlement of the 19th Jan. 1895 and covenanted to pay certain portions chargeable on the settled estates and the jointure of Lady Wimborne.

By an indenture dated the 20th March 1899, and made between Lord Wimborne of the first part, the Hon. I. C. Guest of the second part, and trustees of the third part, Lord Wimborne and the Hon. I. C. Guest, in exercise of the power of appointment created by the deed of resettlement of the 19th Jan. 1895, appointed the Fifehead estate, subject to the charge for jointure and portions and to the incumbrances thereon and the terms for securing the same, to the uses, upon the trusts, and subject to the powers which would be subsisting therein under the deed of resettlement if Lord Wimborne were then dead.

By an agreement dated the 6th Oct. 1903, and made between Lord Wimborne of the first part, the Hon. I. C. Guest of the second part, and the purchaser of the third part, Lord Wimborne, with the concurrence of the Hon. I. C. Guest, agreed to sell the Fifehead estate to the purchaser, the agreement stating that the vendor was selling and would convey the property as tenant for life or the person having the powers of the tenant for life for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts under the settlement made by the testator's will, and that the purchase money should be paid to the trustees of that settlement.

This summons was taken out by the purchaser for the determination of the question whether the vendor could sell as tenant for life of the settlement made by the will alone, or whether he could only sell as tenant for life under the compound settlement made by the will, the conveyance of the 14th June 1865, the disentailing assurance of the 17th Jan. 1895, the deed of resettlement of the 19th Jan. 1895, the deed of family arrangement of the 20th July 1895, and the deed of appointment of the 20th March 1899, or by some of those documents, so that trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts must be appointed of such compound settlement.

The deed of appointment of the existing trustees of the testator's will constituted them trustees thereof for all the purposes and with all the powers for and with which the trustees nominated by the testator had been appointed trustees by his will.

Vernon Smith, K.C. and G. J. Duncan for the purchaser.—The vendor proposes to sell under his power of sale as tenant for life or as the person having the powers of a tenant for life under the testator's will; but after the resettlement of the 19th Jan. 1895, by which the vendor's life estate under the will and all powers annexed to that life estate were restored, the vendor can only sell under the compound settlement created by the will and the various deeds down to and including that resettlement:

Re Cornwallis-West and Munro's Contract, 88 L. T. Rep. 351; (1903) 2 Ch. 150.

The statutory power of sale of a tenant for life, after alienation or release of his life estate, still remains exercisable under sect. 50 of the Settled Land Act 1882:

Re Mundy and Roper's Contract, 79 L. T. Rep. 583; (1899) 1 Ch. 275.

In 1897, in the unreported case of Re Lord Wimborne and Lee's Contract (1897) W. N. 176), Stirling, J. held that Lord Wimborne could then sell under his power of sale as tenant for life for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts under the testator's will; and in the same year, in the case of Barry Railway Company and Lord Wimborne and Vendor and Purchaser Act 1874 (76 L. T. Rep. 489), North, J. decided that Lord Wimborne's life estate was not merged or extinguished by the indenture of the 20th July 1895, and that he could then sell under his power of sale as tenant for life for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts under the testator's will; but both these cases were prior to the indenture of the 20th March 1899. Lord Wimborne can now sell only under the compound settlement created by the will and subsequent deeds.

J. G. Wood for Lord Wimborne.—Although there is a compound settlement created by the will and subsequent deeds, the original settlement created by the will is still in existence by reason of the charge for jointure and portions under that settlement and the term for securing the same:

Re Mundy and Roper's Contract (ubi sup.).

And the vendor can still exercise his power of sale under the will:

Re Du Cane and Nettlefold's Contract, 78 L. T. Rep. 458; (1898) 2 Ch. 96;

Re Lord Wimborne and Lee's Contract (ubi sup.);
Barry Railway Company and Lord Wimborne and Vendor and Purchaser Act 1874 (ubi sup.).

The case of Re Cornwallis-West and Munro's Contract (ubi sup.) did not decide that the vendor could not sell under the will if there were trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of the settlement created by the will. If the court decides in favour of the vendor, both parties desire that the present trustees of the will should be appointed trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of the settlement created by the will in respect of the Fifehead estate.

SWINFEN EADY, J. stated the facts and proceeded:—The question is, Can the vendor sell under the will alone and the trustees of the will give a good receipt for the purchase money, or can he only sell under the compound settlement created by the will and the subsequent deeds so as to necessitate the appointment of trustees of that compound settlement? It is clear from the cases of Re Du Cane and Nettlefold's Contract (ubi sup.) and Re Mundy and Roper's Contract (ubi sup.) that an original settlement and a compound settlement may be subsisting side by side, and the mere fact that the life tenant has parted with his life estate does not prevent him from exercising his statutory powers under the original settlement. In the present case the original settlement created by the will is still subsisting, since by reason of the jointure and portions charged and remaining to be raised thereunder the land still stands for the time being limited to persons by way of succession under that instrument according to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Mundy and Roper's Contract (ubi sup.). If that were all, it would be clear from those cases that the vendor can sell under the original settlement created by the will, and that the trustees of the will can give a valid receipt for the purchase money. It is contended, however, that this would be contrary to the decision of Farwell, J. in Re Cornwallis-West and Munro's Contract (ubi sup.), and that where there are instruments constituting a compound settlement the tenant for life can only sell under that compound settlement, and that the trustees of that compound settlement are the only persons who can give a valid receipt for the purchase money, even although there are still subsisting limitations under the original settlement. I have the authority of Farwell, J. for stating that the true explanation of that case is that, as the old life estate created by the will had been restored, the tenant for life could not sell and confer a good title under the resettlement alone, as he proposed to do, and, as there were no trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of the settlement created by the will, the tenant for life could not, as matters then stood, sell under the will alone. The learned judge did not decide, and did not intend to decide, that the vendor could not sell and make a good title as tenant for life under the will if and when trustees of the settlement created by the will were appointed for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts. Indeed, the contrary was assumed in the argument before him. In the present case the vendor has entirely parted with his life estate in the land, but the original settlement created by the will is still subsisting, and the vendor can exercise his statutory powers thereunder. Therefore the vendor can sell under the will alone, and the trustees of the will for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts can give a valid receipt for the purchase money. As the parties are agreed that it is doubtful whether the existing trustees of the will are trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts of the Fifehead estate, to obviate any doubt I appoint them as trustees of the will for those purposes in respect of that estate, and give leave to amend the summons by intitling it in the matter of the Settled Land Acts 1882 to 1890.

WING (app.) v. EPSOM URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (resps.). (a)

Public health—Justices—Abatement of nuisance—Order made by three justices—Order signed by one justice only—Validity of order—Necessity of signature by two justices—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 96, 251—Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 14.

By sect. 251 of the Public Health Act 1875 a court of summary jurisdiction when hearing and determining an information or complaint under the Act must be constituted of two or more justices of the peace in petty sessions. A court of summary jurisdiction consisting of three justices in petty sessions made an order under sect. 96 of the Act on the owner of certain premises for the abatement of a nuisance on the premises. The order as drawn up and served on the owner was signed by one justice only.

Held, that the order must be signed by two justices, and, having been signed by one justice only, was bad.

CASE stated by the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Surrey.

At the midsummer quarter sessions for the county of Surrey three appeals by Walter Wing (the appellant) against three orders made by the court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Epsom were heard. Each of the orders was made by the court of summary jurisdiction on the appellant under sect. 96 of the Public Health Act 1875 as being the owner within the meaning of the Act of certain premises situated at Garden-cottages, Epsom.

The Court of Quarter Sessions dismissed the appeals, and confirmed the orders with costs, subject to this case.

The facts of the case were as follows:—

The appellant was the owner, within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1875, and lessee of certain premises situate at Nos. 1 to 20, Garden-cottages, Epsom, within the district of the respondents, of which fourteen years of the term of the appellant's lease were still unexpired.

In or about the months of March and April 1903 the respondents relaid the sewer with which the drains of the premises were connected, and the respondents served three notices upon the appellant alleging a nuisance existing in respect of the drains and requiring the same to be abated and certain works to be executed.

The appellant did not comply with the notices or any of them, and three complaints relating to the alleged nuisance were thereupon made to a justice of the peace, and such justice issued three summonses requiring the appellant to appear before the court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Epsom.

On the hearing of the summonses on the 20th April 1903, both parties being then present, the orders were made by the court of summary jurisdiction, three justices being then present and taking part in the hearing and determination of the summonses, and subsequently on the 27th

April 1903 the appellant served the respondents with notice of appeal against each of the orders as having been made by His Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the division of Epsom, and setting forth in each such notice, amongst other grounds of appeal, that the order appealed from was bad on the face of it, and on the same day (the 27th April 1893) the appellant duly entered into three several recognisances as required by law for the prosecution of his appeals, copies whereof were hereto annexed and were to be taken as part of this case.

The orders were on the 2nd June 1903 served on the appellant by the respondents, and each of the original orders was duly delivered to the clerk of the peace prior to the hearing of these appeals.

The following was an exact copy of one of the original orders, and was in the same terms in all respects as the order served on the appellant:

In the county of Surrey, petty sessional division of Epsom.—Before the court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Epsom the 20th day of April 1903, complaint was made on the 9th day of April 1903 by Edward Robert Capon, of Bromley Hurst, Church-street, Epsom, Inspector of Nuisances to the Epsom Urban District Council, that in or on certain premises situated at 15, 14, 13, 12, and 11, Garden-cottages, Epsom aforesaid, in the district, under the Public Health Act 1875, of the Epsom Urban District Council, the following nuisance then existed—viz., a nuisance arising from want or defective construction of structural conveniences, that is to say, arising from leaky drains, also drains not being intercepted from sewer, the discharge of sink wastes into closet pans, the absence of ventilation to drains, defective flushing cistern in each closet, and rain-water pipe connected directly with sewer, and that Walter James Wing (hereinafter called "the defendant") is the owner of the premises on which the said nuisance arises. On hearing the said complaint it is ordered that the defendant within six weeks from the service of this order, or a true copy thereof according to the said Act, do take out the existing branch drains and construct new drains with stoneware pipes, with watertight cement joints laid to proper falls in beds of cement concrete properly intercepted from sewer, provided with efficient ventilation, with cast iron pipes of a diameter not less than four inches, disconnect sink wastes from closet pans, and cause same to discharge into the open over a trapped stoneware gully which shall be connected with the sewer, so that the same shall no longer be a nuisance or injurious to health as aforesaid.—Dated the 20th day of April 1903.—(Signed) WILLIAM R. G. FARMER, Justice of the Peace for the county aforesaid.

Each of the other original orders was in exactly the same terms, and was under the hand and seal of William R. G. Farmer as the order hereinbefore set out, and each of the other orders served on the appellant was in exactly the same terms and was under the hand and seal of William R. G. Farmer as the order hereinbefore set out, save that each of the orders referred to different premises in the same street.

It was contended for the appellant that each of the orders was bad and ought to be quashed, inasmuch as each order was made under the hand and seal of one justice of the peace only.

It was contended for the respondents that each of the orders was valid.

The Court of Quarter Sessions were of opinion that each of the orders was valid, and overruled the appellant's contention, and they afterwards heard the appeals together, by consent upon the merits, and dismissed them with costs.

WING (app.) v. EPSOM URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (resps.).

[K.B. Div.]

If the court should be of opinion upon the facts stated that the quarter sessions were right in overruling the appellant's contention and in holding that the orders were valid, the order of quarter sessions was to stand; but if not, each of the orders was to be quashed, and each of the appeals was to be allowed with costs.

The Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), provides:

Sect. 96. If the court is satisfied that the alleged nuisance exists, or that although abated it is likely to recur on the same premises, the court shall make an order on such person requiring him to comply with all or any of the requisitions of the notice, or otherwise to abate the nuisance within a time specified in the order, and to do any works necessary for that purpose; . . . The court may by their order impose a penalty not exceeding five pounds on the person on whom the order is made, and shall also give directions as to the payment of all costs incurred up to the time of the hearing or making the order for abatement or prohibition of the nuisance.
